pulation of subsidiary books, kept in the accountant's office, which Mr. Chatteris and his colleague could not check. The auditors agree with everybody else in expressing admiration for the system of the Company's accounts. They declare themselves unable to suggest any improvement in these accounts, and therefore it only remains for outsiders to inquire whether any improvement is possible in the auditors. An improvement, or at least a change, has been lately made by transferring the power of appointing auditors from the Corporation of London to the Board of Trade. But suppose that Mr. Chatteris and his colleague had gone on for several years longer, contemplating and, so far as admiration permitted, checking the working of this perfect system of accounts, attending strictly to their own proper business, and never presuming to object to the apparent generosity with which the Directors gave away other people's money; and suppose that Mr. Wyld had not accidentally discovered that his friend Mr. Higgs sometimes omitted to hand over a cheque that he had received—we should like to know whether a time would ever have come when Mr. Higgs's frauds would have divulged themselves. It is certain that nobody connected with the Company would ever have been surprised at anything. The Directors would have gone on laying up supposed treasures in heaven for themselves, and postponing further into a dim and distant future the prospect of a dividend out of profits. If they suffered under public censure for maintaining a high general price of gas, they might console themselves by imagining that they were blessed by the poor whose light they had compassionately abstained from darkening. If anybody remarked that Mr. Higgs seemed to be living in a style for which a yearly salary of 145*l.* could hardly pay, the answer would be that Mrs. Higgs had probably come into the expected fortune. It seems possible that Mr. Higgs might have gone on abstracting more and more of the profits of the Company as long as anybody would lend money to the Company to supply their place. Mr. Higgs was an able man, or he could not have perpetrated these frauds. Of course he bore the highest character, as this class of swindlers always do. He was assiduous in his duties at the office, early and late, or he would have been found out long before. The melancholy moral of his story seems to be that ability is dangerous, that respectability ought to excite suspicion, and that if a clerk displays exceptional industry, his employers will do well to dismiss him instantly from their service. The directors report that the accounts they have received of Mr. Higgs's "wicked extravagance," have come upon them with surprise. Now that somebody is surprised at something the world will perhaps resume its usual course. When it was first announced that Mr. Higgs had absconded, he was supposed to have appropriated a small sum received for "gas products." Investigation showed that he had appropriated upwards of 71,000*l.* In order to make good the deficiency thus created, it is proposed to set apart 10,000*l.* a year out of dividend, and this, we suppose, must continue for seven years. The directors during this period will have to exchange fancied blessings of consumers for real curses of shareholders; and they must feel that the light that they have diffused has not been accompanied by much sweetness.

A meeting of shareholders was held on Thursday evening preliminary to the formal meeting to be held on Friday morning, but we fear that whether the affairs of this unlucky Company are looked at by gaslight or by daylight they must appear equally unpromising. Among other points of view in which this question may be regarded is that of the professional accountant. Mr. Higgs is stated by his brethren to have possessed the highest ability in his calling, and the Directors thought 145*l.* a year a fitting recompense for his services. He must have felt that he was entitled to take rank with those great liquidators whose power almost entitles them to be ranked as a fourth estate of the realm. He might have wound up such a vast concern as Overend, Gurney, and Co., or he might even, for an adequate remuneration, have kept it going. And yet he comes early to the office of the Great Central Gas Company and late departs, and draws without complaint his pay of less than 10*s.* a day. Shall such a man as this not have his yearnings for wealth and power? Shall he not demand, nay, shall he not create, a career open to his talents? Shall it be inscribed over his grave that here reposes

> A Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood?

Mr. Higgs seems to have thought not.

THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT.

We took occasion some time ago to refer to the proposed extension of the Contagious Diseases Act. The arguments in favour of such a measure are generally understood, and are sufficiently simple. One of the most fearful diseases known to humanity was for a long time permitted to extend itself in England without the smallest attempt to stop its ravages. It is the special characteristic of the disease that it not only attacks the vicious, but extends itself to innocent people, and corrupts the constitution of future generations. The absence of any precautionary measures has long shocked all persons whose ideas of delicacy do not consist in simply shutting their eyes to horrible evils because they are unmentionable in general society. It would be not merely an act of policy, but a religious duty, if there is any meaning in such words, to eradicate, if it be possible, one of the chief causes of human degradation and misery. That it is possible, if not to eradicate, at least to mitigate it materially, has been conclusively shown by our own experience, and still more by that of foreign nations. Yet there is a certain class which is sure to raise a howl of indignation against any proposal for more effectual measures of repression, on grounds of religious and other prejudices. We have little doubt that their power has declined under the general spread of common sense and sanitary improvement, and we fully believe that, if Government acts with tolerable decision, it will find that their obstructiveness will be as impotent as it deserves. If anything were wanted to confirm this opinion it would be the inspection of a remarkable pamphlet, published under the name of The Prevention Worse than the Disease, which, on the whole, is as successful in answering its own arguments as any work which we have lately had the pleasure of studying. We can sincerely commend it to the perusal of persons who take an interest in the question, as a conclusive proof of the extreme smallness of reasonable grounds of objection.

The pamphlet of course indulges in a good deal of scolding, calling the recent Act "diabolical," "a dishonour to God," "an insult to His moral government," "an outrage to public virtue," "a death-blow to the wellbeing of the community," and using the other gentle phrases by which it is customary for writers of a certain class to indicate their disapproval of a measure. We will only remark that there is a primâ facie presumption that a system which has already saved many persons from a terrible disease, as the pamphlet admits, and which has done so under very unfavourable circumstances, is neither a dishonour to our Maker, nor a sure way of checking our national wellbeing. It is curious to inquire what are the modes by which it is sought to rebut this presumption.

The first argument is a bold one. The present state of the law, says the pamphlet, is intended to suppress vice, and it speaks of "the existing salutary law against public prostitution, which, whether inactive or not, whilst it stands alone on the Statute-book, affords to the community some safeguard against this rapidly encroaching evil being thus utterly ignored." What is the plain meaning of this, when put into English? Everybody knows, what the pamphlet does not dare to deny, that any attempt to suppress vice by legislation is utterly out of the question, and would lead to evils infinitely greater than those now existing. Further, there is no country in the world where vice shows itself so openly and unblushingly, and enjoys such unlimited facilities, as in England. The difference, in short, between ourselves and foreign countries is simply this—that vice is there put under certain restrictions; whilst with us there are practically no more restrictions on vice than on any harmless amusement. We are frequently ridiculed by foreign writers for this singular contrast between our practice and our precepts; but it passes belief that it should be expressly maintained, in the name of religion and virtue, that we should refrain from imposing restrictions in order to keep up a law which is notoriously and necessarily "inactive." If the pamphlet had proposed that vice should be put down by legislation, it would at least have been logical; though, in the interests not only of common sense but of virtue, we should have strongly opposed its suggestion; but it prefers to suggest, in plain terms, that we should be systematically hypocritical. Hypocrisy, as the pamphlet observes, is the homage which vice pays to virtue. We would propose, as an amended definition, that it is sometimes the parade with which virtue satisfies itself for not passing into the active stage. The usual fallacy upon this point is expressed in the phrase that foreign countries "recognise" the existence of vice; but, as they recognise it in order to impose certain restrictions on it, the difference is not, as is insinuated, between recognition and prohibition, but between recognition and unlimited license. The first step towards remedying an evil is the recognition that it exists as a fact, especially if, as in this case, it is a fact which is absolutely certain to continue to exist.

The pamphlet attempts, in the next place, to appeal to the old prejudices against France, and speaks with horror of the "bare possibility of the national descent to that depth of moral degradation to which the French, as a people, have sunk." We will not stop to argue that, in many and not unimportant respects, the supposed change would be a rise instead of a fall; and that if Englishmen, for example, were as sober and thrifty as Frenchmen, they would make a distinct step in civilization. The purpose of the argument is clear enough. The French system of licensing is in many ways tyrannical, and tends to degrade the women subjected to it; and it is sought to identify the proposed regulations with a system which is exposed to many legitimate objections. Now it cannot be too plainly stated that the purpose of the Act is simply the suppression of disease; and it has been clearly proved in practice that, so long as this end is distinctly kept in view, the women themselves appreciate it, and after some natural suspicions have been surmounted, are only too glad, surprising as it may appear, to be thoroughly cured of a frightful malady. No one says, or proposes to say, that the women shall be subject to any regulations except those which are necessary in a sanitary point of view, and the attempt to confound the two systems is a proof that the authors of the pamphlet are sensible of the weakness of their position. Everybody is willing to attack disease; but if it can be suggested that other oppressive measures are proposed, a prejudice may be raised against the whole movement. Certain incidental misrepresentations bearing upon this point may be shortly noticed. The pamphlet argues that the foreign women in London are specially degraded, which, for obvious reasons, is probable enough. It objects equally to the Act, because it tends to make Englishwomen less degraded, and says that if disorderly houses are made, as has been proved, more neat and cleanly, it will be an additional recommendation to vice. We may leave these two arguments to fight it out. If the French system degrades the women and the English raises them, there must be some radical distinction between the two; in either case, it is an ingenious logical feat to represent both tendencies as equally pernicious. Meanwhile the argument used to prove the greater degradation of Frenchwomen is curious. It is, first, the surprising fact that they don't like the missionaries sent to them in London; and, secondly, that they save money in order to retire from their terrible trade, whereas Englishwomen seek to get rid of their ill-gotten gains, "as if they were contaminating." If this proves anything, it merely proves that the Frenchwomen are not so utterly reckless. Another argument from the same source is worth notice as illustrating the candour of the pamphlet. The disease, it says, is commoner amongst the upper classes in France than with the same classes in England; the evidence proves equally that it is much less common in the lower orders, and specially amongst the military, in France than in England. The explanation given is doubtlessly accurate—namely, that many women of the superior class evade the operation of the French system. Nothing could prove more distinctly that the system has done much to suppress disease, even with the disadvantage that there is a large class which it has not been able to reach; and yet these assertions occur in the very place where the pamphlet is urging that it is necessarily ineffectual. We may leave the writers' admissions to answer their arguments. Upon this head we will merely add, that it is stated that the disease is chiefly maintained in French ports by importation from England; that the difference between the percentage of cases in the French and (still more decisively) the Belgian army, and in the English, is perfectly startling; and finally, that repressive measures are not confined to France, but prevail with the same good effect in countries upon whose moral standard we have no right, nor even any pretension, to look down. Our plan of allowing unlimited contagion would be regarded with as much disgust in Germany as amongst our traditional enemies.

We must now deal with one more argument, which deserves more respectful treatment, for it is at any rate founded avowedly upon religious grounds. We need only notice shortly the extreme form of the argument, at which even the pamphlet does not do more than hint indirectly; namely, that the disease is to be regarded as a Divine punishment with which we should not tamper. The argument, if it is good for anything—and it is only good from a superstitious point of view radically opposed to all true religious feeling—is equally good against voluntary and against compulsory treatment. Other diseases are equally the result of vicious modes of life, and if they are all to be considered as directly sent for our punishment, we should have societies for the preservation of the small-pox as well as for the support of yet greater evils. Vaccination would still, as formerly, be considered as blasphemous. The argument in this form is pretty well extinct, and as the pamphlet is emphatic in its praises of Lock hospitals subsidized by the Government, we presume that its authors would not object to the suppression of this disease so long as we refrain, in obedience to a blind superstition, from making our measures effective. It is sacrilegious, according to the argument, to say, You shall not spread contagion; but it is wise and right to say, We will help you not to spread it if you had rather be cured. This is merely an appeal to the ancient and decaying prejudice against Government interference even in cases where nothing else can possibly be satisfactory. But another shape of the same doctrine is really the only one which is worth a moment's attention. It is that by diminishing the penalty of vice we shall increase its frequency. To this we may say—first, that even if this were true, it is important to limit a disease which injures the innocent almost, if not quite, as frequently as the guilty; and, secondly, that by diminishing the resulting evils, we diminish the sin. Vice in any case is an unspeakable evil; but it is doubly grievous when it leads to so many remote consequences. It would be less morally degrading when it did not entail ruin upon future generations. So far we should be merely striking a balance of evils; but the statement itself is, so far as we can tell, totally unfounded, and even opposed to the truth. So far as experience goes, there has been no evidence in confirmation of it; and no one has shown that increased impunity of this kind has led to an increase of vice. Everybody who has been familiar with the habits of young men knows how little such dangers really act as a restraint. They make many men more cautious, but they do not make them more moral; the only result is that they are vicious with more forethought and deliberation. If the punishment were certain, the effect might be different; but when it comes as a kind of lottery, it has the same tendency as other lotteries to demoralize people and rapidly to blunt their sense of danger. We believe it would be found that men are frequently most reckless where the disease is most common, and for the obvious reason that those who have not been deterred by the risk become degraded, and form the nucleus of a debased population. It is surprising how soon such topics become a mere matter of jest, and the necessary consequence is a moral as well as a physical degeneration.

The question is not a very pleasant one to treat, but its importance makes it a duty to press it upon the attention of Government and of all rational people. When the prejudices which oppose the extension of the measure are fairly examined, they become so flimsy and self-contradictory that nothing can account for the audacity with which they are avowed except the blundering views which some people are apt to take of religious subjects. The objections raised are simply a fag-end of the old objections against all sorts of sanitary reforms, founded on the intelligent theory that God made us to be diseased and dirty, and that it is profane to use the means which He has put into our hands for healing and cleansing the dark places of society. The unanimous opinion of sensible men is, we have no doubt, on the other side, and Government can afford to do its manifest duty if it has the courage. The extension of an Act which has already obtained such unequivocal results would do more good than half the measures which excite twice as much attention; and though this is not the place for dwelling on the topic, we will add that no duty is more imperatively commanded by the Christian religion than that of repressing evils which are debasing whole masses of our population and spreading misery through all ranks of society.

YOUNG OXFORD.

THERE are few earthly surprises at once so odd and so pleasant as the surprise with which, after a few years absence from Oxford, one returns to find oneself an anachronism. It is not merely that the ordinary social changes of life have gone on more rapidly there than elsewhere, that a little world which renews itself every three or four years presents new faces and new voices to us, that, if we seek for some enduring element amid the chaos of novelty, we are driven to make friends with a veteran scout, or to gaze with a sigh of relief on an immortal bedell. It is not the faces only, but the whole atmosphere of Oxford that has changed. The puns, the sermons, the Newdigates, the heroes of the past are utterly forgotten. It is one peculiarity of a place at first sight so eminently traditional, that there is no tradition; the great boating deeds of Smith, the great proctorate of Brown, the wit of Robinson, the learning of Jones, vanish with the generation that knew them. We find ourselves in the midst of a world that has no past, in which a modern life is for ever ebbing and flowing through time-honoured cloisters and beneath immemorial elms, where the most venerable of living beings is the man in his last term.

It is difficult to express the sense of fogyism with which one reads the innumerable Oxford jeux d'esprit that float down to hall or parsonage as Charlie comes home for vacation; such amusing little essays, for instance, as these which have just been collected in the form of the Oxford Spectator. There is all the old fun, the old sense of social ease and brightness and freedom, the old medley of work and indolence, of jest and earnest, that made Oxford life so picturesque. But every form in which this spirit embodied itself is changed. We have to begin our Oxford again, as we had to begin it when we faced the Vice-Chancellor at our matriculation. All is new, all is strange to us, and we are plunged once more into the "Freshman's Dream" which has been so ingeniously sketched by a writer in these essays:—

> I dreamt that I was wandering at midnight in the Christ-church meadows. The sun was shining, and all the trees bore the similitude of the colossal heads which form the new decorations of the Theatre. I was hastening to Iffley to attend a lecture for which I was in no measure prepared. One tree gravely requested me to subscribe to the Botanical Gardens, while another asked me with great affability to wine. Then the ground beneath my feet turned suddenly to cinders, and I was exhorted to feel my stretcher, because it was the last lap. I rose in the air, and found myself on my feet at the Union, unable to speak; I sat down, and was straightway dining in Hall without cap or gown, while my old schoolmaster glared at me from a frame upon the wall. Then came Alcestis, whose face was still that of the College Porter. With one hand she solved a quadratic equation, and with the other she whispered in tones of silvery sweetness "the Proctor's compliments, sir, and are you a member of the University?"

It is the contrast of this social novelty with the historic and unchanging aspect of the place, of its real life and its ideal life, which gives such a strange charm to Oxford. The future Antony-a-Wood who sets himself to describe the true and not the merely official history of Alma Mater will find himself face to face with the most picturesque, because the most rapidly changing, panorama in the world. Without stirring the dust of the middle ages he will recall the martial tramp of the academical Cavalier as he mustered in Broken Heyes or swept out with Rupert to the fight at Chalgrove Field, the jests of the sturdy Jacobites who ogled the Toasts in Merton Gardens or pelted the soldiers of King George, the earliest Methodists fasting and praying beneath the eyes of the "pretty fellows," the tap of the martial drum that could alone draw Professor Warton from his alehouse, the gaunt figure of Whately stalking round the meadow, the geological cavalcade behind Buckland, the sudden adoption of tail-coats and the most courteous of droops by which Oxford signalized its worship of Newman and the origin of the new "Movement," the debates at the Union, the boats on the river, the delights of the Long. What will strike him most, perhaps, in the Oxford of to-day is the disappearance of the Don. Oxford is Young Oxford. The queer figures, strange compounds of shyness and hauteur, who formed the still background to all the movement and variety of academical life, have faded away into quiet parsonages. With them Oxford has lost its last relic of continuity, the last bond that linked its generations together, the last memorials of a tradition of discipline. It has not lost sweetness in them or light, but it certainly has lost individuality. They were not as other men are. They had in fact a deep, quiet contempt for other men. Oxford was their world, and beyond Oxford lay only waste wide regions of shallowness and inaccuracy. They were often men of keen humour, of humour keen enough at any rate to see and to mock at the mere pretences of "the world of progress" around them. Their delight was to take a "progressive idea" and to roast it over the common-room fire. They had their poetry; for the place itself, and the reverence they felt for it, filled them with a quiet sense of the beautiful; and this refinement and this humour both saved them from bowing before the vulgar gods of the world without. They did not care much for money; they saw their contemporaries struggling for it, and lingered on content with their quiet rooms and four hundred a year. They cared very little for fame, at least the fame that lives in the light of Mudie's countenance, although most of them had a great dream-work on hand, of which not a chapter was ever written. What they did care for was strangely blended of the venerable and the ridiculous, for their real love of learning was mingled with a pedantry both of mind and of life, and a feminine rigour over the little observances of society and discipline. Such as they were, however, Young Oxford has no type of existence to show so picturesque, so individual. Its one really new product is the "D. F. Niente, Esq.," whom the essayists of the Spectator set before us in the various stages of his academical career. He > wears the form of a slim and graceful youth, well dressed and highly perfumed; his voice is soft, and his manners attractive, if perhaps a trifle artificial. First you ask his name, and admire him at a distance for a week; then you meet him in company, and are in a moment his willing captive. He soon allures you to his lair, a spot strewn with every elegance of luxury and art, with albums full of fair faces or amusing "sketches," with graceful trifles from foreign lands, and little notes from all the ladies in Oxford. There he feeds you with the most delicate viands, over which you linger like them of old who could not leave the lotus-beds; then, before this enjoyment begins to pall, he leads you forth, and slowly up and down the High Street, through a long delightful afternoon, till, before the bell of your College rings for dinner, you are ensnared. Struggle as you will, you cannot get free. Henceforth you will act in private theatricals, and sleep till mid-day; you will never row or run again; you will be often photographed; in short, as your captor is so will you be.

No doubt there is a more serious side to Young Oxford. If dons have fled before this advent of "shooting stars," of whist, of athletics, of art, before the endless jangle of pianos and the rattle of billiard-balls, some of the better elements of the world without have come in. Lepidus, as these essayists paint him, may be "dainty, delicate, delightful, superficial"; we may get a little sick of his raptures over De Musset, his egotistical philosophy, his art-gossip, the pretentious little essay which he polishes in a couple of years till it is too sparkling to be readable, his feminine fussiness over the last Liberal statute, his fleers at "the barbarians," his patronage of goodness and nobleness "from an æsthetic point of view"; but with all his affectation Lepidus is quietly changing this old world into a new. If Oxford is to educate Englishmen, and not merely to drill them, to act as an intellectual, and not merely as a social force, it is time that she knew something and taught something of Turner and Alfred de Musset. Ten years ago we should have found no Oxford man daring enough to talk through a whole paper, as one of these gentlemen does, about the drawings in the Taylor buildings, and to talk with a certain amount of knowledge and good sense. Ten years ago it would have been hazardous in a mere author of fugitive papers to suppose such an interest in literature, in the humours of Charles Lamb, in the style of Addison, as these papers in their very form take for granted. And the result of this extension of Oxford sympathies is apparent, we think, in a new geniality and fairness of tone. Oxford has given much in the way of impulse, of energy, to England, but her impulse has been narrow, and her energy has been hard. Who does not recall the bitter, fighting, intolerant temper that marred much that was lofty and beautiful in the earlier Oxford movement; the blind party-spirit, the cliqueishness, the self-sufficiency that has so often disenchanted men of Oxford Liberalism? To men living in a little world, and never looking outside it, mole-hills become mountains, and to Oxford men Headington Hill was an Alp. We can forgive much art-gossip, much prattle over Sainte-Beuve, if it takes men out into the larger world, where they may gain a sense of proportion, and add a little sweetness to their light. Their contact with the actual life around them, however trivial may be the forms it takes, their sympathy with the actual hopes and aims of men at large, may help Oxford in the days that are to come. For whatever may be the changes that are impending, it is plain that changes must be, and that they will be changes that will set our academical education in a far closer and more practical relation to the general instruction of the country than its present system and tradition allows. Whether Oxford can adapt herself to new national requirements will depend not so much on new "Liberal statutes" as on the development of a temper in harmony with the temper of that "world without" which she has so long despised. And it is because of the promise of such a development, a promise none the less significant that its form is so light and unpretending, that we have noticed these little pages of the Oxford Spectator.

THE COUNT OF PARIS ON TRADE-UNIONS.

THE interest which is always attached to the observations of a foreigner on English institutions has been stimulated by the treatise of the Count of Paris on Trade-Unions. The disquisitions of M. Lavergne and M. Esquiros have set before the Continental mind our agricultural statistics and our national habits with an accuracy which could not have been exceeded by English writers. The same felicitous style and the same picturesque description have not been attained by the author of the present essay; but the fact that the Count of Paris has thought it worth while to compile a translation of our blue-books on Trade-Unions is a tribute to the importance of the subject in the eyes of foreigners. In fact, the work is only a compilation of Reports into which the sentiment of Unionism has been strongly infused. It is not positively unfair, for it abstains from indiscriminate panegyric of the policy of the Unions; but it certainly abstains from any but a very guarded condemnation of them, and hardly gives any attention to the complaints of the employers. The Count of Paris ignores the rights and responsibilities of capital. He forgets that on its prudent manipulation hang all the best interests of the employed. He sees nothing but its power and its extent, and the heroic resistance of those who fight or scheme against it. There is nothing in what he says very different from what the advocates of Unionism among ourselves have said all along. And the only feeling which his book excites is one of wonder that the head of the house of Orleans, and the possible future ruler of France, should publish a work which is, by implication, a vindication of the assaults of labour on the Infâme Capitaliste. At the same time it is only fair to add that his sympathies do not find expression in the violent language of the French Socialists, so that we can hardly suppose that the Prince has given this book to the world with the hope of gaining support among the socialist portion of the Parisian operatives. We must therefore regard it simply as the effusion of a benevolent mind desirous of expressing good-will towards the labouring class, and of inducing their employers to hasten that happy era when the working-man shall share all the fruits of industrial speculation without incurring any of its risks.

In such a work, of course, the evil actions of the Unions are passed over or glossed over as far as possible. Broadhead and his Sheffield co-assassins are mentioned in terms of reprobation, but their crimes are regarded as the desperate efforts of a falling trade to repair by violence the losses which it has sustained by competition. We believe we only do the Trade-Unions justice when we repeat their general disclaimer of the plea set up on behalf of their Sheffield associates. But throughout the whole book the author fails to see the bearings of the Sheffield outrages on operative associations, and it is impossible to find a passage in which he shows a conception of the enormous interests involved in the question which he treats. One would think that he shared the belief of the most reckless of the operatives that the sole relations of employer and employed are those of antagonism, and that capital is a constant quantity of which either party can, by superior strength, clutch the largest portion, and is justified in trying to clutch it. That capital is the source of all wages, that without it wages die, that it thrives only by thrift, providence, and careful watching, seems never to have occurred to him. He never asks himself the questions which force themselves on every thoughtful mind in discussions of this nature. How have the great English industries been encouraged and extended? Has it not been by the freedom of investment and disposition which capital for a length of time enjoyed? What induced men to erect mills, buy machinery, and bring artisans together from all parts of the kingdom? Was it not the knowledge that their capital would be employed in such ways as they chose, independently of all dictation and interference; and that such a share of the profits as they determined should be expended in wages? Would the same industries have been created originally, and would the same amount of successive industries have followed in their wake, if the capitalists had imagined that the proportion of wages and profits would be prescribed by the authoritative junta of an Operatives' Union? And now, when, according to the Prince's own showing, foreign manufacturers are competing successfully with our own, and when we as a nation cannot expect to extend our hold over the markets of the Continent in a degree proportionate to our former progress, does he think that it is quite immaterial whether an employer is free or not free to decide on the wages he is to pay his workmen? If he would consult any of the great manufacturers of Lyons or Mulhouse, he would find that the difference of two sous a day to each workman would make all the difference in the policy of working or closing an establishment.

These are questions which the Count of Paris does not condescend to notice, any more than do the secretaries or the members of the Unions themselves. To them the only important matter is that the men should be strong enough to carry out their own plans or whims, in their own way and at their own time. If the masons or bricklayers seize the occasion of a contract for a public building to strike for an advance of wages or for the removal of an obnoxious foreman, it is only a joke to them that the master is ruined by their inconsiderate tyranny. But, in ruining him, they are ruining their own prospects and injuring the community. In the departments of ship-building and engine-making the mischief does not end with the harm done to the masters or the workmen. A delay in executing a contract for a first-class ship, or for engines of great size and power, might involve the loss of an important export trade. A concession on the part of the contractor to the demands of the workmen might prevent a breach of the contract, but would also prevent its renewal; and thus stop an important element of national commerce. In these cases the employers would not suffer alone. They are few, but their workmen are many; and their workmen would suffer severely. These are things which the operatives never consider; but men of education and intelligence like the Count of Paris are expected to consider them. Moreover, it is not unreasonable to expect that they should consider the following contingencies. If the proposed remedial Bill of Messrs. Hughes and Harrison passes, there will be no restraint whatever on the action of the Unions. They will be virtually incorporated by Act of Parliament, and their managers will be co-ordinate powers with the employers. They will, unless strongly and systematically opposed, dictate the wages in all the trades of the kingdom. But the law which legalizes their combination will also legalize the combination of the masters. The masters will be free to unite, form a common fund, concert a common policy, organize a general lock-out, and wear out the funds and the patience of the remonstrant or resisting operatives. Such a course would be as destructive as it would be vindictive. But it would be quite as natural that the masters should like to have a hand in their own destruction as that they should submit to being destroyed by their workmen. At any rate, the contingency we mention is not at all an unlikely result of the emancipation which the Count of Paris so ardently desires for the Unionists, and it ought to have attracted his notice.

That so devoted a partisan should be staggered by the pretensions of these associations is less to be wondered at than his desperate effort to prove that they are less extravagant than they appear to be. The two functions of a Trade-Union and a Benefit Society are wholly different. It is useless to attempt to identify them. No Benefit Society could, out of such a scale of contributions as Trade-Unions receive, give the superannuation pensions and the burial payments promised even by the most flourishing of the Unions. Still less could it do this and also support its members on strike. Although he fenced with many of the questions put to him by the Commissioners, Mr. Applegarth admitted that his Union was established not so much for the purpose of aiding sick and disabled members as of enabling the strong and healthy to wage a successful contest with the masters. And the Count of Paris himself admits their rottenness as Benefit Societies, when he elaborately proves that they would be sounder than they are if they only enforced a much heavier contribution from their members. Neither is he more successful in his attempt to illustrate his plans of elevating the working-man by his examples of co-operation. We are not aware that there is any really co-operative undertaking which has succeeded in England. There are successful establishments which are called co-operative, but the term is entirely misapplied. For instance, there are the Civil Service Stores, which, for some unknown reason, have dubbed themselves co-operative. They do no manner of work. They simply buy wholesale and sell retail among themselves; and even this work is not done by the members, but by servants who are paid out of the profits of the transactions. In the same way the Rochdale Co-operative store is simply a big shop which sells both to the members and to outsiders. The Methley Collieries are a nearer approach to what is meant by co-operative works. But there the men are really paid a certain commission on profits by the proprietors. A co-operative establishment, properly speaking, is one where all the men contribute capital and work, and are paid in proportion to capital and work. The idea is a happy and a pleasing one; and it is not wonderful that it should have occurred to many persons. But it has never, so far as we know, been carried out in its integrity. We know of no copartnership of many working-men which, unsupported by any external aid, has originated with its own members, and has prospered solely by their capital, skill, and industry. We have heard of many such undertakings being suggested and initiated, but of none that have been prosecuted successfully. We heard only last year that the tailors and the bootmakers were to start each their co-operative association. They were to make the best coats, trousers, and boots, and were to sell them fifty per cent. cheaper than the West-end firms. Alas! the bright idea has never yet been realized; and those who best know the working-man say that it never will be. They dread and distrust each other more than they dread and distrust the masters. They cannot contribute to or draw on their common funds without mutual suspicion and alarm. And when it comes to be a question of unpunctuality, idleness, or breach of contract, then are felt the full effects of anarchy among men who have hitherto only known the discipline of work under the authority of a recognised master.

The Count of Paris is a young man and has to make his way in the world. He probably knows what are trumps in the future game of French politics, and his sympathy with the working-man may be as useful to his interests as it is creditable to his benevolence. But the kindness of his efforts would be substantially enhanced if he would unlearn some of his partisan predilections. If he can teach French workmen to form themselves into co-operative partnerships, and each to bring money, skill, and industry to one common fund; to pay each labourer proportionally to his contribution of money, of industry, and of skill; then will he have earned the gratitude of working-men, not only in France, but throughout Europe. But, if he only fans their already ardent passion for getting a greater share of the profits of trade, he will leave them as he finds them, dissatisfied with their lot and incapable of improving it, except by a system of tactics which presupposes that any man who has amassed capital is a thief, and therefore justly liable to be robbed. After all the fine speeches made both in France and in England by the friends of labour, the gist of the agitation remains what it was before; i.e. to put under the control of an external organization the profits acquired by years of anxious saving, plodding industry, and provident speculation. But such a control will kill all profits and all enterprise.

THE LIFTING UP OF TESTIMONIES.

SOME weeks ago, when the Scotch Education Bill was introduced into the House of Lords, we ventured to think that it might encounter comparatively little opposition, and this opinion, to judge by his first speech on the subject, was fully shared by the Duke of Argyll, the political father of the Bill. But as time goes on we begin to find that our hopes were too sanguine; and the Duke of Argyll begins to find that the office of a Scotch Cabinet Minister who has undertaken the management of a measure affecting the welfare of his countrymen is no bed of roses. In a recent speech to an audience of Scotchmen assembled to do honour to their Lord Advocate in St. James's Hall, he drew a dismal picture of the troubles he had brought upon himself. "I am always glad," he said, "to see Scotchmen, but I confess that there is one character in which they are very formidable men to meet, and that is when they come to what is called in Scotland 'the lifting up of testimonies.'" He has suffered a good deal in the last two months from this peculiar fashion of his countrymen. "The Government of India," he said, "is a mere joke to the conduct of a Scotch Education Bill." The India Office, it seems, is besieged by Scotchmen; all of them lifting up their testimonies; all of them with different testimonies on every clause; and none of their testimonies are reconcileable.

The principle involved in the Bill is the establishment of a system of national and unsectarian education based on rating, and the deputations are on the whole favourable to this. But it is on specialties and matters of detail, severally affecting the bodies which they represent, that they have mainly lifted up their testimonies. The clergy of one denomination demand that strict provision shall be made in the Bill for the religious training of the teachers, and for religious teaching in the schools. The clergy of another denomination demand that the local Committees shall have the entire control of the religious teaching. And the clergy of a third demand that Parliament shall take no cognisance whatever of religion. The ministers of the Established Church desire to keep the parish schools intact, and under their exclusive management. Those of the Free Church desire to throw the management of these schools open to all. The Roman Catholics are moving heaven and earth and the Earl of Denbigh to introduce a saving clause for the protection of their schools, some sixty in number, and to introduce a new era in which Roman Catholic schools may increase and multiply and replenish Protestant Scotland with an annual supply of young Roman Catholic proselytes. The Episcopalians are divided. Some of their bishops and clergy incline to play into Dr. Manning's hand, and throw in their lot with the Roman Catholics, while the more liberal among them, under the guidance of the Rev. Daniel Sandford of Edinburgh, give the Bill their entire approval in all essentials. In a letter from Mr. Sandford, which appeared in the Scotsman, he goes the length of stating that he would "regard the abandonment of all public grants to their schools as a very small price to pay for any system which can meet so many pressing needs, and alleviate, perhaps remove, so many terrible evils as now exist among large masses of their fellow-countrymen." It would be well if the clergy of other denominations were as reasonable as this. The schoolmasters, again, are hurrying to and fro, and are lifting up their testimonies in favour of more money, in favour of perpetual tenure of office, in favour of a large schoolmaster representation on the Central Board. The Universities have taken up the question with a vigour unusual in these academic bodies. Headed by Sir Alexander Grant, the Principal of the University of Edinburgh, an influential deputation from the governing bodies of the four Universities has come and lifted up its testimony in favour of what really appears to be the unanimous wish of the country—namely, a Scotch Board appointed by the Crown and entrusted with the entire management of the education of the country. Ordinary Scotchmen, in the meantime, unconnected with either Church or schools are looking on bewildered, watching with some interest for the disentanglement of the conflicting views and hoping that some good to their country will come out of all this agitation.

Whatever failings Scotchmen may have, they generally know what they want, and they not unfrequently get it. In the present crisis they want two things. They want, in the first place, to see established in their country a thorough system of national education. And they want, in the second place, Scotch management for their schools, distinct and separate from the management of the Committee of Council. It is unnecessary to dwell on the first of these two points. The object of the pending Bill is to establish such a system as is wanted, and the feeling of the Protestants in Scotland is in harmony with its promoters on this point. The Roman Catholics, as we have said, a body insignificant in numbers and not very influential, desire exceptional treatment for their schools. But the Government, however anxious they may be to conciliate Roman Catholic sentiment and votes, cannot yield without incurring the odium of a country that has done everything in its power to put them where they are. The rumour even of the slightest wavering in favour of denominationalism on the part of the Government would shake the allegiance of two-thirds of the Scotch members. The establishment of national education linked to no ecclesiastical system whatever may appear to us a very big mouthful to swallow; but Scotland has been accustomed to it for a couple of hundred years in an imperfect shape, and she wants to see it perfected.

The second question is much more difficult, and it was to this that the deputation from the Universities addressed themselves. They confined their remarks strictly to the educational aspect of the measure, and expressed alarm at the danger which they foresaw from the extension of the Privy Council system in Scotland. Their opinions are entitled to all respect, both from the influence of those who hold them, as representing the higher education of the country, and because they are consonant with those very generally held by all who have considered the subject. They hold that Scotch ideas upon elementary education are at variance with Privy Council ideas, and they have no confidence that their ideas will be carried out if their schools are left in the hands of the Privy Council. Elementary instruction in Scotland has always included the elements of a liberal education; in Downing Street it has included nothing but reading, writing, and arithmetic. Half of the students in the Scotch Universities get the whole of their previous education in elementary schools, while as many as seventy per cent. get part of it. In Scotland the élite of the labouring-classes have always commanded the advantages of such a training as will qualify them for the Universities, and nearly twenty per cent. of the ordinary students belong to those classes of the community who live by manual labour: the Privy Council declines to recognise any education for the labouring-classes except "the three R.'s." In Scotland there is no line of demarcation between primary and secondary education; in England a hard and fast line is drawn, and the Council Office will not pay a halfpenny for any instruction beyond the elements. In Scotland the Government grant will for the future be administered in accordance with a system of national education; in England Government money is disbursed on purely denominational principles. Such are the more important differences between England and Scotland. The Scotch people distrust the Council Office, and fear that it will disregard the peculiarities of their education. They cherish these peculiarities with a tenacity characteristic of their race, and, eager as they are to see national education established without delay, they appear almost prepared to run the risk of losing the Bill altogether rather than sacrifice the traditional character of their schools.

And, after all, they have a good deal to say for themselves. In the first place, they don't want any more money out of the Imperial purse than they would be entitled to get if they remained in connexion with the Council Office. They only want to administer it after their own peculiar fashion. They want to pay rather less money than the Council Office pays for the elements, and rather more for the higher branches. Unless this be conceded, they foresee that the higher branches will die out of their schools, and thus the traditional character of their education, by means of which the poorest peasant could receive the elements of culture, would be sacrificed. In the second place, their educational system is a thing of long standing. It is not the creation of yesterday. Something is due to antiquity, but something more to efficiency. It has done its work well in Scotland, and it only wants extension. In Scotland, since the Reformation, the theory of education has been to give the poorest and richest alike the chance of making the most of their brains. This theory has interwoven itself into the life of the country. The humblest artisan knows that he has the chance of giving his children the best education that the country affords, and if he happens to have a son gifted above his fellows, he values the possibility of seeing him rise to a high position. And this happens every day. The Scotch Universities are filled with promising men of the humblest extraction, educated in the elementary schools, and at least one distinguished college at Oxford has received no small infusion of the same good stock. And even if all do not rise, the education of those who fail is not a dead waste to the country. Far from it. They go back to the villages and country districts whence they went to college, and, perhaps unconsciously, carry with them something of the tone of mind and culture, rough though it be, which they got at college, and this gradually works its way through their families to the village community, and so throughout the country. The Scotch people value all this, and they fear that it will be sacrificed if the levelling action of the Revised Code is established in their country.

On the other hand, it is urged that Government cannot legislate differently for England and for Scotland. In England education grants are given as so much outdoor relief to the very poorest in the land. The Privy Council does not consider itself bound to pay out money for anything but the essentials of education. It does not profess to elevate the poor, and to help the abler among them to raise themselves above their fellows. It is satisfied if the taxpayers' money is given to help the mass to rise above the brutes. The present development of the Privy Council system is nearly nine years old, and it is working sufficiently well in England. Scotland contains only three millions of people, and England contains twenty. Why should the symmetrical working of the Council Office be destroyed for such a fraction of the community?

Such are the contending views, and at first sight it is not easy to decide between them. Scotland, however, is probably in the right. The distinction between primary and secondary education may be arbitrary. An education which is suitable for the labouring classes of one country may be quite different from what is suitable in another country, and two hundred years of education in Scotland may have raised the people to a level above that of a corresponding class in England. If this be so, the establishment of the Privy Council system is a backward step in Scotland, and it is hard that she should be dragged down the hill which she has climbed up with so much labour. And is there any reason, beyond a bureaucratic love of uniformity, why she should be? Is there no solution of the difficulty short of the sacrifice of the Scotch system? Two solutions suggest themselves, either of which would be satisfactory. The first (which is supported by the precedent of the Irish National Board) is the establishment of an Education Board in Scotland, in accordance with the suggestions of the deputation from the Universities, subordinate to the President of the Council, but not necessarily connected with the Education Office. Such a Board should be entrusted with the supreme control of Scotch national education, and its functions should include the training and examination of teachers, the inspection of the schools according to standards adapted to Scotch ideas, and the disbursement of the Government money. The other solution has perhaps the advantage of simplicity, and it is this. A Scotch department of the Privy Council Office might be formed, and a Scotch Code be administered in that Office, side by side with the English Code, but regulated according to standards suitable to Scotland, and according to a national, and not a denominational, system. The objections to the first scheme are mainly two—that the establishment of a new office in a new country necessarily leads to expense, and that there is a lurking jealousy of Scotch Boards, and a suspicion that the management of them is apt to be entrusted to men whose claims arise rather from political services to party than from special knowledge of the matters which they have to manage. The first of these is, in a manner, illusory. The expense of establishing a Board in Edinburgh would not be greater than that of establishing a Board in London, and the staff required in England would not be less than that required in Scotland. People, moreover, live more cheaply in Scotland than they do in England, and would be content with less; so that there might even be an economy in this respect. The second objection is perhaps more real. But might it not be obviated by publicity? Would it be without precedent to demand, as has been suggested in the case of Mr. Forster's Endowed Schools Bill, that the functionaries to be entrusted with the management of such a Board should be named in the Bill?

The objections to the second scheme are also mainly two—first, the difficulty (indeed, the impossibility) of a Board sitting in London being able to organize and keep in repair a multitude of schools in Scotland; and secondly, the great risk that a Scotch department of the Council Office would be Scotch only in name, and that in reality it would do nothing but perpetuate the old Privy Council system which is so distasteful in Scotland. The first objection might be met by the appointment of a temporary Commission like that proposed by Mr. Forster's Bill to act in Scotland and settle the schools. The second must be risked. But the risk might be diminished if the Scotch Code, or the basis of such a Code, could be incorporated in the Bill. Either of these plans, fenced round in such a manner as is here suggested, might do something towards the reconciliation of the different schemes which are to come up for discussion in the Lords on Monday week.

IRISH MONUMENTS.

THE Irish Church Bill has reached a stage which has brought up for discussion one of its clauses in which we have all along taken a special interest—that which relates to the ancient ecclesiastical buildings of Ireland. That portion of the clause which provides for the safety of those churches and other buildings which have fallen into hopeless ruin is safe for the present, after calling forth some amusing displays from members of the Opposition. Mr. Disraeli of course began with a speech of that peculiar grotesqueness which distinguishes the great votary of the Insoluble and believer in a Supreme Head of the Church. He has so little confidence in the inherent strength of the institution for which he fights, he puts his trust so wholly in chariots and horses and an arm of flesh, that he implores Parliament to step in to keep a body which he is bound to look on as a congregation of faithful men, as the pillar and ground of the truth, from sinking into the condition of a mere sect, into which he feels sure that it will fall if Parliament does not save it. A Roman Catholic on the one hand, a Protestant Dissenter on the other, would have a little more faith. Mr. Disraeli, ever on the side of the angels, seems to be so far conformed to the angelic model that he has given up faith and hope; let us trust that for the future his charity, the virtue which still abideth, will be developed so as to make up for the loss. It was perhaps a condescension for the companion of angels and Insolubles to stoop to such small matters as the ruins of Clonmacnois and Monasterboice. But so it is; Mr. Disraeli has condescended to move an amendment to the clause about national monuments, to which nobody can object, because it leaves the clause just as it was before. In clause 25 Mr. Disraeli inserts the words "to be preserved," which are certainly a verbal improvement, and also the words "not to be used as a place of worship." As the buildings spoken of are expressly defined as "not suitable for restoration as a place of public worship," one hardly sees the force of the insertion. Public worship is excluded by the nature of the case. Does Mr. Disraeli mean specially to forbid private worship? Does he mean that if a benighted Papist should kneel down all by himself in a corner of the old cathedral at Glendalough, he would have him turned out? Would he send for a Westminster verger to deal with him, as one to whose mouth the formula, "No one is allowed to pray here," is said to be familiar? Would he go a step further, and write up for the warning of superstitious devotees,

> De par le Roi. Défense à Dieu
> De faire miracle en ce lieu?

We do not suspect Mr. Disraeli of having thought of these things; we do not suppose that he has the faintest notion of the feelings with which the people of Ireland cleave to the holy places of their forefathers. What he most likely meant was to hinder Glendalough and Clonmacnois—if he ever heard of Clonmacnois—from being made into regular places of Roman Catholic worship. But no one wishes to do so with buildings which are expressly defined as not being suitable for restoration as places of public worship. The exceptional case—such cases may be found—of "a church wholly disused as a place of public worship" and yet "suitable for restoration as a place of public worship" does not seem to be provided for in the clause, neither is it provided for in Mr. Disraeli's amendment. If mass is hindered from being again said on the Rock of Cashel, it is not the small cunning of Mr. Disraeli's amendment which will hinder it.

The performance of the Conservative leader was well followed up by the minor performances of some of his henchmen. Mr. Conolly, who, it appears, is member for the county of Donegal, got really quite pathetic over the somewhat cool request that the whole of the glebe-lands should be given back again to a disestablished and disendowed Church. A measure which gives back to that disestablished body as many churches as it pleases to ask for, is, in Mr. Conolly's eyes, a measure of "extreme severity." So small a matter as all the glebe-lands in Ireland was, in Mr. Conolly's eyes, "a small and miserable thing to ask, but it was a wretched thing to be denied." If the glebe-lands, why not the tithe also? It is "painful" to Mr. Conolly to "see the institution which he venerates taken down stone by stone." But it is more than painful, it is "terrible," for Mr. Conolly to see his pastor "divested of the garden" "upon which his family has been brought up." The loss of peerages, palaces, coercive courts, might be borne, but to be cast off from the familiar gooseberry trees, from the cherished potato ground—that would be too "terrible."

Mr. Conolly performed some other remarkable gambols later in the evening. He thought—the thought is somewhat mysterious and inexplicable—"that the national monuments had been got rid of altogether some time ago." Soon after he feels so sure of it, that he challenges Mr. Fortescue to name "a single instance of a national monument." Mr. Conolly is really himself, if not a national monument, at least a national curiosity of the most striking kind. One would willingly go some way and pay one's shilling at the end to look at an Irish member who does not know what the national monuments of Ireland are. The member for the county of Donegal has never seen a Round Tower; he has never heard of one. He knows nothing of Kildare or Aghadoe; he has never sailed down the Shannon, or, if he has done so, his eyes were shut as he passed Clonmacnois; he has never even made the common cockney visit to the Seven Churches of Glendalough—the example which Mr. Fortescue, in condescension to Mr. Conolly and his like, picked out as the national monument which they were most likely to have heard of. Then Mr. Dawson, who, it appears, is member for the county of Londonderry, asks for a "schedule of such monuments." He seems to be nearly as much in the dark as his brother of Donegal, and we can only counsel him to go and study the writings of Dr. Petrie. Even Lord Claud Hamilton had read the clause with so little care that he asked whether the charge of maintenance would fall on the poor rate or the county cess, though nothing could be plainer than that the maintenance of the buildings—which maintenance, when they are once cleared out, will really cost nothing—is to be defrayed out of a portion of the revenues of the disestablished Church.

The upshot of the matter is that, as Mr. Gladstone says, the Bill will for the first time entrust to a public authority the duty of considering whether these ancient remains, when not suitable for restoration for public worship, should be maintained as national monuments. This is a great point; it is now acknowledged for the first time that the history of Ireland, or of any other part of the kingdom, and the monuments in which that history is written, can be a thing worth caring about. Even the Times condescendingly approves. "No possible exception," it says, "can be taken to this course." But the Times at once goes on with a passage in a grand style, displaying at once its characteristic dogmatism and its characteristic ignorance. "It is well known," the Times tells us, "that Ireland abounds in ruined churches, a few of which are of real archæological interest, while the greater number are chiefly valuable as conclusively dispelling the presumption that the island was at any period of its history on an equality in civilization and the arts of life with the contemporary communities of Western Europe." That is to say, the Times knows nothing about ancient Irish remains, and what it knows nothing about it naturally talks big about. To the Times, we have no doubt, all centuries are alike, and any distinctions that we might draw between the Cyclopean work of the earliest Christian times and the nondescript fifteenth-century style of Kilconnel, would seem to the Times to be altogether fanciful. No doubt many of the earliest Irish buildings are exceedingly rude; so are the few contemporary buildings of other countries. The peculiarity of Ireland is that a larger number of very early buildings exist there than in any other country. The Times probably thinks Irish buildings contemptible because they are small. The Irish tradition, like the Eastern tradition, was against the building of large churches. Where a French or English architect would have built one large church, containing several altars, an Irishman built a group of seven or more small and quite detached churches. But the beauty of detail, especially in the doorways and chancel arches of the later Romanesque date, is often fully equal to that of far larger buildings elsewhere. We are of course speaking of those small and ancient churches which come within the objects of the Bill. If we took in those ruined monastic churches with which the Bill is not concerned, it would be easy to point to numbers of churches, all small as compared with the vast minsters of England, France, or Germany, but holding a very high rank for genuine architectural character, for a noble simplicity of detail. Mr. Conolly and the Times no doubt care for none of these things. It is some comfort that the present Government is not like-minded with them.

With regard to the twelve churches which were to be retained in Protestant use, but for the maintenance of which a public provision was to be made, the Government has given way to a double pressure, Roman Catholic and Protestant. It is rather amusing that nearly everybody who has written about this matter has assumed that the twelve churches must all be cathedrals. But so many of the Irish cathedral churches are modern, and so many are ruinous, that we doubt whether twelve of their number could be found to answer the description in the Bill. And certainly such churches as those of Galway and Clonmel, as far as modern restoration has spared any part of them, are quite as worthy of being preserved as if they happened to contain episcopal thrones. But this part of the Bill is withdrawn. The Roman Catholic objection is intelligible enough, but the Protestant objection is really too unreasonable. This measure of excessive severity, sacrilege, and spoliation, this measure of internecine hostility, this painful and wretched and terrible measure, not only left to their present possessors all the ancient churches still in use which they would undertake to maintain, but undertook to maintain twelve of the finest churches for them. That the Roman Catholics should complain of such a concession to the disestablished body is in no way wonderful, but that the disestablished body itself should kick at it can only be because it is determined to kick at everything. The result, if not checked in some way, will no doubt be, as Mr. Vance and Mr. Gregory say, that the disestablished body will ask for all the finest buildings and will let them fall into ruins, so that the present dog-in-the-manger system will be continued on a greater scale and extended to a new class of buildings. Perhaps, however, it may not be too late to find some remedy. It is significant when we find the Times saying that "the vote taken affords reason to believe that the Ministry might have safely gone further, and transferred to the Roman Catholic communion some of the edifices now appertaining in unnecessary abundance to the Establishment." To end with a laugh, we will wind up with Sir Lawrence Palk:—

> There was one magnificent edifice in Ireland which had been reared by the piety and munificence of one of Ireland's richest citizens, and, if it had no other claim upon the Committee, that was sufficient. Many other churches in Ireland had been built by pious individuals; those churches could not be considered as any badge of conquest, and there could be no sentimental grievance in maintaining them.

Sir Lawrence is deeply impressive. No doubt many churches have been built in all ages by what he calls "pious individuals," and all such churches are not necessarily badges of conquest. But surely there can be no badge of conquest so marked as the retention by their present possessors of the twelve finest of the existing churches of Ireland. If Sir Lawrence Palk thinks, as it seems he does think, that St. Patrick's Cathedral was originally "reared" by a benefactor not long deceased, we can only recommend him to make such elementary studies in chronology as may teach him to distinguish the nineteenth century from the thirteenth.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

THE public will at last believe that they are in possession of a National Gallery, though not even the foundation-stone is laid of the promised new building. It would be difficult to estimate too highly the persistent efforts which have brought about this satisfactory result; not forgetting, of course, the administration of Sir Charles Eastlake, who, by very exceptional knowledge of the history and literature of Italian art, was enabled, in spite of much ignorance and prejudice in the House of Commons, to form a Gallery of which the people of England may be justly proud. For the first time the public can rightly estimate the richness of a collection which has cost the nation not less than 250,000*l*. The distribution into schools is now sufficiently chronologic to enable the student, with the aid of Mr. Wornum's Catalogue—which pretty wide experience tells us is the best in Europe—to obtain in Trafalgar Square an historic knowledge of art which half a century ago could only have been acquired at the cost of the "Grand Tour." We need not stop to say that the double space now in possession of the National Gallery is one of the best results consequent on the removal of the Royal Academy from Trafalgar Square to Burlington House. Twelve rooms opening en suite upon a floor, in one unbroken frontage of 450 feet, certainly afford the largest area yet accorded within the British dominions to the pictorial arts. Thus no fewer than 520 pictures can be seen for the first time to fair advantage. Yet any tendency to undue exultation should be at once checked by statistics which show that our English Gallery, even as thus extended, is surpassed by the Museums of Dresden, Berlin, Munich, Naples, St. Petersburg, Madrid, and of the Louvre. We shall see in the sequel that the Trustees of Trafalgar Square are not willing to be outdone. The schemes put forth, at least upon paper, show an ambition scarcely unworthy of the French Empire.

On now entering the National Gallery under arrangements which, if not faultless, at least in some good degree approach the ideal standards of students and connoisseurs, we cannot but recall the principles set forth by Sir Charles Eastlake and others when, years ago, an effort was made to supply our national deficiencies. Art, it was urged, can only be rightly understood through its historic development; its first rise, even though reaching far back into the depth of the dark ages, must be tracked out diligently, ere the student can float down safely and pleasantly upon the stream which bears on its flood beauty and truth. Accordingly a chronologic series has been mapped out, which naturally opens with the entrance-door by the somewhat repellent works of Cimabue, Margaritone, and Orcagna. Next follows in historic sequence the second room, instructive and perhaps more generally attractive than the first, devoted to rare works of Fra Filippo Lippi, Filippino Lippi, Fra Angelico, Benozzo Gozzoli, Pollajuolo, and the newly acquired pictures of Crivelli, which by their prodigious gold frames present a façade truly architectonic. We would willingly linger, but must hasten on to the third and large room, wherein Italian art reaches culmination. Here we encounter the "Lazarus" from the design of Michael Angelo, scarcely second to the "Transfiguration" of Raffaello in the Vatican, the "Bacchus and Ariadne" of Titian, which we hold to be at least equal in lustre to a famed and somewhat companion masterpiece in Madrid; and, not to mention other works, at any rate we must not forget "The Family of Darius" by Veronese, that brilliant panorama to which we were accustomed to make pilgrimage in gondola when still it remained the boast of the Pisani Palace. The ground-plan of the Gallery, here not unskilfully contrived out of entrance-hall and staircase, next conducts to two cabinets, which, from the gems they enshrine, may claim the name of "Tribunes." In the midst of a wall which within the same area has scarcely an equal in Europe, stands that lovely and spiritual picture by Perugino, hardly surpassed in Florence or Sienna, "The Virgin adoring the infant Christ." This small room comprises choice representatives of no fewer than twenty-five chief Italian painters. We devote but a line where the student must tarry for hours. Next follows Tribune number two. This cabinet, hitherto furnished in the month of May by the architectural drawings of the Academy, now falls under the dominion of Raffaello and Michael Angelo. On entering, we are greeted by the lovely "St. Catherine," and by her side hangs the "Garvagh Raffaello," acquired at the cost of 9,000*l.* But the presiding genius of the spot is Michael Angelo, who reigns here, as in life, in grand isolation; the "Entombment," an unfinished picture in tempera, painted on a single unpieced panel cut from as large a forest tree as ever grew in Italy, holds by itself one entire wall in undisputed possession. We have not space to enter upon a question likely to remain long under dispute—the genuineness or otherwise of this grand and deeply instructive composition. Baron Triqueti, writing in the Gazette des Beaux-Arts, favours its authenticity, and the German artist Cornelius, who ought to have known something of the master whom he robbed so mercilessly, declared the work "una cosa preziosa—un vero originale di Michelangelo." The picture, we recollect, used to be much talked of in art circles in Italy, and was commonly treated with some respect by painters in Rome. This "cosa preziosa," which was originally obtained among some rubbish for a small sum, has been now purchased for our Gallery at the cost of 2,000*l.*—not a large amount if the work be genuine. Persons at all conversant with the style of the great Tuscan will at once see that at all events the work must be of early date, possibly painted even while yet the artist, who lived to near ninety, was still in his teens, a pupil in the school of Domenico Ghirlandajo and a student in the Brancacci Chapel. The work bears internal evidence that the painter's manner was unsettled and still in transition; altogether it presents perplexities in the intermingling of styles which will not render Michael Angelo less of a marvel and a mystery than heretofore.

The room divided between late Italian masters and the Spanish school speaks for itself. Even the casual observer will scarcely fail to recognise, in vague generalization, and empty show in place of truth and earnestness, the signs of approaching decadence and downfall, saved, however, for a time, by strenuous naturalism. What was vital and vigorous in this epoch obtained concentration and strength in the Spanish school as here exemplified by the "Boar Hunt" and the "Nativity," by Velasquez, and the "Franciscan Monk in Prayer," by Zurbaran. The room devoted to the French school—perhaps the weakest in the Gallery—gains some sensation out of the old rivalry between Claude and Turner. Here once again, under the inevitable conditions of Turner's will, the "Sun Rising in a Mist," and "Dido Building Carthage," hang defiantly between the two great Claudes. We have never been able to see that Turner gains much by this challenge to single-handed combat. Perhaps the conclusion to be drawn is that each master may rest content in his own distinctive merits.

The large east room, wherein the Academy has held its annual dinners, never before contained pictures to compare with the magnificent display now made of Dutch and Flemish master-works. We certainly were scarcely prepared for the amazing strength obtained by the concentration of the works of Rubens and Rembrandt. Scarcely even in Munich, the stronghold of Rubens, were it possible to eclipse the "Judgment of Paris," "Peace and War," the "Brazen Serpent," the "Rape of the Sabines," including the landscape with the château of the painter himself. Perhaps Vandyke's so-called "Gevartius," probably the finest portrait in England, is one of the few pictures which may be prejudiced by the new hanging. Attention should be directed to the rare example of De Hooge recently secured in the sale of the Delessert Collection. The late Director confessed to know little of the Dutch school, and it certainly is much to be regretted that the Gallery has still to seek for examples of Mieris, Terburg, Metzu, Ostade, and that the country which may well be proud of a Landseer and a Cooper has not a single work by Paul Potter, Wouvermans, Snyders, or Karl du Jardin. We do not at all understand why these manifest deficiencies have not been long ago supplied. The German school generally is meanly represented—a state of things the more extraordinary when we recall the close relations subsisting between our ruling dynasty and the land of Dürer and Holbein. The late Prince Consort, however, is identified with some interesting examples of the less important members of the great Teutonic school. Still, it is nothing short of a reproach that of two leading masters such as Holbein and Dürer, not to enumerate others, we possess only such insignificant examples as "Portrait of a Lady," and "Bust Portrait of a Senator." Wide gaps in these directions should forthwith be filled up.

The west end of the Gallery is reserved for the English school. Thus two rooms are set apart to eighty-five chief works from the Turner Collection. The first contains early and comparatively simple and naturalistic examples; the second more advanced, fiery, and extravagant manifestations of the painter's mature and ultra manner. Altogether we cannot but feel that the whole display is rather too much of a good thing; we know of nothing in nature half so fine. Few men, and least of all Turner, can afford to be seen in weakness and decadence; and we have always thought that the artist's magnificent bequest to the nation, including more than 19,000 drawings for which there is still no hanging space, was far from an unmixed blessing. How strong and yet how weak—how sane, simple, and true, and yet how untrue, extravagant, and mad—this transcendent painter could be, becomes all but too clearly and sadly evident in the judicious selection here presented. We would rather shrink from discriminative criticism, and rest simply in the persuasion that seldom has there been given to the world more indubitable pledge of genius.

The English school holds its own fairly well in the great west room. The test to which Reynolds, Gainsborough, Constable, and Hogarth are subjected by the immediate presence of the great historic schools of the Continent is doubtless severe. Still, here as in national Exhibitions, and as recently at Leeds, British artists assert a thoroughly distinctive and independent position. The range of thought and the reach of subject may be comparatively circumscribed; also we cannot but feel that a school in comparative infancy can scarcely possess the maturity, the traditional experience and accumulative knowledge, which pertain to the good old masters of the ancient times. Still we may join Wordsworth in his Ode to Immortality, so far as to cherish the belief that heaven lies around the infancy even of art; and at all events the English school, in its youthful days, dwelt near to nature. Not only Gainsborough and Reynolds, but Wilkie, Leslie, Etty, Constable, Callcott, and Collins, are seen to advantage. Such pictures as "The Market Cart," "The Age of Innocence," "The Blind Fiddler," "Sancho Panza," "Youth on the Prow and Pleasure at the Helm," "The Cornfield," "The Wooden Bridge," and "Happy as a King"—works which awaken pleasant memories of artists who have almost lived among us—prove that the English school is able, in the presence of the great painters of past ages, to hold its own with honour. Among the somewhat comforting conclusions which may be drawn from the close proximity and sharp competition of schools, native and foreign, is that a Providence seems to preside even over art for good. We cannot but recognise in Reynolds the elevating power of Italian schools, in Wilkie and Leslie the strict tutorship of the Dutch painters, and then, when we retrace our steps to the Italian pre-Raffaellites, we learn whence, for good and yet for evil, some later phases in our English school have gained earnestness, yet angularity and grotesqueness. Thus our painters may, by comparisons for the first time now practicable, be admonished and strengthened, and the living may obtain renewal of life by contact with the dead. Certainly a Gallery thus nicely balanced in its eclecticism will miss its high purpose if it fail to teach catholicity, and to recommend universal toleration.

The National Gallery, as now recast, works so well for its immediate purpose and in its inner arrangements that we hope future changes will be equally satisfactory. A recent competition has ended in the appointment of Mr. Edward M. Barry as "architect for the New National Gallery." Accordingly, this architect received in October last from the Office of Works instructions "to prepare a design for rebuilding the National Gallery upon . . . the site of the existing Gallery with the additional ground" at the back. From data in our possession it appears that the scheme thus contemplated provides hanging space more than three times as great as that now obtained under the present arrangements. This very considerable enlargement may in its scope be better understood by means of the authentic announcement that provision is to be made for the reception of the National Portrait Gallery, the cartoons of Raffaelle, sundry loan collections, the British school still remaining at Kensington, with the addition of the remainder of the Turner bequest. The total number of feet thus required, including 2,000 for the Portrait Gallery, actually amounts to 6,200 linear feet. This forecast of the future Gallery seems sufficiently grand, yet the plan does not stop here. The Trustees state that they are of opinion that a Gallery should be provided "for the works of modern foreign painters of eminence"; also two large rooms for water-colour drawings and pencil sketches by Turner; likewise an art library and rooms for "the exhibition of drawings and sketches by both old and modern masters." Under the last head it may be interesting to know, especially in the neighbourhoods of Great Russell Street and South Kensington, that the Trafalgar Square trustees report to the House of Commons that "the collection of drawings by the old masters now kept in the British Museum should be transferred to the National Gallery. It is obvious," add these absorbent trustees, "that this is the proper place for these drawings. They illustrate the pictures, and in many cases they determine the authorship of doubtful works." The authorities are evidently fired with the ambition of making the National Gallery a second Louvre, and we can only hope that they may succeed in this their laudable desire. Yet we would observe that it is rather unfortunate that, when the House of Commons sets apart year by year a handsome sum for the purchase of pictures, and for travelling and other incidental expenses, the directorate lacks adequate energy to procure the works which the Gallery stands in need of. Doubtless it is far more easy and cheap to pen projects upon paper. The future of the Gallery will necessarily depend greatly upon the surplus left at the disposal of a Ministry pledged to the reduction of the Estimates; and very likely Mr. Lowe may some day be down upon us with another of his untoward and discreditable surprises.

THE TWO THOUSAND GUINEAS.

To the very last moment the Two Thousand was enveloped in mystery. Wild Oats, indeed, was struck out of it, as well as out of the Newmarket Stakes and the Derby as soon as his owner arrived, but no sign was made in regard to Belladrum. From his training quarters came reports day after day of the work he was doing, and the gallops he was taking; but while those who had the opportunity of seeing him declared that no horse in England could look better, the ominous hostility of the bookmakers was continued with unabated energy. Indeed, towards the close his assailants were carried away by their prejudices beyond all bounds of moderation, and attacked him with blind fury. He would not arrive at all, they said; if he did arrive, he would not start; if he started, he would not finish among the first six, but would most probably walk in—with the crowd. In fact, if ever a horse seemed utterly doomed, it was Belladrum; for though occasionally a Hermit or a Blue Gown triumphs over similarly persistent attacks, in the great majority of cases there is no hope of recovery from them. It cannot be denied also that, up to the last, those who had the management of Belladrum took no steps to arrest the angry demonstrations directed against him. He was brought by a circuitous route from Russley to Newmarket, he was smuggled on to the heath on the day of the race; he was not allowed to appear in the Birdcage, or to canter with the others, but took a preliminary gallop behind the ditch, away from the public gaze. All this caution and secresy was calculated to encourage his enemies and depress his friends, and it thus happened that when the competitors were marshalled in line and the white flag was raised, one of the best horses in England, in splendid condition and fitness, stood ready for the race, and, a mile off, dozens of vociferous speculators were scoffing and jeering at that horse, and making offers which, two minutes later, they were thankful to observe had not been taken.

We remarked that Belladrum did not come into the enclosure at the end of the Rowley mile; neither did Pretender nor Duke of Beaufort. These three were saddled elsewhere, and thus there was no opportunity of inspecting them before the race, except for those who rode down to the starting-post. Martyrdom was also saddled at the Ditch stables. Among the horses that walked about in the enclosure, were Sir Joseph Hawley's pair, Siderolite and King Cophetua; the Duke of Newcastle's pair, Tenedos and Prince Imperial; Mr. Graham's pair, The Drummer and Conrad, and Alpenstock and the Hermione colt. With the exception of The Drummer, none of this lot attracted much attention. The remaining starters were Perry Down, Typhon, Standard Bearer, Tasman, Royal Rake, Brambridge, and Neuchatel. Altogether they numbered nineteen, but the quality of the field was only moderate. Leaving Belladrum out of the question, there were two approved public performers, Pretender and Duke of Beaufort; two fair handicap horses, The Drummer and Alpenstock; and one aspirant to high honours, Martyrdom. For the rest not much could be said. Tenedos, unsound; Prince Imperial, a roarer; King Cophetua, a rogue; Siderolite, Standard Bearer, Brambridge, Neuchatel, and such like, all outclassed. An immense cavalcade of horsemen assembled at the starting-post of the Rowley mile, but there was only a slight delay before the horses were despatched. The flag fell when they were all well in line, and the history of the race is briefly this. The pace was uncommonly fast throughout; Belladrum made nearly the whole of the running, and coming down the Abingdon hill only he and Pretender were left in it. Pretender, steadily ridden by Osborne, waited till the commencement of the final ascent, where he was let out, and, coming away at his jockey's call, got Belladrum into difficulties immediately. The latter, however, struggled with great gameness, and breasted the hill in excellent style, running strongly and straightly, and not at all like a roarer. In fact, he was only cleverly defeated by half a length, after having, as we said, made the running at a terrific pace. It is said that Kenyon, who rode Belladrum, had no specific orders as to the conduct of the race. But if Belladrum was a roarer it have would been his object of course not to force the pace, but, on the contrary, to make it as slow as possible. His malady, if any, must be very slight, as he not only forced the running, but had a good struggle left in him when the pinch came at the final hill. It is probable that, if he had not been made so much use of, he would have made a much closer fight with Pretender, even if he would not have beaten him. Possibly if Kenyon had been instructed to wait, he might have won; but, as it was, he got quite near enough to confound his enemies. The faces of the great speculators who have for weeks been treating Belladrum as if he were dead and buried were fearful and wonderful to behold when the horse was seen coming down the Abingdon hill, pulling double, and apparently having the race at his mercy, and when the roar rose up from the multitude of—"Belladrum wins!" The performance showed clearly that the rumours about Belladrum's hopeless infirmities were utterly unfounded, for he not only exhibited all his old speed, but his most inveterate foe could not say that on this occasion he evinced the slightest sign of cowardice or unwillingness to struggle. We must not, however, forget the winner, who has improved much more in proportion than Pero Gomez, judging from their respective races with Duke of Beaufort, and who will undoubtedly give Sir Joseph Hawley's horse a good deal of trouble at Epsom. Pretender has grown into a splendid race-horse, and though the Newmarket people disliked his slow paces when they saw him at exercise, his action at full speed is thoroughly true, and he is evidently possessed of great stamina as well as speed, for he kept pretty close to Belladrum all the way, and, when called on in the dip, went up the hill like a lion. There was nothing near the two leaders. Perry Down, a heavy-looking colt in the French stable, was third, four lengths from Belladrum. A neck separated Perry Down from Martyrdom, who was resolutely ridden out to the finish. Tenedos was fifth, Tasman sixth, Alpenstock, Typhon, and Prince Imperial followed in the order named, Duke of Beaufort was eleventh, The Drummer thirteenth, and Baron Rothschild's representative was the absolute last. The running of Duke of Beaufort is inexplicable, and the only reason that suggests itself for his miserable performance is that he was outpaced at the start and could never get up to his horses. When he ran Pero Gomez to a neck, it will be remembered that the pace was shockingly slow, which probably accounts for the position he then occupied. Last year he could not get within reach of Belladrum's heels, and this year he fared no better. The handicap horses, The Drummer and Alpenstock, ran as handicap horses generally do when they are suddenly asked to carry 8 st. 10 lbs. Both are fair horses under light weights, The Drummer in particular being an excellent stayer, but they have not a chance in tolerable company at racing weights. Tenedos ran conspicuously enough to show that if he could have been thoroughly trained he might have had no mean chance, and the pretensions of Martyrdom were clearly overrated. The surprise of the race—next to the forward position of Belladrum—was the running into a place of Perry Down, a despised outsider, whose name we never heard mentioned; but there is little chance of anything that finished behind the two leaders beating them at Epsom, and the Derby, which a short time ago seemed to be more open than was expected, is now apparently more narrowed than ever. From the casual glimpse we obtained of Pretender, we should say that he is not so susceptible of improvement during the next month as Pero Gomez.

The general characteristics of the Two Thousand day were much the same as usual. The attendance was immense, the dust fearful, and the undergraduates from Cambridge more fearful still. If the Jockey Club would permit the use of a few water-carts, the inconveniences arising from the dust might be alleviated. At present the labours of an elderly man with two pails and an insufficient supply of water scarcely meet the exigencies of the case. If the Club also would take some active measures against the young men who strew the heath with broken glass, it would deserve our warmest gratitude. The ordinary Newmarket crowd is easily managed, and two or three policemen suffice to keep the course clear. They are business-like spectators at Newmarket, and they like to facilitate the progress of business; but once or twice a year all Cambridge breaks loose on the heath, and its presence is speedily known by the fragments of broken bottles that lie scattered about. When the history of human passions comes to be written, the passion for fracturing glass that so persistently inflames the undergraduate breast will deserve careful and special elucidation.

REVIEWS.

LECKY'S HISTORY OF MORALS.*

MR. LECKY'S History of European Morals may be looked upon as a complement to Mr. Buckle's History of Civilization. Mr. Buckle had regarded the growth of European civilization mainly as an intellectual progress. In man's increasing knowledge, and increasing power to use the faculties which enable him to extend it, he found the sufficient account of all social improvement. Of course he recognised such a thing as moral improvement; but he could find no reasonable cause for it, except in intellectual improvement. Mr. Lecky believes in another distinct and original source of the advance or deterioration of society. Closely connected as moral improvement or imperfection is with intellectual, it yet is, he holds, not simply dependent on intellectual conditions, but has roots and laws of growth of its own. Morality is something more than an intellectual result, much as it may be helped or impeded by what the intellect does; it has its own great and separate phenomena, and the moments of its success or failure are not necessarily coincident with those which mark the history of mere knowledge. European civilization requires to be regarded on its moral side, for itself, not in an aspect purely subordinate to the study of its intellectual changes. To supply what is wanting or kept out of sight in Mr. Buckle's generalizations; to recall a great and broad side of historical truth at least as important as that on which he has dwelt, and one which is absolutely necessary as the counterbalance and correction of his powerful representations; to trace in their early stages and early changes the springs and beginnings of the great ideas of duty and right which make European civilization what it is, and which mark it with its peculiar and characteristic notes as much as its conquests in the realms of knowledge; to compare the different steps and alternations of the long battle between what raises and what depresses and injures man's moral nature—this is the subject of Mr. Lecky's great attempt. For a great and remarkable attempt it is, whatever may be our judgment on its success.

Mr. Lecky begins by defining his point of view, and discussing the comparative merits, as theories of morality, of utilitarianism and of what he calls the Stoical or intuitive scheme of morals. He is quite right in doing the first; it was not necessary to do the second, and it may admit of a question whether he was wise in doing it. For Mr. Lecky's business is history, not a philosophy or system of morals; and while he is abundantly entitled to be credited with having thought out for himself his moral doctrines, the great controversies about them are hardly to be settled in an introductory chapter; nor does he seem the man to do it. Mr. Lecky's forte is his power of bringing a great number of scattered social phenomena to a focus, putting a distinct meaning on what he has brought together, and connecting these generalized appearances one with another; but in the stage beyond this, where we pass from stating broad facts to philosophizing, and where everything depends on sensitiveness to differences, and on the force which at once seizes them with precision and truth, and is able to keep a whole body of them, with all their contrasts and relations, before the attention simultaneously, he does not seem so strong. He seems to us to fail in that kind of powerful and exact handling which goes to the quick, and under which the mind feels that it has made a new and real step in disengaging and precipitating the entangled elements of a difficult subject. He is generally ingenious, but he is often loose. Thus he remarks that "more intense" pleasure is "usually obtained from the grotesque and eccentric than from the perfection of beauty"; and then in the next sentence he lets us see what he means by "intense." It turns out that he takes it for "violent"; "the pleasure derived from beauty is not violent, and is in most cases peculiarly mixed with melancholy," as in the contemplation of a lovely landscape. A writer's command over words is imperfect who says that the pleasure of a great tragedy or a great piece of music is less "intense" than that of a good farce, when he only means that it is less "violent." The sentiment that "it is probable that the American inventor of the first anæsthetic has done more for the real happiness of mankind than all the moral philosophers from Socrates to Mill," would do passably as a smart impertinence in the mouth of a fast young lady with smoking proclivities; but it is an odd remark to come from an historian of morals. We suppose that Mr Lecky generalizes from his own experience when he gives us the following quaint illustration of the undoubted truth that our æsthetic ideas are affected by association; to us the connexion of a blue blouse with "ferocity," even in a butcher's boy, much more in quiet-looking French peasants in diligences, is certainly new:—

> I suppose there are few Englishmen into whose first confused impression of France there does not enter a half instinctive feeling of repugnance, caused by the ferocious appearance of a peasantry who are all dressed like butchers.

After reading Mr. Lecky's preface, those who are intuitive moralists will probably feel that he has made some forcible and pertinent remarks on their side, and those who are utilitarians will remain utilitarians still; but neither, we take it, will think that he has brought them to the bottom of the subject. It is difficult to be satisfied with Mr. Lecky's term intuitive morality, when intuition fails completely in every respect as a test and source of virtue, except when explained, as he explains it, as the result of progressive cultivation. The cultivated eye and ear perceive intuitively the merits of Phidias, Raffaelle, or Beethoven; but it cannot be said, in any intelligible sense, that these judgments are derived from intuition. Cultivated and improved man sees at a glance the superiority and the claims of truth, honour, and purity; but to say this tells us nothing as to where he got these sentiments. Mr. Lecky is right in saying that utilitarianism fails to account for them; but we do not see that he solves the riddle. To say that all men have an idea of higher and lower within them, and of the rightful subordination of the lower to the higher, is to tell us little of the life and substance of morality. His forcible and striking pictures of moral progress show beyond doubt that "unity of tendency" in which he finally places the unity of mankind in moral sentiments. So, too, would a history of art, of painting, or of music, each great step of which marks, not the triumph of mere arbitrary fancy or taste, but of reason, good sense, and truth, capable of abundant and unanswerable justification. Yet to carry back these to any original natural powers—natural and universal, in the sense in which the functions of the eye or ear are natural—is a harder and more complicated task, involving more numerous and more obscure steps, than Mr. Lecky seems to allow for. That human morality under education certainly and distinctly moves in this or that general direction, and not in others; that time and favouring circumstances are necessary elements in its development; that it changes and grows as truly in the race as it does in the progress from the moral ideas and condition of a child to those of a man, is one thing; and of this Mr. Lecky is the able and intelligent expounder. To trace out and disentangle in human nature all the infinitely complicated roots of this growth and development, is another. But if, as it seems to us, he has not been so successful here, he has only been baffled where others have been baffled before him.

Mr. Lecky's proper subject is not philosophy, but history, and here he is more in his element. He has drawn a most impressive picture of the evolution of Christian morality, especially in its early stages, out of the civilization of the Pagan empire, of the various changes of moral type and standard, of the successive degrees of prominence or decay shown in different classes of virtues, of the proportion between different virtues in the ideal character of the time, and of their influence on one another, to be remarked in the course of this great moral recasting of society. Mr Lecky has excluded from his plan a number of important points connected with his subject—among others, the question of the real nature of Christianity as a religion; and he professedly confines his inquiry within the limits of the first eight centuries, while the necessities of his subject force him continually to follow it out of these bounds to its later and more instructive developments. A history of European morals which stops short at Charlemagne, though it really takes in, as of course it must, much of their history to the present day, betrays an imperfect plan; and Mr. Lecky's accumulation of materials, which is very great, is almost too great sometimes for him to know quite what to do with it. There is a want of concentration, of checking one broad statement by another, of keeping in the mind together two or three different views of a subject, and bringing out from them a joint and harmonized result. His learning is sometimes exuberant and ill-digested; and there are occasional marks of haste, as when he makes Euripides the author of the Eumenides (ii. 296), and talks of Clarke "following in the steps of the Stoics and of Butler" (i. 78)—of Butler, the "gentleman in Gloucestershire," and student at a Dissenting Academy, who first became known to Clarke in the character of a humble suitor for the explanation of certain metaphysical difficulties. But after all allowances made for imperfect execution, and for the great diversities of judgment which must inevitably arise on Mr. Lecky's subject, his book occupies a field which no one in England has yet attempted to master; and if he fails to satisfy us, he gives us plenty to think about.

The great and characteristic change, in Mr. Lecky's view, from the ancient to modern morality, may be described as a reversal in order of pre-eminence among the virtues. Mr. Lecky distributes the virtues into groups—the heroic, the amiable (the latter including benevolence, purity, reverence), and the intellectual virtues connected with truth. In classical times, down to those of the Pagan empire, the ideal and type of human excellence made the heroic virtues paramount. The result of Christianity in the world has been to invert this scale. The primary ones of the old world have become secondary; what were then secondary have been elevated into primary. Christianity first gave new fulness and strength to the amiable virtues, and then placed them on the height once occupied by the heroic ones. Purity foremost, benevolence next, threw into the shade, in the early ages of Christianity, the great virtues of heathen military and civil life—courage, patriotism, magnanimity; and, with more or less variation, they still keep the place they gained. Further, the course of civilization, especially in science and trade, has brought into prominence a class of virtues which the heathen world honoured, though not in the first place, but which the Church is accused of systematically and deliberately ignoring—the virtues of the intellect, veracity, honesty, fearless love of truth. The victory of Christianity in Europe has raised the standard as regards one set of virtues, those connected with humanity and the relations between the sexes; it has lowered it as regards another, those of the high heroic type of public spirit and self-sacrifice; and it has required the corrective of an antagonist and partly hostile spirit, to force it to give their due place and rank to the great moral duties connected with the exercise of the mind on the facts of the world and existence. We have gained, Mr. Lecky thinks, immeasurably in our care for human life and happiness, in gentleness and sympathy, in the domestic ideal and the refinement and conquest of the lower instincts. We have lost in as great a degree in the loftier and more severe virtues, the noble devotion to the State, the stern unselfishness of the ancient citizen and soldier. We are only beginning to estimate at its due worth the moral passion for mere truth, and to be alive to obligations which religion, as it has been hitherto regarded, has done little to foster, and has often flagrantly violated.

Generalisations like these are brilliant things to read when stated and enforced as a writer like Mr. Lecky states them. They contain in them great elements of truth. Yet the qualifications which they require are so important as to leave us with the misgiving whether, after all, as contributions to real and fruitful knowledge, they are not mental efforts all but thrown away. Doubtless there is truth in Mr. Lecky's leading position, that the scale of the virtues has been sensibly altered between ancient and modern times. There have been changes in what he calls—using, it seems to us, a bad, because equivocal, term—the "rudimentary" virtues of different times; meaning the characteristic and dominant virtue of a period, like patriotism in antiquity, or obedience in monastic times. And he dwells much on the fact that Christianity and civilization, while they have fostered the amiable and social virtues, have diminished the value and the capacity for those of which Stoicism upheld the type while the great ancients realized it; virtues which rested on the two essentials of an unselfish disinterestedness, able even to dispense with a moral ruler and a future world, and of the subjugation of the affections to the reason. Well, the Stoical ideal was very grand; and public virtue often showed itself very nobly even under the Empire. But when we are told that public virtue, with its high sternness and self-devotion, has given way, both in general estimation and in its capacities for great deeds, under the progress of modern civilization, it seems to us that Mr. Lecky's instruments for collecting the rays of truth, though they may form a neat and clear image, cut off a great deal of light. They cut off from entering into his field of view some of the grandest and loftiest political spectacles which the world has ever seen. In the civil and military history of the Italian Republics, of France, of England, of Holland, of the United States, terrible deeds have been done, and fatal mistakes committed; but the last thing that can be said is that, in comparison with antiquity, there has been any want of "public souls," or of the highest ideal of public duty. Civilization, and even religion, under certain conditions, have impaired the heroic type of virtue; it has been a common superficial fallacy to assume that they do so always; but, in an observer like Mr. Lecky, it is a grave mistake in the final result of his calculations, and one which weakens our confidence in his power of generalizing from complicated and conflicting elements, that he should bring out as an ascertained law or tendency that under civilization the virtues which demand effort and self-sacrifice are less thought of, and, when called for, are less ready to come.

Mr. Lecky does full justice to Christianity as a moral movement, though he is apparently unable to make up his mind what to think of its supernatural pretensions. What heathen morality attained to under the Empire was, he says, a very high standard of the heroic virtues in a very select class; but even in that class there was an insensibility to the social and benevolent virtues, and still more to those of purity, though this hardness was much softened down in characters like M. Aurelius and Julian; while in the multitude there was a degradation without control and without hope, going deeper and deeper down in every generation in brutality, licentiousness, vileness of feeling and deed. Wherever Christianity came from, it brought the remedy for this. With its strong leaven of charity, of purity, of fearless assertion of conviction, and with its immense sympathy for the despised and lost, it gave the impulse which began the regeneration of the world. All this is vividly and forcibly exhibited. The picture does not seem to us complete, and it wants those more subtle and delicate touches which test the insight of genius; but no one can deny its vigour. Mr. Lecky is fair in representing the results of the great moral revolution which has brought us to where we are: he seems to us harsh and inconsiderate in his judgment of the conditions under which it was made. He traces the great changes in the standard and practice of humanity. He devotes a remarkable chapter to the position of women in the ancient world and the new. He is, on the whole, full and just in his estimate of the breadth and fruitfulness of these and analogous changes. But he is impatient of the religious temper that went with them, and of the intellectual, and some of the moral, habits which it engendered; habits more or less the natural accompaniments of a religion which believes itself certain. The moral change, he quite allows, depended on religion; but the Church, he thinks, taught men to lie for religion, to persecute for religion, to run wild for religion, to think that they could know what they could not know, and to shut their eyes to what they might see, in the name of religion. The result of its training has been, besides much good, for which we ought to be thankful, much evil which is hard to be undone.

Here, again, Mr. Lecky seems to give us the truth, but not the whole truth. When commenting on the looseness of inquiry and looseness of assertion which no doubt, as he says, are to be seen in early Christian literature, as they mark the intellectual character generally of its time, a writer who is not a sceptic ought to have remembered—and remembering, to have qualified a good many of his statements—to whom the world is indebted for the idea that there is a Truth, and that it is worth working for, suffering for, dying for; to whom it owes the word "martyr." Mr. Lecky does not bear in mind his own leading doctrine, that the moral growth of mankind has different ages, as widely removed from one another as the stages of bodily development. Things that are absolutely absurd to us were inevitable once; people knew no better, and it was impossible, in the nature of things and the conditions of their age in the world's history, that they should know better. The Church had a great cause to advance—the cause of morality, as even Mr. Lecky sees; the cause of man's relationship to God, as Christians believe. And it had to do this in the face of obvious disadvantages, from the state of society, the narrowness of all possible knowledge, the still backward education and imperfect experience of the human race. It did the work; not as we should do it now, perhaps, but in the ways which seemed the natural and only practicable ways of doing it then. It was a conquest; and Mr. Lecky too summarily blames the Church spirit which is seen in the Fathers for having the necessary virtues, hard and stern, as well as great, of conquerors—of those who risk or sacrifice all for an idea or a conviction which shall benefit mankind. Its exclusiveness, its absolute positiveness, its intolerance, its zeal, its scorn, nay, its occasional unscrupulousness, it has in common with all the great movements which have affected mankind; in common with the modern spirit of reform, with Mr. Bright, Mr. Buckle, and Professor Tyndall. We may perhaps yet learn that doubt can be as intolerant of seeming or claiming to know as faith and conviction ever were of doubt. All this belongs to it as realized in human nature, under given conditions of time and development; it belongs to whatever force of intense conviction has moved and swayed man, and exacted from him the great sacrifice of self-indulgence and the present. To say that the Church had all this on a great scale is only to say that its aims and work were on a great scale, and that its fervour and resolution were in proportion to the greatness of its pretensions and the seriousness of its purpose. Mr. Lecky appreciates the magnitude of the moral change then made; but he seems to us to underrate the enormous difficulties of creating modern morality and the society which accepts it; the obstacles, in themselves and in things round them—often utterly hidden and obscure at the time, and only plain to us—in the way of those who had the heart and daring to attempt it.

To take an instance in his treatment of the history of asceticism. We have seen, from its beginning to its end, the whole course of that history. We have had experience enough to entitle us to form a judgment on the working and ultimate results of the ascetic principle; and if there is a question of it in our own time, this experience may supply weighty reasons against it. Mr. Lecky, naturally enough, thoroughly condemns it, though he does in one place seem to regret the suppression of monasteries as correctives to excessive industrialism; and he has an easy task in painting a repulsive picture of this once powerful ally of Christianity. His details of the lives and deeds of Egyptian and Syrian devotees are undeniable; and though he must be charged with greatly understating one whole side—all that in spirit and aim gave meaning and elevation to what was so extravagant and disagreeable—yet, after all, with all the admissions in its favour, the system does fairly appear extravagant and disagreeable. In our stage of moral development, and under our circumstances, it would be intolerable; but the thing to be borne in mind is that it flourished in a stage of moral development and under circumstances which were not ours. You must take men, even Egyptian monks, not only for what they are, but for what they can be; and it is a perpetual mistake in historical judgments to insist on requiring from men what it was impossible, in the nature of things, that at the time they should be. The ascetic fervour of the early and middle centuries is wrongly judged unless, with all our dislike of it in itself, we look upon it—as indeed we can see it to have been—as a first step, not perhaps in intention, yet in fact tentative; an attempt, rude and wild, to apply to life the gospel standard. When we remember what were the enormous, blind, intractable forces on the other side, in the days when it arose, of fierce, reckless, unrestrained sensuality, it seems as if nothing but such an enthusiasm, as inconsiderate and unmeasured, could balance or swing back, on a scale necessary for the progress of the world, the tremendous, ever-renewed, and accumulating pressure in favour of self-indulgence. The severity of the early Church was a rebound and strong medicine against the ruinous dissoluteness of the decaying Empire, which no remedy but a heroic one seemed able to stay. It was undeniably, in its aim and effort, a great stroke in favour of virtue and perfection. Doubtless there was dreadful waste in it—waste of character, affection, happiness, life; but it must be looked upon as a great war, the only one which could have made any impression on the world of that day; and when we think of the waste of men in monasteries, we should remember the waste of men on the other side. The monks and ascetics have perished, as soldiers and workers have perished; but what have they left behind? What have they done to print images, softened now by distance, of moral greatness, strength, height, unselfishness, on the mind of society? What would those ages have been, being what they were, and separated by impassable intervals from the possibility of what is so commonplace to us and ready to our hand—what would they have been without this direction given to their grossness and fierce temper, without those examples of fierce self-bridling, and of proportionate discipline? So asceticism taught mankind, though by extravagance and with degeneracy and failure at the end, the hard lesson of the incomparable superiority of the higher over the lower nature. We may doubt whether the greatness of free modern morality—of which part of the greatness is that it is a thing, not of a school or a choice aristocracy of feeling and mind, but popular, common, and public—could ever have been formed and fixed without passing through the terrible agony of asceticism. All these histories of monks, which lend themselves so easily to our sarcasms, and seem to us almost as disgusting as immorality itself, may be viewed in another way—as the crude, clumsy, distorted, absurd sketches of beginners, who yet have the heart and boldness to try to copy a great and difficult model. They are like the stiff, ungainly figures drawn by the early masters, of the saints and hermits themselves, which, in the hands of the later ones, come to forms of the highest nobleness and beauty. But the early steps must have been passed to reach the later perfection. All this is not, indeed, overlooked by Mr. Lecky; but he does not give it the prominence it deserves, nor remember it sufficiently in his vehement and sometimes almost feminine denunciation of the ascetics.

The same imperfect grasp of the idea of a progress, the same defective appreciation of the suitableness and proportion for one time of what another time may have utterly outgrown, marks Mr. Lecky's generalizations—often very sweeping and tronchant ones—on the intellectual character of the early and middle ages. He denounces at every turn the cast-iron decisions of theology, the intolerance of priests, the stagnation of mind under the rule of the schools. The truth is that there is a good deal too much in his book of these sneers. They come so very glibly to our tongues in these days that a writer with so great a subject before him might have been expected to guard himself against them. Flings and incidental sarcasms against philosophers and reason are justly accounted impertinent in theological writers; they are not better in philosophers against theology and divines. All indiscriminate generalization is foolish; if with an animus, unjust; if the mere repetition of a commonplace, vulgar; and it ought to be borne in mind that calling men "priests" by way of scorn or disparagement is just as grave an offence against truth, justice, and the real interests of morality as, with the same invidious purpose, calling them freethinkers and rationalists. Mr. Lecky is abundantly justified in protesting against any such views, philosophical or religious, of those early times, as represent them as ages of perfection to which all succeeding ages ought to look back for their standard and model. But when he uses the very strong words which he ordinarily does of their blind submission to authority in religion, of their hard, unreasoning and uninquiring faith, their indifference to physical knowledge, and their intellectual barrenness, besides that there is much loose over-statement of the fact, he disappoints those who look to him for a broad and fair comparative estimate of the differences of times. There is a time for everything. There is a time for construction, for building up positive beliefs for practical needs, when men take what on the whole has the recommendation and attraction of apparent truth as an inestimable treasure by which to live and work. At such times, whether they come in regard to religion, or politics, or even mechanical progress, men take foundations for granted; they are too keen about what may be realized to sift and ask questions about them; it was so just as much when a new polity like that of the United Provinces or the United States was called into existence, and a great war carried on, as when Christianity was set up as the religion of Europe. Of course, at such times of positive building up there is abundance of what seems, to cooler or unfriendly observers, unreasoning impatience of inquiry; there is plenty of intolerance; for what at a distance seems only difference of opinion seems, when near, mischievous opposition; what at a distance seems mere party variance, looks near like disloyalty and treason. The early ages were times when of all things the most impossible to those who lived in them was that keen criticism and subtle inquiry which seem to us so natural and rational. They could judge of things by broad marks; but it is simply inconceivable that they should have examined as, with our means of knowledge and long-trained habits of thought, we can examine. It seems idle to expect it of them, and harsh to complain of them for failing in what would have been in them premature and futile. It is well for us that their belief was so much stronger than their spirit of inquiry. We do not yet know what may come of that spirit in our own more experienced hands; but in those days of narrow knowledge—knowledge confined by limits then absolutely and literally impassable—it would have been like gun-cotton and electricity in the hands of a child.

Mr. Lecky further strangely overstates the stagnation of mind in those times. Mind is employed either in tracking out the knowledge of things outside it, or in examining its own thoughts and history. Its activity ought to take both directions; in the middle ages it long shrank, not without intelligible reasons, from the first; but surely the mind cannot be said to be idle when it puts forth its strength on the second. Now, though there was a vast deficiency in that hunting out and ascertaining the facts of nature and history which is so great a work in our days, there was no deficiency in that which is more properly thought—profound and patient and exact consideration of what goes on in the mind, of its efforts to know, of its materials and processes. The schoolmen have become a commonplace for sneers. But no one who ever studied any of the great ones among them could possibly say that mind in them was dormant. No one could ever say that men like Anselm or Aquinas did not treat the most difficult questions with a freedom and originality which are ordinarily supposed incompatible with their religion. In all that is of most essential consequence, not only in the exhibition of what we know, but in grasping it firmly, clearly, comprehensively, in taking in all the sides of a question, in mapping out all its ramifications, in the sheer hard work of purely intellectual action on ideas and words, they are still our unequalled masters. Most surely, if they led, in their keen and subtle speculations, into many false and useless roads, they paved the way as nothing else did, —as certainly neither ancient speculation nor Mahommedan science did—for modern philosophy. They laid out the ground and prepared a language for Spinoza, Leibnitz, and Kant. Those ancient and unwearied pioneers of real thinking deserve more respect than they always meet, from all who know that real thinking is as necessary as the actual discovery of facts, for the true and solid advancement of knowledge.

A JOURNEY ACROSS SOUTH AMERICA.*

M. MARCOY'S splendid record of a recent journey from the Pacific to the Atlantic, through the whole breadth of Peru and Brazil, is a work which must be seen in order to be appreciated. It is impossible by mere analysis or description of their contents to do justice to the two handsome, not to say sumptuous, volumes which transcend even what we are accustomed to consider the normal standard of a Parisian œuvre de luxe. Almost every page brings before the eye some illustration of the rich scenery of the tropics or some characteristic type of native physique or manners, executed in M. Riou's highest style from the writer's sketches, or engraved directly from M. Marcoy's own drawings. The letterpress, enhanced by paper of the finest tone, forms a triumph of typographical taste and skill. We would, however, by no means be understood to point to M. Marcoy's Journey across South America as simply an ornament for the drawing-room. It is no mere album of the gorgeous landscapes, or of the singular native models, of Brazil or Peru. The author, while keenly alive to all that is picturesque in nature or piquant in humanity, and gifted with the artist's power to set each and all in their most striking phases before the reader's eye, shows himself no less competent as an observer of all that appeals to the reason and arrests the thoughtful attention of the traveller. We find him careful, while delineating the bold outline or dazzling summit of the Cordillera, or catching the wild grace of the semi-savage of the Pampas, to note and generalize the geographical or geological phenomena of those varied regions, as well as to store up and reduce to system the facts, whether of observation or popular tradition, bearing upon the condition, the origin, or the history of their multiform population. The result of his ardent and philosophical pursuit of knowledge and adventure is to enrich our literature with a mass of matter imperfectly, if at all, accessible heretofore, embodied too in a form suited in a peculiar degree to attract and even fascinate every reader who is susceptible of the impressions of art.

Few countries are less known to the ordinary public than the rich regions of the Southern continent of the New World stretching from the Pacific to the Atlantic seaboard. Humboldt's bold and scientific researches have been the chief means of bringing within our reach what little we know of the physical marvels or the mine of ethnological study which those vast tracts are capable of yielding up. The historical problems which underlie the quaint traditions or the mysterious monuments of the land await much of their solution, after all that we owe to the magnificent work of Lord Kingsborough and M. Dupaix, or after all the labours of comparative philologists or students of ethnology like Blumenbach and Pritchard. Since the time when the strange and mystic civilization of the Incas struck the lively imagination of Cortes and his fellow pioneers, not much has been done to lift the veil which hides the source of that most singular of races, and to refer them by their relations of blood and speech to their proper place in the comparative genealogy of nations. We welcome, therefore, whatever means of information can be added to our slender stock, whether by the studies of philologists or by the personal observations of travellers as energetic and intelligent as the writer before us.

In no other portion of the globe perhaps is the contrast more strongly marked between the artificial habits and modes of life imported from Europe and the primitive manners of the children of the soil. In Peru, Chili, or Brazil, the traveller has only to pass the city gates to find himself in contact with Indian tribes as rude or quaint in aspect, customs, or belief as those which greeted the gaze of Cortes or Pizarro. It is chiefly with the aboriginal population that M. Marcoy seems to have felt sympathy, and it is with a feeling of relief that he passes from the flimsy conventionalities, the tasteless fashions, or the coarse orgies of the capital, to the free and picturesque life of the Pampa, and the teeming banks of the Amazon. Landing from Liverpool at Islay, the port of Arequipa, he gives us a rapid but graphic sketch of that chief city of the earthquake zone, anticipating by a year or so the terrible visitation which has since left its permanent impression upon the whole length of the South Pacific seaboard. A striking evidence of the action of this element of fear upon the popular mind is seen in the curious procession of nuestro Señor de los temblores, which forms one of our author's most dramatic pictures of Peruvian life. On Easter Monday, the great image of Our Lord of the Earthquakes makes its tour of the capital, among a frenzied throng of ten thousand struggling devotees. This lifelike ancient effigy, originally sent by Charles V. in a caravel from Cadiz, has never had its primitive colours retouched by a profane brush. The gigantic crucifix of which it forms the principal figure is made of a huge block of oak. Time, dust, the combined smoke of incense and candles, and the irreverent handling of the monks, have turned the brilliant flesh tints to a dirty red. The blood with which the idol is liberally bespattered from head to foot has assumed the hue and texture of bitumen, relieved with patches like those of a panther's coat. In place of the usual waist-cloth, a kind of petticoat of coloured silk is tied by a sash round the body, and descends to the knee. Hair of prodigious length and thickness, of a jet black, which once adorned the head of a sinner of the city, brought by unexampled orgies to an early tomb, floats from the Redeemer's temples in wild locks, blown about by the wind. This exuberant chevelure was presented to the cathedral Chapter, as an expiatory offering, by the father of this Magdalen, an intendant of police well known to the author. The strange emblem is borne upon a platform upon the shoulders of thirty cholos, ragged and shoeless Indians. Invisible springs give its members an incessantly trembling motion. Wax torches in numbers burn around it, and bunches of flowers are flung by women in its face. Thousands crowd for the honour of supporting or even touching the sacred burden. The bearers are hustled, beaten, their hair wrenched from their heads, but stoutly they battle for the privilege which is to bring them ten years' remission of sins. Other images precede the crowning glory of the day—the Holy Mother, in court dress of amazing cumbrousness and splendour, and wearing a golden crown, a gigantic ruff, and a vast jewelled fan; San Josef, bearing the insignia of his craft; San Cristoval, bearded and filleted with Assyrian pomp, carrying a lofty palm; San Benito, whom the crowd receive rather coldly, taking the reverend Abbé to have sprung in a straight line from Ham, the son of Noah. First in order is seen San Blas, the patron saint of the chief faubourg of the town, in aspect and costume a precise facsimile of the traditional Richard III. of our stage. A winged angel holds a parasol of pink silk over the saint's head. After two hours' circuit of the city the heated and panting concourse reaches once more the cathedral gates:—

> Le Christ des tremblements est resté seul dans le parvis, entouré de dix mille Indiens qui l'interpellent dans l'idiome local.—Où vas-tu? lui crie-t-on de tous côtes; reste avec nous; n'abandonne pas tes enfants! Les porteurs de la litière impriment un mouvement de gauche à droite, et vice versa, à l'image, qui semble répondre aux fidèles par une négative.—Ingrat! Dieu sans entrailles! reprend la foule en pleurant a chaudes larmes; tu vas donc nous quitter jusqu'à l'an prochain?—L'image du Christ fait un signe affirmatif.—Eh bien, va-t'-en! hurle d'une seule voix l'immense cohue. La porte centrale s'est ouverte à demi. Les porteurs de l'image vont se glisser par l'entre-bâillure, mais la foule s'attache à eux et la grande porte est fermée de nouveau. Après quelques minutes de cette étrange lutte, cette même porte se rouvre à deux battants, et la litière du Christ, poussée par un flot furieux de têtes humaines, disparait dans l'église. Le désespoir de la foule éclate alors en crescendo final, les femmes jettent des cris aigus et tiraillent leur chevelure, les hommes hurlent et déchirent leurs vêtements; les enfants, effrayés par la douleur de leurs parents, piaillent d'une façon lamentable, et les chiens, renchérissant sur le tapage, aboient avec fureur.

From Arequipa to Cuzco the traveller's route lies over the lofty passes and glaciers of the Andes, of which an impressive panorama is given by our artist. Striking near this point the head waters of the Amazon, he followed downwards the course of that mightiest of rivers to its outfall into the Atlantic. In the terrible drifts and storms of the Sierra Nevada the traveller meets with but rare and rude halting posts, such as the lonely hut we see figured at Huallata. Often his sole refuge lies in the rude but solidly-wrought tombs of the old Aymaras. The history of this early race offers an interesting, though in many respects a vague and indecisive, chapter in the ethnology of the Western continent. When the Children of the Sun came to establish themselves in Peru, they found the great Aymara race in possession of the wide plateau which extends from Lampa to the confines of the Desaguadero, comprising, under the name of Collas, the region of the Punas to the east of the Western Andes. This district, some ninety leagues in length by thirty in breadth, showed here and there temples and other monuments of an advanced civilization more or less in decay. The then existing Aymara inhabitants assigned these to a very early date, and to the Collahua race from whom they themselves claimed to have sprung. This race, which came from a distant source north of Peru, and spread over the high plateaux of the interior, left the trace of their name in the existing coast town of Callao. Together with the secret of hieroglyphic painting, they brought with them a singular cosmological legend. Before the present sun, four other luminaries in succession gave light to the firmament. The first of these suns was extinguished by an inundation, the second by an earthquake, the third by a general conflagration, and the fourth by a hurricane in which all living forms perished. Total darkness next enveloped the world for twenty-five years. In the midst of this universal night a man and a woman were created, for whose behoof the great Maker kindled the fifth sun, which had already been formed a thousand years. The system of cosmogony based upon this curious fiction was common to the Toltecs, the Cicimecs, the Nahuatlucs, the Acolhus, the Tlastlecs, and the Aztecs, who in the early centuries of our era occupied New Spain. These tribes in turn traced back their religion, their architecture, and their customs, including the peculiar method of noting dates by their Quipus or variously coloured threads, to the Olmecs and Xicalanques, two powerful races of immense antiquity. Driven out by the Incas, the Aymaras dispersed, partly towards the Pacific, where they mingled with the fish-eating tribes of the coast, partly into the vast sierras of the interior. Two hundred thousand of these aborigines are computed to survive at this day, towards the Bolivi[an] Peruvian frontier and the seven departments of Upper Peru. Th[e] great ossuary or burial plain of the Aymaras, the discovery of which M. Marcoy claims for his party, lies four leagues south-south-ea[st] of Islay, in the centre of the zone of trachytic ashes which exten[ds] from that part to the entrance of the valley of Tambo. Th[e] mummies are found in groups huddled together in their pyramid[al] tomb of rock, the knees touching the chin, and the head expose[d]. The head is flattened in the manner usual with all these tribes, an[d] this is to be depended upon as a distinctive mark of their commo[n] origin. In most of these huacas ears of maize have been disco[vered], together with traces of chicha, the popular liquor distille[d] from the same cereal, at the bottom of the rude jars of clay lying b[y] the side of the corpse. In tombs of the Incasic period, greater a[rt] of construction is apparent. Vases of terra cotta, bizarre, yet highl[y] artistic in form, are met with in abundance. The architectur[e] which is well illustrated in M. Marcoy's pages, passes from th[e] rude cyclopean layers of an early date to the regular courses o[f] squarely wrought masonry. Sketches of such temples as hav[e] survived the pillage of three centuries, as well as of the curiou[s] fortresses, sometimes circular in shape, sometimes suggestive o[f] Egyptian types of structure, give a clear idea of the stat[e] of the arts in reference to worship and warfare in the palm[y] days of the Incas. It is deeply interesting to see still facin[g] each other in the streets of Cuzco the massive but irregula[r] stonework of an age of prehistoric antiquity, and the trim bu[t] monotonous lines of the mason of to-day. To the artistic ey[e] of our traveller the vast heterogeneous group of domes an[d] spires, intersected by long straight avenues and vistas, present[s] in a quaint panorama "the old capital of Manca Capac revised corrected, and augmented, but little embellished, by Francisco Pizarro."

M. Marcoy's stay at the capital of Peru gave him an opportunity not only for the study of the geological features of the country and the varieties of its native types, but also for the pursuit of researches into the anthropology and early conditions of life belonging to those regions. His treatment of these important problems will be found deeply suggestive, as well as marked with careful and critical erudition. Are we to consider the American race autochthonic, with Morton, Blumenbach, and Pritchard, or can we hope to connect its origin with the better-known races of other continents? Our author's convictions favour the hypothesis of two fixed primordial types, both however of foreign introduction. The early geographical connexion of the two continents, or the easy passage by way of Behring's Straits, renders any amount of immigration from the East readily intelligible. Whether we call it indigenous or not, the earliest and simplest of these types exhibits unmistakeable analogies with an African variety of the Mongol type of Asia, the other a no less marked resemblance with the Irano-Arian type. In the former we trace the colonizing and stationary, in the latter the civilizing and progressive, element of the American population. Not only in their architecture and their religion, but in the physical peculiarities of their race, the earliest of these colonists betray a singular affinity with the Misraites (Children of the Sun) upon the banks of the Nile Hieroglyphics and the pictorial arts are equally seen among them, and the papyrus (maguey) is naturalized among the flats of the Amazon. In addition to the red race of the earliest age, both tradition and historic records point to a fair and bearded variety, the naumo type, of Indo-Iranian blood and speech. Quezalcoalt, the first legislator of the Aztecs, and Bochica, founder of the civilization of Cundinamarca, were both of this Oriental type. The ancient Mexican sculptures of Tenochtitlan and of Culhuacan, with those of Tiahuanacu in Upper Peru, represent bearded personages clothed in the ample and flowing robes of the people of the East. It is beyond doubt to an origin of this twofold kind, and to one in either case of a remote antiquity, rather than to a mythical Scandinavian infusion from Iceland or Greenland in the twelfth century of our era, suggested by Rafn, that we are to assign the first traces of human life upon the Western continent. Still less can we venture to defer the period to so recent a date as that of the discovery of North America by Reif, son of Eric the Red, 1005 A.D., which has been connected by some theorists with the appearance of the first Inca (1040-42). We may pass by the still bolder hypothesis which recognises in the long and flowing robes of the Mexican sculptures the surplice or albe of missionary priests despatched from Ireland. With the reign of the Incas we come to the confines of trustworthy history, but to the present day the presence of the twofold elements we have spoken of is manifest upon the surface of the popular life. The facts collected by M. Marcoy form valuable materials for the ethnologist, while the student of comparative philology will find much to interest and instruct him in the lists of words brought together by him from the principal Indian dialects. These features of the book confer upon it a scientific value far beyond that which we are wont to attach to narratives of travel. We close M. Marcoy's handsome volumes with a grateful sense of what he has been at so much pains and cost to set before the public. Our regret at parting with him is enhanced by the reflection that the bulk and expense of the work must restrict to a comparatively scanty number of readers a full share of the intellectual and artistic treat which we have so much enjoyed ourselves.

SKEAT'S MŒSO-GOTHIC GLOSSARY.*

WE are really obliged to Mr. Skeat for his Glossary. It is, as he says, high time that Englishmen should have some handy philological books in their own tongue, instead of having to go for everything to their High-Dutch cousins. And in the case of Ulfilas—more truly Wulfila—and his Gothic tongue, a duty is more especially laid upon us, for he is our bone and our flesh. We do not mean to be in the least disrespectful to any of our good friends and kinsfolk, but we have a certain satisfaction, perhaps a narrow and unworthy satisfaction, but still a satisfaction, in being able to lay our hands on the oldest Teutonic book in the world, and to say, "This is not High-Dutch but Low." Our good friends must excuse us; between High-Dutch and Danish and French and the language of the Times, our poor old Nether speech is driven up into such holes and corners, we are so hemmed in and persecuted in the nineteenth century, that we must be allowed to shelter ourselves in our own refuge in the fourth. To speak our mind freely, we have never quite forgiven Professor Müller for sticking a piece of Wulfila at the very beginning of his German classics. To be sure he fenced his Wulfila about with such an array of typographical palisades that he could at once plead "Not Guilty" if he were charged with maintaining or insinuating that Wulfila was a High-Dutchman. All that we complain of is that Wulfila was in the book at all. Why Wulfila rather than Ælfred or Shakspeare? The truth is that our High-Dutch friends, even when too learned and honest formally to claim the oldest bit of Dutch in the world, still shrink from formally surrendering it. Let us hear both Professor Muller and Mr. Skeat:—

"The language of Ulfilas, the Gothic, belongs, through its phonetic structure, to the Low-German class, but in its grammar it is, with few exceptions, far more primitive than the Anglo-Saxon of Beowulf, or the Old High-German of Charlemagne. These few exceptions, however, are very important, for they show that it would be grammatically, and therefore historically, impossible to derive either Anglo-Saxon, or High-German, or both, from Gothic. . . . It is because Gothic is the only one of these parallel dialects that can be traced back to the fourth century, whereas the others disappear from our sight in the seventh, that it has been mistaken by some for the original source of all Teutonic speech." This is well said; at the same time it must not be lost sight of that Anglo-Saxon and Mœso-Gothic being both of a Low-German type, it would be a far less error to look upon Mœso-Gothic as an older form of Anglo-Saxon than of High-German; and we may certainly go as far as to say this—that to study Mœso-Gothic is, practically, more the business of Englishmen than of any one else—excepting perhaps the Dutch—and further, that though Mœso-Gothic is not strictly an older form of Anglo Saxon, it comes sufficiently near to it to render a study of it peculiarly interesting and instructive to us, and a thing by no means to be neglected.

Professor Muller speaks more philosophically and more accurately than Mr. Skeat, but we doubt whether any readers would go away from his words with so full a conviction as they ought to have of the near kindred between Gothic and English. It is, in a sense, as Mr. Skeat says, a greater error to derive modern German from Gothic than to derive English from Gothic. But the real error is to talk about deriving at all. Gothic is the oldest surviving member of the family, and it is plain that it belongs to our branch of the family and not to the other branch. Gothic is the oldest specimen of the class of languages to which English belongs; but it is not the parent of English. To look on it as the parent of English is the same sort of mistake as to look on Sanscrit as the parent of Greek or Gothic or any other Aryan speech.

There is certainly a charm about the Gospels of Wulfila which attaches to no other human writing. Here is the oldest piece of Teutonic speech in the world, the first Teutonic book ever written, the first member of the long series which takes in the whole literature of Germany, England, Holland, and Scandinavia down to our own time. It is the beginning of the literature of modern Europe. And it is something more; it is the national Bible of a national Church, of the oldest of national Churches; it is the first attempt to clothe Scripture in a form neither Semitic, Greek, nor Latin—the oldest memorial of the first European Church beyond the limits of the Roman Empire. And it is something to turn over the pages of the Gothic Gospels and to see how near to our own tongue the venerable speech of the fourth century really is. The greater part of the vocabulary consists of words in every-day English use, only disguised from modern eyes by the elaborate system of inflexions which we have gradually lost. English stands to Gothic in much the same relation in which a pollarded tree stands to one which keeps its branches. The body is the same, but in the one case the body is almost hidden by luxuriant vegetation. A scholarly knowledge of Gothic, like a scholarly knowledge of any other language, can of course be got only by carefully learning the grammar. But any one who has any philological tact, though he has never learned the Gothic grammar, will recognise many Gothic words with ease. Give him the translation, and he will recognise nearly every word; he will see ὅτι τοῦτο ἐκεῖνο. And, though this is not a scholarlike knowledge of a language, it is a process which for many purposes is not useless. Let us take two verses:—

Sah at*gagg*ands du Peilatau, bath this leikis Iaisuis. Thanuh Peilatus us*laubida giban* thata leik. Jah nimands thata leik Josef. Bivand ita *sabana hrainj*amma. Jah *galag*ida ita in *niuj*amma seinamma hlaiva, that ei us*hulo*da ana staina, jah faur*valv*jands *staina mikil*amma daurons this hlaivis galaith.

The roots of the nouns and verbs, which we have put in italics, are all to be traced in English of one stage or another, several of them in the modern tongue. Hardly any of the roots have quite vanished. "Leik," for instance, "a dead body," is familiar enough both in Old-English and in modern High-Dutch, and as long as such words as "lich-gate" and "lich-way" remain, we cannot say that it is quite gone in modern English. The long tail of the dative in -amma conceals such familiar words as "new" and "mickle," and though "*hrainj*amma" recalls no modern English adjective, yet it recalls the High-Dutch "rein," and we can hardly doubt that the "rhines" of Somersetshire and Monmouthshire are cognate. "Staina," "daurons," and the verb "giban" need no interpreter, nor does "nimands" to any one who goes an inch or two beyond the English of his own day. "Bivand" is simply "wound"; and in the Nether-Dutch forms "uslaubida," "galagida," "faurvalvjands," "ushulida," and "galaith" a little thought shows roots cognate with leave, lay, wallow, hollow, and lead. Many of these a person of any quickness, however ignorant of Gothic grammar, will see for himself, and for the rest a glimpse at Mr. Skeat's Glossary will enable him to say τοῦτο ἐκεῖνο. "Hlaiv" in the sense of tomb is worth noting. It is the Old-English "hlæw," which survives only in a few proper names ending in low, law, and various corrupt forms. It clearly means a barrow or tump, and points to the older Teutonic, though certainly not exclusively Teutonic, form of burial.

The verses which we chose at random did very well to illustrate the sort of shapes in which the roots with which we are familiar in modern German and English appear in this ancient kindred tongue. But they do not perhaps illustrate so much as some others how much closer is the kindred which Gothic has with English than that which it has with German. To be sure "thata" and "daurons" are plainly "that" and "door," not "das" and "thur"; but then the preposition "us" agrees with "aus," not with "out"; "giban" and "uslaubida" have a superficial look of agreeing with German rather than English, while in "galaith" we get a form different from either. But take Mr. Skeat's Glossary, and look through all the words beginning with D and T, and it is easy to see how complete is the agreement of the Gothic with the English as against the High-Dutch. Mr. Skeat remarks, with a certain simplicity, that Gothic comes still nearer to Dutch in the narrower sense, the Low-Dutch of Holland, than it does to English. That is simply because the event of 1066 and its remote consequences did not extend to Holland. And in some points it is clear that English has, after all, kept nearer to Gothic than the continental Low-Dutch has. For instance, we keep the th which our kinsfolk in Holland have lost.

This suggests the question as to the spelling of the Gothic language, about which no two people seem to agree. For instance, our extract was from a foreign edition of Wulfila, whose spelling does not always agree with Mr. Skeat's. Wulfila used an alphabet of his own, which was pretty much the Greek alphabet with some additions and omissions to suit the Gothic tongue. H and F are transferred from Latin, and there is a letter which different editions express by kw, kv, and q. The difficulty is that q by itself makes no sound at all, while qu does not differ from kw. There is a letter for W, which German and Scandinavian editors turn into v, and another for hw or wh, as we now so oddly write it. The Greek θ and English þ is expressed by a letter more like ψ than anything else, while the letter for hw is very like a capital Θ. Now how are these letters to be expressed in printing a Gothic book? Where the difference is simply a slight difference in form from the Roman letters, one would of course print in Roman. Most people have given up that exquisite absurdity of printing Old-English in what is called "Saxon" type, that is, an imitation of the current hand of the time. It would be as reasonable to print Shakspeare in a type reproducing the crabbed handwriting of his day. But, though few people now take the trouble to print p and o for w and d, yet most people, everybody as far as we know, in printing an Old-English text, keep þ and ð, because they are distinct letters. How then with these Gothic letters? It becomes more serious when there are several than when they are only one or two. Some print th, some þ. But then we have no letter for hw, none for kw, unless we call on q to do duty by himself without his satellite u. Mr. Skeat prints everything in Roman letters; so does the old Stockholm edition of 1681. But then Stiernhielm and Mr. Skeat do not always express everything by the same letters, and, if you once get beyond the actual letters of the text, you get into theories of pronunciation which are much more dangerous things. The point is a knotty one, and as we are not called on to edit Wulfila, we do not feel bound to make up our minds.

Mr. Skeat gives us an Introduction, the Glossary itself, a Grammar, and a list of English words whose history is illustrated by Gothic. In the Introduction he gives us a species of the Skeireins, an explanation of the Gospel of Saint John, attributed to Wulfila himself, with an interlinear English translation. This shows the wonderful nearness of the two tongues, and yet we are constantly thinking that, by restoring to us a few obsolete and provincial words, Mr. Skeat might have made his English nearer still. Or sometimes ordinary English would have done. Why should "*atlif*node" be translated "remained," instead of by some form of the cognate leave, left? "Galesun" Mr. Skeat translates "they collected." Why not use the local word lease, the same as to lean, which is of course the same as the Gothic lisan? Indeed, on turning to the Glossary, we find that Mr. Skeat gives lease as the English form. The "inuh kwinons jah barna" is "without women and bairns." The bairns are all right, but we bar the women. Why not give us the English cognate of "kwinons?" "Quean" is, we believe, still quite respectable in Scotland, and, if Mr. Skeat chooses to spell it "queen," we do not object.

Our Gothic literature consists of the imperfect translation of the Scriptures, the fragments of the Commentary, a fragment of a calendar spoken of, and two legal documents found at Naples and at Arezzo. These last belong of course to the days of Gothic rule in Italy, and supply a further reason for getting rid of the needless prefix of "Mœso," which Mr. Skeat still retains. We wish he would drop it and say simply "Gothic," as many, perhaps most, scholars do. We might wish also that he would not talk about "Anglo-Saxon," but we were mollified by not meeting a single Semi-Saxon throughout the book. This is the more praiseworthy, as Mr. Skeat has worked under the Ealdormanship of Mr. Furnivall. One bit we specially recommend to Professor Kingsley. Mr. Skeat is speaking of the fragmentary kalendar:—

"Thiuda is the A.-S. þeód," and in "Frithareikeis" we discern the genitive of our own Frithric, Abbot of Saint Albans, not of a High-Dutch Friedrich. Had the Professor seen this little fragment of a calendar, we might have lost that charming joke of an ultra-Gothic Dietrich, out of which scholars and historians got so many refreshing chuckles.

FOUND DEAD.*

THE author of this novel has certainly succeeded in two respects. He has found a good name for his book, and an interesting incident to form its central point. Upon the name we need say little, inasmuch as every reader may judge for himself whether it appeals to his curiosity. We confess that to our minds it raises a pleasant anticipation of awful mysteries to be unravelled, which, often as the device has been tried before, is still attractive. Far from us and our friends be that frigid philosophy which does not derive some satisfaction from a simple story of a wicked murder, and a providential discovery of the criminal. The incident to which the name refers is still more distinctly commendable. We need hardly say that it is a murder of a peculiarly diabolical kind, and of considerable merit in point of artistic design. The great authority upon this subject, who has touched it in only too cursory a manner, has laid down as fundamental principles that the victim should be a good man, that he should not be a sick person, "who is usually quite unable to bear it," and that he should not be a public character. The reason alleged in this last case is that, such a personage as the Pope, for example, being regarded by most people as a mere abstraction not invested with the concrete attributes of humanity, his murder would produce no shock to our sympathies. This consideration strikes us as disputable; but it is true that a murder which in fact or in the intention of the artist comes under the head of tyrannicide, or political crime, should be placed in a rather different category in art, if not in morals. It raises a slighter presumption of personal malignity, and does not alarm our sense of security; and murders, like accidents, generally are felt in proportion as we can put ourselves in imagination in the place of the victims. Without pursuing this investigation further, we may say that the murdered man in Found Dead answers excellently to these demands of the critic. He is a fine, healthy, generous country squire, beloved by all who know him, and idolized by an affectionate wife and daughter. The author begins by a well-conceived chapter in which this admirable gentleman is introduced to us taking leave of his family, to ride to a distant meet of the hounds; and he has thus sufficient time to engage our sympathies before the announcement that he was found dead by the roadside, with a terrible wound in the back of his head. So far the murder is well imagined, and the story properly planned to ensure its due effect: but there is another critical principle about murder which imposes a more difficult task upon the inventor. Every murder supplies a riddle, and the neatness with which the answer fits all the facts of the case is an important element in the merit of the conception. Very few novelists have the strength of mind to deal with that numerous class of murders—very much the majority, if we may trust recent statistics—which confute the proverb by never coming out. Yet those are probably the most impressive to the imagination. The great critic to whom we have referred speaks of a porter, with a bag of money, who was murdered in broad daylight as he turned out of the High Street in Edinburgh, and yet no discovery was ever made of the criminal. Such a deed gives us an uncomfortable thrill such as that which pervaded all London at a recent disappearance—until it was too satisfactorily explained. And it may be said that there are few murders in which we do not suffer from a certain disappointment when we compare the prosaic reality with the vague horrors upon which we have allowed ourselves to dwell before the facts were cleared up.

Having got our dead squire by the side of the road, we fear that the circumstantial chain of evidence, which of course will have to be discovered with a view to the regular unmasking of the villain, may reveal a clumsy performance. This, however, is perhaps the strongest part of Found Dead. The murder is carried out with a neatness and a simplicity which leaves little to be desired. The assassin, happening to know of the squire's intention to ride along a solitary road at an early hour of the morning, goes down by a train to one station, walks across country to another, and on his road meets his victim, and kills him at one blow with a life-preserver. Various circumstances make it very natural to suppose that the murderer was all this time in bed at his lodgings in London. There is none of that cumbrous preparation, or those weak attempts to manufacture exculpatory evidence, which frequently lead to the detection of murderers in real life. Assuming that the circumstances had taken place as related, we have little doubt that there would have been great excitement, that much fault would have been found with the police, and that, after long discussions in the newspapers, the matter would finally have sunk to rest, with very little chance of discovery. Of course a novelist, having all the circumstances at command, is able to arrange various chances, so as to fall in happily with the successful execution of the plot. Granting, as is certainly possible, that they had occurred, as is actually related, we confess that we do not see how detectives could have got upon the scent to any better purpose than is usually the case in real life. Indeed, the author is a little embarrassed by the completeness of his own design; for, having to bring about the final detection of the villain, he is compelled to provide a bit of evidence to turn up at the fatal moment. Accordingly, by a strange accident, the squire is made to hand over to his intending murderer a rare coin, and the murderer, having become actual instead of prospective, is insane enough to keep the coin about him. This is a somewhat violent device; but perhaps we may admit that the cleverest performers sometimes commit gross oversights in murder, as well as in other fine arts.

The central incident of Found Dead deserves, therefore, considerable commendation. The evil deed is done with great neatness and despatch, and is no discredit to the clever villain who is supposed to bring it about. But we cannot say so much for the plot of which it forms the nucleus. The author, having taken a good idea to work from, seems to have become too impatient to do it proper justice. The general nature of the design reminds us of Caleb Williams, if indeed it was not borrowed from that admirable novel. As Williams discovers the secret crime of his apparently virtuous master, so Mr. Steen finds out that his protector, a distinguished painter named Blissett, has been guilty of this outrageous murder. Blissett, like Falkland, tries to crush his dependent by accusing him of attempt at theft; and there is a chance of a similar situation, in which oppressed virtue shall ultimately turn upon triumphant vice, and unmask it to the satisfaction of poetic justice. The author, however, fails to bring out the intrinsic force of the situation as conceived by Godwin. A poor lad, gradually discovering the crime committed by his benefactor, is in a position which affords plenty of opportunities for working upon our feelings; but there never was a champion of virtue who had so pleasant a time of it as Mr. Steen. The story is made gratuitously absurd in order to reward him, quite unnecessarily, with a rich wife. The painter begins by murdering his brother in the morning. In the afternoon he goes to a Refuge, and, selecting a handsome lad, tells him that he will pay him a good salary in order to serve as a model, and will afterwards promote him to be his secretary. This remarkable proceeding is taken as a matter of course by all persons concerned, who appear to think it quite natural for a painter to engage models permanently at handsome salaries, and to pension them off as secretaries. Next morning the news of the murder arrives, and it now appears that the main object of the painter is to send this boy from the Refuge to represent him at his brother's house, where he fears that his feelings may be too much for him. Accordingly Mr. Steen changes his Refuge for a comfortable life in a country house, where the daughter of the murdered man proceeds straightway to fall in love with him, the widow to welcome him as a son, and the virtuous clergyman to educate him and promise to send him to college. On the discovery of the murder, the villain dies in a fury, according to the convenient practice of villains in fictions; the estate which had come to him reverts to the daughter of the murdered man; and she immediately marries the lad from the Refuge and lives very happily ever afterwards. The moral apparently is, that it is an excellent thing for handsome boys in Refuges to make the acquaintance of murderers in high life, inasmuch as by discovering their crimes they may probably have a chance of making their own fortunes. But it is certainly unlucky for the effect of the story that this gratuitous improbability should be dragged into it, merely, so far as we can see, to secure the traditional end of the British novel.

It is perhaps lucky on the whole for critics that when they find fault with the construction of a story they are not bound to show how the fault might have been remedied; but we will venture to suggest that one of two modes would have been preferable to that actually adopted. The author might, for example, have taken the bold line which would probably have been followed by Balzac. We can imagine how he would have dealt with a gentleman of good birth and position who had succeeded in murdering his brother by a thoroughly ingenious plan. The villain would have triumphed in the end, after a desperate struggle on the part of the innocent people; he would have crushed their impotent attempts to unmask his treachery, and would have laid the foundation of a princely fortune and general worldly success, and been dismissed to enjoy the fruits of his misdeeds. His would-be denouncer would probably have been reduced to live upon his charity. This plan, we may admit, would not only be immoral, but would disgust the British public. But a more orthodox plot would have been equally exciting, founded on the Caleb Williams precedent. The boy from the Refuge should have gradually wormed himself into his master's secret; the disadvantages of his poverty and want of knowledge should have been fully brought out: and for a time villany should have been apparently successful, and the wretched lad reduced to choose between good conscience and a gaol. Finally, there should have been a grand catastrophe; and the virtuous youth rewarded by some position appropriate to his talents and station in the world. We should then have sympathized with him throughout, and followed his fortunes with interest. As it is, vice gets all the kicks, and virtue all the halfpence throughout the book, and we are never exposed to a moment of serious anxiety. The execution of this plan would undoubtedly have demanded a more careful development of the plot, and a closer realism in making out the characters. We can only regret that the author was too hasty, or had too little confidence in himself to make the best use of a really promising plot. The story is not bad as it is, but we are left with an uncomfortable feeling that justice has not been done to its capabilities.

D'AUBIGNÉ'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION.*

AT the rate at which M. D'Aubigné is publishing his History of the Reformation, it seems hardly probable that he will live to complete it. After an interval of exactly three years since the publication of the fourth volume of this second series, a fifth volume has just made its appearance, in which we have two years of the English and two of the Swiss Reformation. The publication has lasted over so long a period that scarcely any of our readers will remember its commencement. It may therefore be well to mention that the first series of five volumes related to the Lutheran Reformation, and brought the history down to the date of the Confession of Augsburg, 1530; and that the second, which is entitled the "Reformation in the Time of Calvin," is intended to include the period intervening between that date and the epoch which marks "the triumph of the Reformation in various parts of Europe." This latter point, the author modestly admits, is not easy to fix, owing to its varying according to locality.

However, in his entire ignorance of what is before him, M. D'Aubigné imagines that one or two volumes will complete what he has to say. And undoubtedly, if he bestows no more research on the remainder of his work than is exhibited in the volume now before us, it will be a matter of extremely small importance whether the publication is compressed into one or two volumes, or expanded, as we should have ourselves thought likely, into ten or twelve more. We will confine our remarks to the first half of the volume, which treats of English affairs, though much of our accusation against the author applies with equal force to the latter part, which is devoted to Calvinism as exhibited at Geneva and Ferrara. M. D'Aubigné has managed to acquire a considerable name and reputation amongst Protestants, and especially in this country is he looked up to as a kind of coryphæus of Evangelical orthodoxy. This position was perhaps not very difficult to reach. What was requisite for the purpose was to possess a little more knowledge and a little more intellectual power than the rest of the adherents of that school. To attain and to keep this position it is of course absolutely necessary to make a dichotomy of religious opinions in general. The two phases of thought are represented by the Pope and the Gospel respectively. And our author has in this volume used this kind of logical division as freely as in his preceding publications; but he is puzzled and terribly disconcerted at the recent appearances of a revival of Popery in this country, and he thinks that the present state of England, and the unprecedented excesses in which some Anglican ministers have indulged, necessitate for this land, so dear to the friends of truth and liberty, a faithful history of the Reformation.

Whether M. D'Aubigné's volume merits this designation may be judged of by what we are going to allege. And, first, we observe that our author observes no distinction in the references he makes to previous writers. Foxe, Burnet, and Strype are quoted as if they were of equal authority with the State Papers published by authority of the Government or with the originals in the Cotton Library, which, as far as we can make out, appear to be referred to through the medium of Mr. Froude's History of the reign of Henry VIII., though he has not, in this as in his preceding volume†, made the ridiculous mistake of supposing that (B), which stands for the name of a press, means book. Other references to the Chapter House, &c. speak for themselves, as they show not only that M. D'Aubigné has not consulted the originals, but that he is not even acquainted with the fact that long before he began to write his volume these repositories ceased to exist, and that all their contents have been transferred to what is now called the Public Record Office.

The history, speaking generally, consists of a detailed account in modern language of Foxe's stories of the detection of the imposture of the Nun of Kent, and the death of Sir Thomas More, an elaborate panegyric of Anne Boleyn's love of the gospel, and an account of the capture and death of the great Reformer of England. Our readers will scarcely guess who this person is, so we hasten to inform them that this is the designation of William Tyndale, the translator of the Scriptures. According to our author the field is the world and the seed is the Word, and Tyndale was the great instrument of sowing the seed. The instant M. D'Aubigné travels out of the beaten ground of anecdotes selected from Foxe he plunges into inextricable confusion. Those who are but slightly acquainted with the history of the period will find themselves introduced to names they have never heard of. And though the historian will easily guess who is meant by the author, in spite of his absurd mistakes, we may be permitted to observe that the object of such a book is not to enable those who are well read in history to offer their criticisms, but to explain historical facts for the edification of those who are as yet ignorant of them. We are quite unable to account for some of his blunders. We select a few. At p. 242 we are told that Bale was Archbishop of York in 1553. Now we cannot help thinking that, as the author obtained his quotations from manuscript at second-hand, so, in the case of printed books, the references must have been furnished him from England in the same fashion. He refers to the select works of Bale which (of course in a very select form indeed) were published by the Parker Society, and, as they may probably be purchased anywhere for about eighteenpence, the author might have procured a copy for his own reference, and have learned that Bale was Bishop of Ossory. Undoubtedly the editor of that volume would not have forgotten the fact of the translation of the Bishop of Ossory to York. Whether such translation was due to the merits of that most scurrilous of all the Reformers we shall not stop to inquire. It is enough for our present purpose that in point of fact it never took place, though it is exactly stated, and the date 1553 assigned to the event, by our author. At p. 144 Parker is spoken of as a Professor, we suppose this means a Fellow, of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; and again, at p. 153, the author tells us that a Dominican friar, named Hilderly, succeeded Fisher in the see of Rochester. This means Hilsey, a Reformer whose name we should have thought was tolerably well known, who could always be calculated upon by the King and by the Archbishop, and sided with the latter in the matter of the Six Articles, probably being fettered by a wife in the same way as his ecclesiastical superior was.

Another person unknown to history who figures in M. D'Aubigné's pages is one Archdeacon Hare. As there was no ecclesiastic who answers to that name and designation in the sixteenth century, nor, as far as we know, till the nineteenth, we are driven to conjecture that the author means Heath, subsequently Archbishop of York. Fortunately the conjecture is easy of verification; for the author inserts his name between that of Fox, Bishop of Hereford, and those of Barnes and Mont, who, as is well known, were sent on an embassy to the Lutherans in the winter of 1535. Lastly, we will warn the readers of this volume that the religious house of Belleval, which may puzzle them, means Beauvale; and that Bryon, in these pages, does not always mean the French admiral of that name, but sometimes stands for Sir Francis Bryan or Brian, a cousin of Anne Boleyn, a person who was known by the sobriquet of the Vicar of Hell.

Our author ought to have been especially in his own element in this volume of his history, which details the final separation of Henry from the Pope, but of course he is not satisfied with a state of things which, as he himself sees, does but substitute a lay Pope in place of the Bishop of Rome. And he is obliged to make the best of a condition which after all is temporary, and must wait for its full development for the reign of Edward VI. He has no temptation, therefore, to gloss over the conduct and character of Henry, which he estimates fairly enough. He is tender, however, towards the delinquencies of Cranmer, which he does not attempt to conceal; evidently thinking that much may be condoned to so eminent a propagator of the doctrines of the Reformation. We must, however, assign to M. D'Aubigné the praise of impartiality in his description of the infamous persecution of the monks of the Charter House in London by the King. He has in this instance not been afraid to take his account from the Historia Martyrum Angliæ, the narrative of which, he observes, bears a character of truth though it may be suspected of some partiality as resting on the testimony of a Carthusian. His description of the conduct of the monks shows that he can appreciate firmness, even though exhibited in supporting the Papal against the Royal Supremacy. In his account of the "Suppression of the Monasteries" he is less fair, owing partly to ignorance of the real state of the Religious houses, and partly to an inveterate prejudice against such establishments, which will scarcely allow to be wrung from him the admission that "there is a pleasure in believing that, behind those walls, which hid so much corruption, there were some elect who loved God."

In his estimate of the character of Cranmer M. D'Aubigné is, after all, more just than most English writers have been. It is almost incredible that Protestant authorities should have closed their eyes as they have done to the delinquencies of the Archbishop. After granting that Cranmer's opposition to the monasteries was entirely conscientious, and that he had no view to ingratiate himself with the King in the part he took in these matters, what account is to be given of his asking for the Grey Friars monastery at Canterbury for his niece's husband Thomas Cobham, or of his placing his brother in the post of Archdeacon of Canterbury by a simoniacal process, and many other similar transactions? But even where we find that M. D'Aubigné has a faint glimmering of light as to motives, his extraordinary ignorance of all documentary evidence, even when such evidence has been printed, leads him into the most absurd mistakes. Any one who has seen even a few of the original resignations of the monasteries must know that there was one form drawn up, which, with certain changes, adapted to the use of different orders of monks and friars, was proffered for the signatures of the abbot or prior and his brethren; yet our author can quote such expressions as the following without detecting, what the very phraseology shows, that they are imposed by an external authority. Thus:—

> Assuredly the perfection of Christian life does not consist in wearing a grey frock, in disguising ourselves in strange fashion, in ducking and becking, and in wearing a girdle full of knots?

This, which is simply a specimen of the form of resignation of all the Franciscan houses, is spoken of as the voice of truth which was heard from a small number of monasteries. And in like manner the resignation of St. Andrew's, Northampton, which happens to be printed at length in Collyer's Records as a specimen of a different class, is treated as if it had been drawn up of their own accord by the Prior, Sub-prior, and Brethren of the house; whilst the two suppressions of the lesser and the larger houses are lumped together in the indiscriminate remark, that the suppression of the monasteries, begun in 1535, was continued in 1538, and brought to a conclusion in 1539 by an Act of Parliament.

In other matters, M. D'Aubigné's method is to take for granted that the Protestant side and its partisans are almost always in the right, and that there is little or nothing to be alleged in defence of those who maintained the opposite hypothesis. Thus the guilt of Anne Boleyn of the crime for which she was beheaded must be admitted to be at least doubtful; but our author, without any show of argument, takes for granted that she was innocent. One who had done such essential service in severing England from the Papal yoke could not be supposed to fall so low as that, though it appears that she did not come up to the standard of Evangelical piety; and our author is of opinion that even her position as the wife of Henry VIII. may have hindered her from advancing in the path of a Christian life, and that her conduct may possibly, by its levity, have justified the remonstrances of her chaplain, Hugh Latimer. Anne's innocence of course necessitates an apology for Cranmer's duplicity, inasmuch as, knowing her to be innocent, he made no effort to save her, but acted precisely as Henry bade him. M. D'Aubigné does not deny the facts of the case, but considers that there are extenuating circumstances; "it was not only the Queen's fate that made the prelate uneasy, but also the future of the Reformation." He afterwards candidly admits that these circumstances are really no extenuation, and that, as regards the King, Cranmer had formed for himself a false conscience which led him into deceitful ways. When the author has read what he thinks enough of English history to enable him to write the annals of the last ten years of Henry's reign, we do not despair of his finding out that the false conscience pursued Cranmer from the first moment of his accepting his archbishopric to the last hour of Henry's life. At present we can only wonder how the author can quote Anne Boleyn's words, "Oh, if God permitted me to have my bishops (meaning Cranmer and Latimer), they would plead to the King for me," and then place side by side with them Cranmer's perfidious letter to the King, without seeing that his conduct in this affair alone is enough to destroy the Archbishop's character for ordinary honesty and uprightness.

Whilst we are on the subject of quotations, we must express our surprise and regret that, though they are always placed in inverted commas, they scarcely ever represent the originals. This is not owing to their having been reproduced from a French translation, as the expressions in some cases are such as no translator would have guessed at, but indicate a slovenly habit of mind in the writer. Fortunately, in the case of Anne Boleyn's letter from the Tower M. D'Aubigné has departed from his usual custom, and given it in its exact words. We say fortunately, for it will enable almost any unprejudiced English reader to judge that Anne never was its composer, the style of writing being far above anything that she could have reached. It is extremely pathetic, and has been pronounced by Sir Henry Ellis, with a slight exaggeration, one of the finest compositions in the English language.

The death of Anne Boleyn and its details occupy a more prominent place than they deserve in so brief a narrative as M. D'Aubigné's, yet he has given us no hint of explanation as to the mysterious confession which Cranmer was ordered to wring from her, and upon which he pronounced the marriage between her and Henry to be null and void. There cannot be the least doubt that the so-called confession was the acknowledgment of the connexion between her husband and her sister, which Cranmer had once elaborately proved to be no bar to the marriage, and about which he had now to eat his own words. But M. D'Aubigné appears never to have heard of the scandal about Mary Boleyn, which is now placed beyond any reasonable doubt.

Our readers will want no apology for our taking no notice of the last half of this volume. We think we have made it sufficiently clear that M. D'Aubigné has no claim to be regarded as an historian at all, and that his special prejudices totally unfit him for writing the history of the Reformation.

DR. MERIVALE'S HOMER'S ILIAD.*

THERE has never been wanting a supply of advocates for the ballad measure as an apt medium of Homeric translation. Elizabethan Chapman, notwithstanding his quips and conceits, left proof of what it might become in the hands of a poet who could restrain himself; and, though Maginn did but play with the Odyssey, and Mr. Gladstone's one book of the Iliad is but an earnest of what he might do, Professor Blackie's uneven and unequal version has done something in later years to re-assert the claims of this metre, which is recommended by its Homeric length of line. Against it, we know, much is said. Mr. Matthew Arnold condemns it in his own airy and "superior" fashion. "Homer's manner and movement," so he told his Oxford audiences, "are always noble and powerful; the ballad manner and movement are often either jaunty or smart, so not noble; or jog-trot and humdrum, so not powerful." And a weightier and more practical authority, Professor Conington, in prefacing his continuation of Worsley's Spenserian Iliad, takes exception to the fourteen-syllable verse as in general too long to match an Homeric hexameter, and points to Chapman's Iliad in proof of his dictum. "The early ballad poetry," too, he considers, "is too brief and occasional to supply a model for the translation of a long and organized poem." It seems to us that Dr. Merivale's ballad-metre Iliad, though not vindicated by a word of preface, disposes of these objections, and maintains a position the sole weakness of which in time past has been defect or misdirection of skill in the workman, not any failure of capacity in the position itself.

Let us meet Mr. Conington's objections first. If, from the nature of the case, we must admit the lack of precedent for a poem of Iliadic length in our early ballad poetry, it were surely hard that this should be held to bar success when a modern writer contrives to adapt this measure to a long and sustained flight, without sacrifice of continuity and coherence, and with a creditable retention of the spirit and power of the original. The rhapsodical theory about the Iliad assuredly favours the application of a measure which was, in the early days of our literature, in vogue among a kindred class of minstrels; and we submit that, if this application is successfully made, commendation is due to the artist who, without a complete model, moulds a whole translation on the balladic principle. As to the excess of length in a fourteen-syllable line over a Greek hexameter, whereas ten syllables of English may often, as Mr. Conington remarks, express as much as fifteen or sixteen of Greek, we at once admit it, and so we suppose would Dr. Merivale, for, to meet this inequality, he provides a not infrequent half-line of eight syllables, in some cases repeated twice or thrice consecutively, to redress this excess, and make the English pace conform to the Greek. And this provision enables him to reduce to the narrowest limits that introduction of extraneous matter to which the fourteen-syllable measure operates, through its roominess, as a strong temptation—a temptation which we noticed in Professor Blackie's version, and to which, without some such resource as these half-lines, it would be hard to avoid yielding. But it may be asked, what is the effect of this process on the general character of the translation? We answer that it relieves it of monotony without loss of power or spirit; it quickens the speed of the translator where the action requires it, and this without incurring the imputation of jauntiness on the one hand, or of jog-trot on the other. To a certain extent uniformity of line and rhythm is otherwise broken—namely, by frequent resort to middle and sectional rhymes; but the variety we have referred to has a twofold effect—it equalizes the matter of the copy with that of the original, and adds life and freshness to particular parts of the translation. And herein Dr. Merivale has achieved a marked success, for that which has been flung in the teeth of two-thirds of his predecessors, whatever their metre—the addition of extraneous matter—he is thus enabled to avoid; while by the act of doing so he removes the tedium which would inevitably accompany an endless sequence of unvarying lines of the same make, fashion, and jointing.

Two passages out of many may suffice to show the improved management of metre which Dr. Merivale brings to his task. The first is from the early part of the Twelfth Book, a passage telling, by anticipation, the manner of the destruction of the Greek rampart [των πάντων . . . καλλίρροον ὕδωρ, xii. 24–33]:—

> The mouths of all together Phœbus Apollo blent,
> And nine days long against the wall their floods impetuous sent;
> And rained great Jove incessant, the sooner low to lay
> The ramparts on the gulphy strand;
> And he, the Shaker of the land,
> Stood first, the trident in his hand, and scour'd the stones away,
> And piles, the strong foundation the Greeks with toil had placed;
> And by fast-flowing Hellespont made level all and waste.
> So when the wall was wasted and levell'd evermore,
> With sands aheap he smother'd deep the broad unwrinkled shore,
> And bade the rivers roll again where smooth they sloped before.

Few will deny that life and reality characterize this version of an average bit of Homeric description, or that these features are due, not to foreign aid, but to skilful handling of a well-chosen native metre; which serves equally well the purpose of grander flights, as will be seen from the subjoined extract from the same book—one of the finest similes in the Iliad [xii. 277–89, ὡς τώ γε . . . δρώμειν]:—

* Homer's Iliad. In English Rhymed Verse. By Charles Merivale, B.D., D.C.L., Chaplain to the Speaker, &c. 2 vols. London: Strahan & Co. 1869.

> So in the front loud-shouting urged these the Greeks alway;
> And now as clouds of fluttering snow fall thick some wintry day,
> When Jove, high lord of counsel, is stirred his storms to shower,
> And let men see how dire they be, his shafts of sleety stour;
> He lays the winds and ceaseless pours down, and shrouded deep > Vanish the peaks of lofty hills, and crests of headland steep:
> And on rich leas of clover, and men's fat tilth he pours;
> Nor less on all the hoary seas, the narrow bays and shores:
> But still the wave unyielding his ancient realm defends;
> While all things else lie over-roll'd
> In mighty fleeces, fold on fold, when Jove in power descends:
> So thick from Greeks and Trojans fell stones on either side:
> The Trojans at the Grecians throw;
> The Greeks return'd; the tumult grew; and roar'd the rampart wide.

The only approach to addition here is simply a case of translation in the spirit rather than in the letter. In verse 285 κῦμα δέ μιν προσπλάζον ἐρύκεται represents the wave rolling up, to keep the snow from covering water as well as land. The translator's mode of expressing this is as true as it is forcible. A word or so in these extracts will have shown that Dr. Merivale resorts, where he sees fit, to the old English words found in our early ballads and in Spenser's poetry. The fitness of these in the present instance it would be hard to controvert, especially as such archaism is confined to nouns, verbs, and epithets, and stops short of such forms as "withouten," "muchel," and the like, which have been justly objected to in one or two recent versions. As far as we have examined, the use of archaic and obsolete words by the present translator is regulated by sound judgment, nor do any such words find a place which have not the warranty, if we seek it, of Wright and Halliwell. The only exception we should make would be to the admixture of such words from the Latin as "auxiliar," several times used for ἐπίρροθος, in the same translation with unmistakeable old English words, as "worm," for "serpent," and the like. With the difficulty of Homeric proper names Dr. Merivale has wrestled successfully, that is to say, if he ever felt them to be a difficulty. Our impression is that his metre has helped to diminish, if not obviate, any such awkwardness. Parts of the catalogue of the ships are here turned with signal faithfulness, yet without conveying any idea that names of places or heroes have been twisted or tortured into unnatural shapes; and we can conceive that many who have heretofore skipped these enumerations in the Greek and the English will be surprised to find in them, by the light of the present version, stray gems of descriptive poetry, such as the following, from Book II., 747–55:—

> And Guneus next from Cyphus led twenty barks and two;
> The Enianes with him came,
> And the Perrhæbians, known to fame, valiant to dare and do.
> And they who perch their dwellings on hoar Dodona's hill:
> And who by Titaresus' banks their pleasant acres till.
> Loves Titaresus ever his rushing waves to fling
> Into Peneus, but in vain assails his silver spring.
> Peneus' stream he may not soil,
> But on his surface floats like oil,
> For he deriveth from the floods
> Of Styx, the dreadful Oath of Gods.

Such critics as for fault-finding's sake might rejoice to spy a crevice in the joints of Dr. Merivale's harness as concerns scholarship, will have poor sport enough in this field. As one would expect, he is conversant with the best commentaries, and rarely, if ever, fails to give the most generally accepted rendering of a hard passage, and to give it distinctly and unambiguously. The resort of vagueness he leaves to inferior workmen. Here and there, perhaps, in the course of a huge and arduous task, he has made an omission; such a one, for example, as we notice in a simile of the Eighteenth Book, where Achilles is likened to a beacon-fire announcing help from over the sea to some beleaguered island-city. It occurs at vv. 207–14 (ὡς δ' ὅτε καπνὸς . . . αἰθέρ' ἵκανεν):—

> As from some island-city far off ascends to heaven
> Broad wreath of smoke, when all day long, before her, foes have striven,
> And through the day her people have strongly braved the fight;
> But, lo! with setting of the sun their beacon-fires they light,
> And bright from pitch and pine-wood shoots splendour through the air,
> For signal to their friends afar to haste and help to bear;—
> So from thy front, Achilles, shot radiance to the sky.

Here, to our mind, the essential fact conveyed by the Greek, that the islanders look to the sea for succour, is not brought out, although there is no mistake about it in the line:— > αἴ κέν πως σὺν νηυσὶν ἀρῆς ἀλκτῆρες ἵκωνται.

Turning to Professor Conington, we find not only this feature, but the force of ἐπήτριμοι, two lines above, more distinctly preserved:—

> Then with the fall of night
> Gleam beacons in long file, and the great light
> Darts flaring up, for neighbour tribes to view,
> If so it may their succouring barks invite.

Thus a comparison of the two rectifies a casual omission, if omission it be, and not rather the result of the translator's determination to leave the idea suggested by σὺν νηυσὶν to be suggested by the context. But it is seldom in the translation before us that we detect even this trifling amount of inexactness; while, in those passages which are most familiar in the original to every Greek scholar, a perusal of these ballad-rhymes calls up word for word to recollection.

It may be asked, are they as "noble" as they are "neat"? Here comes in Mr. Matthew Arnold's causa belli against the ballad-metre. We have looked keenly into those passages which in unskilful hands might be a pitfall to betray translators into bathos or other kindred dangers, without finding any failure of dignity in this version. The cutting up of the victims, the description of Vulcan in the First Book, that of Thersites in the Second, the death of Cebriones in the Sixteenth, and some of those homely similes scattered up and down the Iliad which require no little skill in a translator to keep them from descending to the region of commonplace—all these are so handled by Dr. Merivale that one feels sure he regards Homer as the august and unapproachable artist he was in pre-sceptical days, an artist whom it would be literary treason to misrepresent by triviality of tone and level. The speeches of Hector and Andromache in the Sixth Book, the laments of Priam, Hecuba, and Andromache after Hector's death, the interview between Priam and Achilles—as rendered in this version—are specimens of sustained dignity; and, as regards curious and quaint expressions such as crop up in Homer, and in old times provoked such fertile fancies as Chapman's to "improve" him into grotesqueness (e.g. λάινον ἕσσο χιτῶνα in Il. iii. 57), the translation before us invariably consults propriety of diction by keeping close to the original. One sample of the average elevation of language is as good as another; so we content ourselves with citing a few lines from the speech of Chryses to the chiefs in the First Book, as a passage which the merest tyro will recall. Old stagers will appreciate the variety thrown into the metre, not less than the sustained faithfulness of the translator (Il. i. 93–99):—

> Lo! then the peerless prophet took heart and boldly cried:—
> "Recks not the god of vows forsworn or sacrifice denied,
> For the insult to his servant affronted he complains,
> For the maid the King will not restore, for the ransom he disdains:
> For these things the Far-darter sends woes and yet will send;
> Nor will he stay the pestilence nor cruel fates forfend,
> Till the child unbought, unransom'd, to her sire be given again;
> And to himself a hecatomb at Chrysa's shrine be slain."

They will also discern in Dr. Merivale's version a laudable hesitation to go with the "march of intellect" in adopting those Grecized forms of the names of gods and goddesses with which modern translators torture our ears. In this version Jove, Venus, Vulcan, and Neptune come back to us, as in our youth, before our simplicity had been astonished by the presentment of Zeus, Aphrodite, Hephaistos, and Poseidon in English characters. We welcome this tacit protest against what is sometimes apt to become a piggish and puny exactness of literal reproduction. For these and other merits we should be disposed to advocate a free-trade in versions of Homer, and to rank Dr. Merivale's ballad Iliad high in the front rank, alongside of Lord Derby and Conington's continuation of Worsley's Iliad.

It were unfair to pass without notice the dedicatory English couplets prefixed to this work, both because such an omission would rob other scholars' wives of the confession, here breathed by an eloquent mouthpiece of the scholar tribe (Μουσάων κάπνιον στόμα), of full appreciation for their self-denial and self-adaptation to the exigencies of a "lettered life," and also because the tender tone and playful realism of these verses assert a right to a place in future "Lyræ Elegantiarum," beside the well-known lines to Winifreda, "Away! let nought to love displeasing," and other similar tributes. Dr Merivale repeats his compliment in Latin elegiacs; but his skill in this is nothing new; his true and touching contribution to such poetry of the heart as only English home-happiness can inspire is far more precious and praiseworthy than any achievement of classical scholarship:—

> To thee, who bending o'er my table's rim,
> Hast marked these measures flow, these pages brim;
> Who, linked for ever to a lettered life,
> Hast drawn the dubious lot of scholar's wife;
> Kept hush around my desk, nor grudged me still
> The long, dull, ceaseless rustling of my quill;
> Content to guide the house, the child to teach,
> And hail my fitful interludes of speech;
> Or bid the bald disjointed tale rehearse;
> Or drink harsh numbers mellowing into verse;
> Who still mid cares sedate, in sorrows brave,
> Hast for me borne the light, and with me shared the grave:
> And grown from soft to strong, from fair to sage,
> Flower of my youth, and jewel of my age:—
> To thee these lays I bring with joy, with pride,— > Sure of thy suffrage, if of none beside.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. EDMOND LE BLANT is one of the most distinguished epigraphists of the present day. Following in the footsteps of Aringhi, Zell, Mommsen, De Rossi, and Lepsius, he has collected and published in two handsome volumes all the Christian inscriptions which are still scattered throughout France, or which have found shelter in museums and libraries from the destroying influences of time and weather. But the quartos to which we refer cannot, from their costly character, obtain an extensive circulation; and the many useful rules which they contain for the deciphering, classification, and interpretation of epigraphic monuments are scattered over several hundred closely-printed pages, where they cannot be conveniently studied. M. Le Blant has therefore done well to publish in a separate form * the principal directions which students should know when they endeavour to interpret the mutilated débris of ancient sepulchral architecture. His Manuel d'Épigraphie chrétienne sums up, so to say, the conclusions drawn from the data which the Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule sup-phy. It is a handbook admirably suited to those who enter upon the study of archæology, and we need scarcely remark that the annals of the early Church must be ascertained quite as much by reference to the ruins of temples, sarcophagi, and the like, as by the perusal of the Acta Sanctorum and the early liturgies. M. Le Blant has given a number of illustrations of the rules he lays down, his notes are both copious and accurate, and the volume is completed by an alphabetical list of works on the subject of Christian inscriptions.

The History of Louis XV.* undertaken some years ago by M. Jobez has now reached the fifth volume, and the author brings us to the conclusion of the peace between Prussia and Austria, in February, 1763. He deals not only with political events, but with the progress of literature and its influence upon the destinies of France. At no epoch in French history was the power of the pen greater, and almost every work quoted by M. Jobez was a kind of manifesto launched by the philosophes against the Church and the Government. It would be as absurd to write the annals of the eighteenth century in France without at least mentioning the Contrat social or Mirabeau's Ami des Hommes, as if the historian were to leave out the battle of Rosbach or the affair of Closterseven. M. Jobez has understood this, and the references which he gives at the end of his volume show that the information he so industriously collects is derived from other sources besides those generally consulted. We find from the preface that the author is not on the best terms with the Papal See; in fact, his History of Louis XV. has had the honour of being condemned by the Congregation of the Index. We own that this does not astonish us. Although M. Jobez generously takes the part of the Jesuits, as, for instance, when the French Parliaments expelled them from France on the most futile of all pretences, yet he has the misfortune to speak favourably of the wretched Protestants, and to denounce the Secretary of State, Saint Florentin, who maintained in all their rigour the iniquitous decree of 1685 and the declarations of 1686 and 1698. Such enlightened views with respect to freedom of conscience cannot yet be tolerated at Rome.

In close connexion with the history of the eighteenth century we would name here M. de Lescure's Nouveaux Mémoires du Maréchal de Richelieu.† At a time when it was the fashion to reserve for grands seigneurs a few seats at the Académie Française, the gay and gallant marshal was asked whether he would condescend to become one of "the forty immortals." His answer proved that Richelieu, if careless of all the rules of spelling, had at all events a fair share of common sense. "A seat at the Académie," he exclaimed; "cela m'irait comme une bage (bague) à un chat"—"It would fit me just as a ring would fit a cat." With such anti-literary tastes, it was not likely that Richelieu would ever condescend to write his memoirs, and moreover he was too much of a gentleman to hand down to posterity what would have been a chronique scandaleuse comprising many of the beauties who graced the Court of Versailles. In fact, Richelieu did not leave behind him any autobiography, and M. de Lescure has the frankness to acknowledge this in the preface to the amusing book now before us. The Mémoires in question are merely a compilation, the materials of which have been borrowed from various quarters, and worked up into a kind of narrative which, published originally as a series of feuilletons in the Constitutionnel, is half a novel and half a history. When we say that the present duodecimo treats of Richelieu's youthful days, we shall have prepared the reader to expect adventures of a character far from edifying. The Mémoires du Maréchal de Richelieu have been apparently written for the purpose of amusing Paris idlers accustomed to sensational novels, and rather pleased at the notion that for once in their lives they are, as they fancy, reading history.

M. de Beauchesne's touching book on the unfortunate Louis XVII. has long since become justly popular, and the present volumes, describing the life of Madame Elisabeth ‡, will, we doubt not, enjoy equal success. They are written from the same point of view, and the impression they produce, although sad in the extreme, results merely from the plain statement of facts. M. de Beauchesne's introduction points out very clearly the difference between the trial of the Queen and that of her sister-in-law. In the case of Marie-Antoinette some forms of justice were at least observed; in that of Madame Élisabeth no witness was called, no written evidence was adduced. She perished a victim to the fury of the Revolutionists, and Robespierre himself, if we may believe our author, said plainly that he tried in vain to rescue her from "that wretch, Collot d'Herbois." Written with M. de Beauchesne's usual care, illustrated by portraits, facsimiles, notes, and documents of every kind, this valuable work claims and deserves an important place amongst the numerous publications lately issued on the history of the French Revolution.

Two noteworthy books on classical literature have just been published by Messrs. Hachette; the one is a new edition of the Iliad, and the other a collection of essays delivered in a separate form at various times by M. Patin, Senior Lecturer at the Sorbonne, and a member of the French Academy. The subject which M. Patin has selected for his lectures is Latin poetry.* Since the year 1832 he has taken up his quarters, so to speak, in that pleasant region, and is now familiar with every nook and corner of it. Besides discoursing to his pupils about the beauties of Virgil, Lucretius, and Horace, he addresses himself frequently to another section of the studious public, and the pages of the Journal des Savants are enriched with brilliant and learned articles in which the professor enters upon critical details which would be out of place in the lecture-room. Hence the twofold division of the work we are now speaking of. The first part contains a series of inaugural discourses, and deals with generalities; the second is devoted to disquisitions on the older Latin poets, such as Ennius, Lucilius, Pacuvius, Attius, &c. M. Patin gives numerous quotations from the authors on whom he comments, and his notes are extremely rich in references to the chief critics, both ancient and modern, who have preceded him. The scanty remains which time has handed down to us of the Roman tragedy are not so well known as they ought to be, and scholars are too apt to neglect a form of literature which must nevertheless have had some influence in Rome, and which so consummate a judge as Cicero could admire. Our author acknowledges that he was originally inclined to depreciate the Roman tragic poets, but a closer study of the subject led him to alter his opinion, and the result has been some of the most interesting chapters in the Études sur la Poésie latine.

M. Alexis Pierron's Iliad † will occupy a distinguished place amongst the best monuments of French scholarship. It is admirably executed, and satisfactorily proves that enthusiasm for Greek literature has not yet died out on the other side of the Channel. In an introduction M. Pierron discusses in detail every point connected with Homeric criticism. The early recensions and commentaries, the labours of Alexandrine annotators, the manuscript texts and first printed editions, receive their due share of notice; a separate chapter is taken up by the discoveries of Villoison; another treats of Wolf and of Heyne; then comes a review of various modern works on Homer; and finally, M. Pierron gives us his own conclusions, together with an account of the plan he has thought it best to adopt. Lehrs and Villoison are his two great guides; the De Aristarchi Studiis of the former has, he says, cleared a hundred difficulties, and it is to Lehrs that he is further indebted for a reference to many treasures buried in the notes of Villoison. M. Pierron's Iliad is to consist of two volumes. The first embraces Books I.-XII.; the second will give us, besides the remaining part of the text, a number of useful appendices, including Wolf's prefaces and prolegomena, an article on Zoïlus, one on the early recensions of the Homeric poems, &c.

The unfortunate Mexican campaign has already formed the subject of many books, written from every point of view and in every variety of style. We have had political treatises, narratives of adventures, biographies of the Emperor Maximilian, pseudo-memoirs apparently copied out of Bulwer's novels, and sensational volumes of so extraordinary a character that the wonder is how the writers ever believed that they would find readers to credit them. Under the title of Queretaro ‡, Lieutenant Hans, an officer of the Imperial Artillery, publishes an account of the final efforts made by Maximilian's gallant soldiers. It is easy to guess the line adopted by an author who inscribes his work to the Empress Charlotte; therefore he has judged well in concluding his volume by quoting, in confirmation of his views, the opinions of another writer, a Mexican journalist, who cannot be supposed to be prejudiced in favour of European intervention.

The treachery of Maximilian's betrayers reminds Lieutenant Hans of the fatal days of Napoleon I.'s reign, when generals weary of constant warfare, and courtiers dreading the effects of the Emperor's unbridled ambition, were stealthily plotting against him in favour of the Bourbons. The story of this terrible catastrophe will be found in the twenty-seventh volume of a Correspondence § which is rapidly drawing to a close. Now it is the Prefect of Geneva who is upbraided for having abandoned his post at the hour of danger, and left one of the bulwarks of France open to the enemy; now, again, Talleyrand is described as "the greatest enemy of our house since fortune has begun to forsake it." The last portion of the volume takes us to the island of Elba, and contains all the correspondence relative to the Emperor's residence in his little principality. The history of the Hundred Days will probably occupy one volume more, and thus complete a work which, notwithstanding its many imperfections and omissions, must be regarded as a valuable recueil of documents on the First French Empire.

General Cluseret writes‖ from a prison at Sainte-Pélagie, whither his liberal ideas, rather freely expressed, have led him. It is not astonishing that, thus circumstanced, he should look at all things in a pessimist light. We are, he thinks, in the midst of a social dissolution. The people, the prolétaires who have so steadily and so perseveringly toiled for the aristocracy and for the bourgeoisie, begin at length to discover that it is high time they should work for themselves. General Cluseret, as a soldier, wishes to reform that branch of the service to which he belongs, and the plan he proposes is the substitution of a militia in the place of those standing armies which absorb all the productive forces of nations, whilst they serve as a perpetual threat to peaceful neighbours, and as a tool for ambitious politicians.

M. Mézières * thinks that in appreciating the state of French society, at the present time especially, we should be on our guard against exaggeration. There will always be plenty of morose critics who seriously believe that we are a great deal worse than the generations which were before us, and who foretell the speedy ruin of all things. And yet it is better to err on the side of Alceste than on that of Philinte; for there are certainly amongst us plenty of evils which ought to be removed. M. Mézières has not ventured beyond the proportions of a small brochure, but he has managed to say some very judicious things on the condition of the rural population, the workmen, the bourgeoisie, the aristocracy, and the ladies. As regards the fair sex, it is amusing to see how our author begins by praising them, in order to have the right of lecturing them afterwards. No one is more elegant, dresses better, is more fascinating, &c., than your true Parisienne, but her education wants solidity, and she seeks accomplishments for her daughters rather than substantial culture. It is the same argument as that recently developed by the Bishop of Orleans; but M. Mézières takes a less severe tone than the prelate, and confines himself to generalities. In an appendix he remarks on the public discussions which have lately been held in Paris; organized in the name of freedom, these meetings were really the exponents of the worst of all despotisms, that exercised by the mob. The image of a National Convention still dazzles a number of Utopian declaimers, who believe that the best form of government is the concentration of all powers in the hands of delegates appointed by the nation.

We do not wonder that, seeing the subversive tendencies of our democratic Socialists, many persons should prefer order and quiet, even if purchased at the cost of individual freedom. Such is the conclusion which may be considered as the sum of M. Emmanuel Domenech's Quand j'étais journaliste.† This satire is clever enough, but the task of proving that French journalism has its faults, and that journalists are not always very consistent, is an easy one. M. Domenech also turns into ridicule the coalition made by the Republicans, the Orleanists, and the Legitimists against the Imperial Government, forgetting that, had it not been for a similar coalition, that Government would have met with some serious difficulties in permanently establishing itself. M. Domenech writes from too prejudiced a point of view to claim the confidence of his readers.

Notwithstanding the faults which almost uniformly characterize M. Arsène Houssaye's works—affectation, mannerism, marivaudage carried to excess—the volume he has just published is a valuable contribution to the life of Leonardo da Vinci.‡ Apropos of the Italian painter, our author describes very correctly the artistic grandeur of the middle ages, and contends that the Renaissance should not be regarded as a revival, but rather as a retrogression. During the fifteenth century France, more particularly, had a school of architects and sculptors inferior in no respect, and often superior, to those who flourished a hundred years later; why should there have been a revival when there was no death? The intellectual movement to which the name of Renaissance has been given was really a return to the study of antiquity—a return made with the utmost enthusiasm, but frequently with much want of judgment and with absurd exaggeration. Francis I. is generally looked upon as the French Mecænas of art and literature when mediæval civilization was expiring; but M. Arsène Houssaye says that the title belongs much more appropriately to Louis XII. Louis XII. it was who named Leonardo da Vinci "painter to the King." Nearly all the artists who gave lustre to the reign of Francis I. had flourished under his predecessor; Louis XII. received graciously foreign talent, but he always protected French merit, whereas Francis neglected the most gifted of his subjects to encourage Italians. Leonardo da Vinci, like so many others, crossed the Alps, and was able to ascertain for himself how far the study of the fine arts had advanced amongst those whom certain supercilious critics were wont to call barbarians. He died, as every one knows, near Amboise. The appendix to M. Arsène Houssaye's volume contains a catalogue raisonné of the illustrious painter's works in every branch of art.

The last number of the memoirs of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques § deserves to be noticed here, if it were only for the sake of M. Mignet's admirable essay on the life and works of M. Victor Cousin. The founder of the Eclectic school of metaphysics in France has influenced so profoundly the two generations which have immediately preceded us that he will occupy a permanent and distinguished place in the history of the nineteenth century. There may be two opinions respecting the value of his system; there can be but one as to the powers and eloquence with which this system was stated and maintained. No one could sketch the portrait of M. Cousin better than M. Mignet; and whether as regards the thinker or the writer, the metaphysician or the savant, the accuracy of the delineation cannot be questioned.

§ Séances et Travaux de l'Académie des Sciences morales et politiques. Fevrier—Mars 1869. Paris: Durand.

The Revue Bibliographique Universelle * has now been for more than a year in existence, and may be said to have firmly established a high and merited reputation. Issued in monthly numbers, it aims at giving a complete, though necessarily concise, review of the principal new publications, both French and foreign. Each livraison contains, in the first place, a general survey of a whole class of works, such as novels, books on history, archæology, divinity, &c. Then come detached notices, varying in length from one to two pages; a classified list follows of the chief productions issued during the previous month, and the journal is terminated by a table of contents of all the literary magazines of importance, and also of the literary articles published in the political journals. We must also mention, amongst the various items of its monthly budget, a summary of literary news, including short notices of book sales, notes and queries, and necrological articles on distinguished men.

M. Achard is generally more fortunate in the selection and treatment of the subjects of his novels than he has been when writing the tale entitled Les trois Grâces.† Handsome and accomplished, the three sisters whose adventures he describes begin life full of hope, and yet, when, after a succession of dramatic episodes, they meet together at the bed-side of a dying friend, not one of them can say that she has realized the aspirations of her youth. The nun has reluctantly separated herself from the world; the actress, wearied out by a career of worse than dissipation, feels the memory of the past weighing down upon her as a hateful burden; the third sister, married to one of those selfish, unprincipled creatures whom modern French novelists delight in portraying, has also made shipwreck of her happiness, and, in spite of all her excellent qualities, is quite as wretched as the two others.

M. Paul Perret begins his new romance ‡ by informing us that he is not going to relate an edifying story. He might safely have gone a little further, and said that he was about to describe a female monster, compared with whom Manon Lescaut and Rousseau's Julie d'Étanges are models of virtue. Mademoiselle de Saint-Ay has, indeed, as the title of the book suggests, a good deal of savoir-faire, but her cleverness is of that kind which is better left unanalysed. Nothing can be more absurdly false than the favourite maxim of M. Perret and some other contemporary novelists, that the most repulsive scenes ought to be painted simply because they are actually to be found in modern society.

The author of Le Maudit § has likewise a kind of didactic aim in view in his ecclesiastical fictions; he claims to paint Ultramontanism as it is. The title he has given to his latest work shows sufficiently what part of the enemy's camp it is that he assails, and the foot-notes which illustrate the text supply numerous examples of that kind of false mysticism which, whilst assuming a religious form of expression, is really a nervous disease, to be dealt with by physicians and not by divines. In his preface, the Abbé —— distinctly declares that he is not what his enemies suppose him to be, an unbeliever. He still belongs to the Church; he acknowledges its dogmas and adopts its formularies; but he maintains that, although Catholicism and modern ideas can and should work harmoniously together, yet the former must undergo a complete reformation if it is to retain its hold upon society.

THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

THE uninterrupted support given by his followers to Mr. GLADSTONE on the Irish Church Bill was for a moment broken in upon by the tiny minority which followed Mr. FAWCETT into the lobby. If the Government was to be opposed by a friend, it would have been impossible that it should be opposed in a milder and more submissive spirit than that which Mr. FAWCETT showed. But he thought that the Government was wrong in allowing the landlords to get quit of the tithe rent-charge altogether at the end of fifty-two years, and many more than those who voted with Mr. FAWCETT were of opinion that this was a needless waste of public funds in order to buy off opposition to the Bill. If it had been really necessary to grease the wheels, as Mr. FAWCETT called it, that would have operated as a good reason with many minds for adopting the Government proposal. Mr. FAWCETT was indignant against any low and Jesuitical process of this kind. He was for repudiating, under all circumstances, the doctrine that the means can be justified by the end. But he took care to point out that there was no occasion to use bad means now. If the Government had originally thought it worth while to provide a sop for the landlords, they might venture to withdraw the sop now that they find they are supported by majorities so large and so trustworthy. Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply, denied that he was giving a sop to the landlords. There were really, as he said, three parties to the transaction. There was the State that advanced the money, there were the landlords that borrowed it, and there were the representatives of that surplus fund which is to be applied to the purposes mentioned in the Act. Mr. GLADSTONE contended that all these three parties were benefited by his proposal. He was not doing a kindness to the landlords alone, but was carving out a gain for all alike. The State was benefited because it was very convenient to the Exchequer to lend money at three and a-half per cent. The Irish landlords were benefited because at the end of fifty-two years they will find that without any trouble, risk, or outlay on their part, the State, by an ingenious mechanism of its own, will have bought up the rent-charge for them. The surplus will be benefited because it will at once get twenty-two and a-half years' purchase-money paid over to it for that the ordinary market price of which is only seventeen years' purchase. The proposition that the State gains by lending money at three and a-half per cent. is open to much comment, but it is true that the surplus is increased by Mr. GLADSTONE's arrangement. The amount of money which will be applicable to building asylums and so forth will be larger if Mr. GLADSTONE's proposal is carried than it would have been if Mr. FAWCETT's amendment had been carried. In order to get this surplus into the form of cash the Commissioners must sell the rent-charges; but in the open market they certainly would not sell for what they will now fetch. The State, in fact, becomes the purchaser, and offers twenty-two and a-half years' purchase-money, which is a much better price than private individuals would give. If the market price now is seventeen years' purchase, the price would not be likely to rise on a great mass of these rent-charges being forced for sale in a short time. Mr. FAWCETT omitted to notice this. Mr. GLADSTONE benefits by his plan, not only the landlords, but the Irish nation.

The only question is, whether the State should interfere for the purpose. It is not a satisfactory answer to say that the State will be able to place out its balances at three and a-half per cent. As in England the security of the State is thought better than that of any private property, which is the case in very few countries, the State can always seem to make a good bargain by lending on first-rate security at a higher rate than it borrows at. So long as it can borrow in three per cents. at anything over eighty-six per cent., and can lend the money it borrows on land at three and a-half per cent., it will be making money. Why should it not do this on as wide a scale as it likes? Because, in the first place, it would be mixed up with an infinity of transactions quite out of its sphere; and, in the next place, because it would thus pave the way for innumerable jobs. Although it may in one sense be a gain to the State to lend for a long loan at three and a-half, it would be a loss to any one else to do so, for lenders on the best landed security can get more. Consequently, all land-owners who wanted to borrow would wish to borrow of the State, but only a limited number could be accommodated, or the credit of the State would be lowered, so that it would cease to be able to borrow at three and a-half, and so could not lend at that rate without a loss. Some borrowers must thus get a boon which other borrowers would not get, and, in plainer words, the Government of the day would be able to job the public money in the interest of its supporters, which is a political evil, even if no pecuniary loss is involved. As it is, although we do not fear that any Government will push Mr. GLADSTONE's argument to its conclusion, and lend freely to applicants who offer three and a-half per cent., yet there is evidently a danger lest the State should be induced to apply its borrowing and re-lending power, not to the furtherance of jobs, but to the promotion of political novelties. The question on the Irish Church Bill is whether the occasion is such that it is true political wisdom to let the State exercise this power for the benefit of the landlords and of the Irish surplus. The use of this power ought to be treated as very exceptional, and to be hedged round with every possible safeguard. And why, in this instance, should this power be exercised? There ought to be some other reason, we think, beside the convenience of the landlords and the increase of the surplus, for why should the State go out of its way to provide the Irish with more lunatic asylums? Mr. GLADSTONE finds this reason in the extreme desirableness of winding up at as early a date as possible all transactions connected with the disendowment of the Irish Church. Although the Commissioners might force the rent-charges on the market in order to turn them into cash, yet they might also scruple to do so if they saw that the price was rapidly decreasing; and those who hope to profit by the application of the surplus might call on them to wait, and only sell the rent-charges slowly and on favourable opportunities. Thus the realization of the surplus might be deferred for years, whereas, if the State offers to buy the rent-charges at a price which is incontestably handsome, there need be no delay; and Irishmen must own that the matter has been arranged very quickly, and very favourably for them. This reason is entitled, we think, to very considerable weight, and on the whole it is perhaps satisfactory that the Ministerial proposal has been carried.

The morning sittings began on Tuesday, but not very auspiciously, as almost the whole of the time was occupied with a deadly conflict between the two great Protestant champions. This conflict grew out of an amendment proposed by Mr. WHALLEY, the object of which was the entire destruction of the corporate character of the trustees for Maynooth. Mr. GLADSTONE pointed out that it was very convenient, in the necessary transactions between the State and the recipients of compensation, to have some recognised body to represent the latter, that the disestablished Churchmen were going to have a corporate body created for them with this view, and that the Presbyterians would also have one created if they did not possess an existing body adequate for the purpose. As the trustees of Maynooth already formed such a body, the simplest thing was to continue them. But Mr. WHALLEY was of course not to be convinced. He persisted in his amendment, but his main object was evidently, not to carry his amendment, but to unbosom once for all his grudge against Mr. NEWDEGATE. He revealed the secret history of his Protestant relations with that gentleman. It appears that, when Mr. SPOONER died, a large number of unknown persons invited Mr. NEWDEGATE to be the standing and recognised Protestant champion. He declined, but said he would support any other champion. Mr. WHALLEY was elected, or elected himself, into the vacant place, and called on Mr. NEWDEGATE for his promised support. Mr. NEWDEGATE accordingly began, and the first form his support took was to inform Mr. WHALLEY, with remarkable and most creditable foresight, that he would make himself supremely ridiculous. This was nearly all Mr. NEWDEGATE did for him, except on all occasions to treat him with an air of contemptuous superiority which Mr. WHALLEY candidly owns was justified, but which was of course painful. One secret, however, of his own private experience Mr. NEWDEGATE did condescend to disclose very confidentially for the champion's benefit. He informed him that the reporters' gallery of the House of Commons is entirely under the control of Roman Catholics, and that when a true, honest Protestant speaks, all he says is misrepresented, and that the only way for such a Protestant was to buy special and accurate reporting all for himself. Mr. WHALLEY does not seem to have profited very much by the information, for he soon found an absorbing and exclusive interest in the reports of a most peculiar kind. The speeches in which he anticipated he should be misrepresented, ridiculed, and calumniated, were those of Mr. NEWDEGATE himself, and his main occupation when he got hold of a newspaper was to see whether he was not called on to write to the Times to protect himself against the distinguished Protestant upon whose support, advice, and patronage he had principally relied. An indescribable air of the ludicrous was thus breathed over the Maynooth discussion from its outset, and, dismal as the waste of time was which this Protestant squabble entailed, the Government may perhaps have reaped some advantage from the discredit thus thrown over the whole party of extreme Protestant fanatics in whom Mr. GLADSTONE finds his most bitter opponents.

The main question regarding Maynooth was settled on Thursday, and in spite of the last efforts of Protestantism a majority of 126 decided that Maynooth should be compensated out of the surplus, and not out of the Consolidated Fund, and a majority of 107 decided that the compensation should take the form of a lump sum paid to the Maynooth trustees. It is satisfactory to find that the House showed, by an unusually large majority, its appreciation of the worthlessness of the argument that if the compensation for Maynooth was taken out of the surplus, the revenues of the Protestant Church would be applied, contrary to the repeated assurances of Mr. GLADSTONE, in endowing Roman Catholics. Nothing can be plainer than that the compensation is made out of State funds. The State confiscates the property of a Church; and, having done so, it applies the confiscated property as it thinks best. It has, as all agree, a payment to make to Maynooth, and it is as much at liberty to make it out of one fund as another. When the property of the Irish Protestant Church is said to be given to Roman Catholics, what is meant, if language is to have any accuracy, is that something is given away which, if it were not so given away, would remain in the possession of the Protestant Church. Mr. GLADSTONE promised this should not be done, and he has kept his word. It will not make a farthing difference to the new ecclesiastical body whether Maynooth is compensated out of the surplus or out of the Consolidated Fund. The only persons to whom it makes any difference are those, on the one hand, who are to benefit by the destruction of the surplus, and those, on the other hand, who have to pay taxes to make up the Consolidated Fund. Really it is the Irish landlords who will benefit by having land relieved of county-rates, and it is the taxpayers of the three kingdoms who have to maintain the Consolidated Fund. But the State—i. e. the Executive, using the credit given it by the taxpayers—has already come forward to give these landlords a very great boon by first lending them money at three and a-half per cent., and then, by giving twenty-two and a-half years' purchase, increasing the surplus which will be applied to augment their rents by relieving the county-rates. What Sir GEORGE JENKINSON really proposed was that the British taxpayer should present the Irish landlords with an extra million sterling, and the common sense of the House of Commons revolted at the proposal. It required, however, some little reasoning and detailed explanation to defend the Government proposal as to the amount of compensation to be given to Maynooth, and as to the form in which it is to be given. Mr. GLADSTONE argued that it was incomparably more convenient to give a lump sum than to provide for life-interests in the case of educational institutions, that he had not really given Maynooth more than 50,000*l.* beyond what a complete provision for life-interests would have entailed, and that, as all educational institutions ought to be treated with especial tenderness, this was a very moderate sum in excess to give Maynooth. He had adroitly managed, when Maynooth came under discussion, to commit the House to giving a lump sum to the Presbyterians where, as in the case of the widows' funds, the persons having the life-interests could not be easily ascertained, and where, as in the case of Belfast College, there were educational interests to be considered. He thus made it evident that those who opposed him in dealing in the same way with Maynooth were really actuated by the feeling that Roman Catholics ought to be treated worse than Protestants. It being conceded, on the analogy of what had been done on behalf of the Presbyterians, that a lump sum representing something more than life-interests should be paid over to Maynooth, the only question was how the compensation to an educational institution should be reckoned. Mr. GLADSTONE laid down the principle that the professors and students ought to receive the value of all the pecuniary advantages, direct and indirect, which they get through the institution. A professor gets not only his salary, but the opportunity of living very cheaply; a student gets an education which at Maynooth costs one sum, but elsewhere would cost double. He ought, Mr. GLADSTONE ventured to say, to be protected against having to pay double, for it is not certain that Maynooth can be kept up. To these ingenious calculations other calculations equally ingenious might be opposed; but the point at issue is so small that it is not worth going into. The State is going out of its funds to pay to the Maynooth trustees a lump sum somewhat in excess of the life-interests these trustees will have to protect. It is not worth debating whether the sum shall be a little more or less, nor did any one who voted against the Government care about the exact amount of excess. Directly the final decision on Maynooth was announced, there was a general disposition to make no further opposition to the Bill, and as the names of the Commissioners have been announced, and no exception is likely to be taken to them inside the House or out of it, the Irish Church Bill may now be said to have virtually passed the Commons.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

THE menacing language of Mr. SUMNER, who is unanimously accepted as the exponent of American policy, renders it necessary calmly to consider the contingency of a rupture with the United States. The apparently capricious change of feeling and language which has taken place within a few months indicates the adoption of a definite policy, which at first took even the Republican party by surprise. In the early part of the present year, the more moderate American journals proved with irresistible cogency of argument that the rejection of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON's treaty ought in consistency to be followed by war, or, in other words, that it logically involved an absurd and impossible consequence. The same writers, having perhaps more fully understood the intentions of the Government, now give their full adhesion to Mr. SUMNER's hostile manifesto, and assume that the new incumbent of the English mission will be instructed to withdraw or disavow the friendly assurances of his predecessor. It is even possible that Mr. MOTLEY will demand, in accordance with Mr. SUMNER's programme, a degrading apology, and the payment of three hundred millions sterling of damages; but even American diplomacy is incapable of offering similar affronts to a foreign Government without some ulterior purpose. NAPOLEON was in the habit, when his preparations for an invasion were completed, of preferring some extravagant demand for the mere object of provoking a refusal. Mr. MOTLEY will certainly not ask for a sum equal to three or four years' revenue of the United Kingdom with any serious expectation that Lord CLARENDON will even discuss his proposal. Mr. SUMNER carefully abstained from any intimation that the most abject submission to insult and plunder would secure a final reconciliation. When the tribute had been paid, and the national honour had been indelibly stained, the same or another Senate might unanimously repudiate the imaginary treaty foreshadowed by Mr. SUMNER. A litigant who lays his damages at an enormous amount generally looks not so much to the probable verdict, as to the chance of frightening his adversary into a compromise, relating perhaps to some matter which is wholly unconnected with the ostensible dispute. The crime of profanity seems remote from the title to a freehold, and yet it was on the charge of blaspheming GOD and the KING that AHAB sought to obtain possession of NABOTH'S vineyard. Not two hirelings, but twenty millions of false witnesses, themselves for the most part speaking under a delusion, are ready to swear that the Proclamation of Neutrality was a breach of friendship and of international law. The prosecutor or plaintiff, as in ancient times, claims to be judge in his own cause, and hopes to decree to himself possession of the coveted vineyard on the other side of Niagara. If NABOTH had confessed his alleged crime, and if he had offered to pay a fine of innumerable shekels of silver, he would have been not less summarily subjected to expropriation.

The power of the United States to inflict exceptional injury on England begins and ends with Canada and the West Indian colonies. The islands would probably be defensible, though in some instances they might be exposed to danger and perhaps it might not be impossible to hold Nova Scotia. Vancouver's Island and British Columbia are within easy reach of San Francisco, which will in a few weeks be connected with the Atlantic ports by railroad. It would be impossible to offer any resistance on the Pacific seaboard; and the only question as to the principal part of the Dominion would relate to the disposition of the colonists themselves. If their undoubted repugnance to annexation were strong enough to induce them to defend their independence with vigour, it would be the plain duty of England to devote all her resources to their aid. It is true that a population of four millions, supported by all the available force which could be detached from England, must ultimately succumb to the unscrupulous efforts of an enemy numbering five-and-thirty millions; but it is doubtful whether the American people would persist in a profligate enterprise when it became fully evident that success was only to be attained by conquest. In the war with the Southern Confederacy the national conscience was satisfied at first with the duty of preserving national unity, and afterwards with the emancipation of the negroes; but an invasion of Canada must be consciously undertaken in the exclusive pursuit of revenge and ambition. American statesmen would probably sooner or later reflect on the inconvenience of having an injured and disaffected race at the Northern as well as the Southern extremity of the Federal territories. It is impossible to form a confident judgment beforehand either of Canadian resolution or of American policy. It is only certain that aggression on English rights will be neither costless nor bloodless, unless indeed the character of the nation has rapidly degenerated with the change in the spirit of its institutions. It has not been generally found that democracy, with all its defects, has tended to spiritless repudiation of burdensome rights and duties. In such a quarrel there will be no moral uncertainty, as the aggressor will be wholly and wilfully in the wrong. Mr. SUMNER'S ungenerous quotations from the speeches of Mr. COBDEN, Mr. BRIGHT, and Mr. FORSTER imply an erroneous belief that ardent sympathy with America involves disloyalty to England. He will be disappointed if he hopes that, should he force on a war, he will be aided by a disaffected faction.

It is scarcely a consolation that the forced sacrifice of Canada would involve no material loss. All classes of politicians have long since made up their minds to concede the independence of British America whenever it should be desired by the colonists themselves. Separation would involve the right to join the United States at pleasure, although the Canadians themselves have hitherto deprecated annexation. It is not impossible that in course of time their objections might be overcome, and Englishmen have no real interest in preventing or retarding the union of the whole North American continent into a single Republic. That a greater diversity of institutions would be more advantageous to intellectual and moral progress is a theoretical doctrine which may be supported and opposed by many plausible arguments. The inhabitants of the various regions of the West are primarily concerned in the determination of the controversy. The formation of four or five States of the Union to the North of the great Lakes would entail no injury on England, if it were not attended with insult. If it is proposed as the alternative of a white sheet, of a halter, and of the payment of a fabulous penalty, it only remains to defend at all hazards the national honour. A demand which would be favourably received, if it were preferred by the colonists, becomes an outrage on the part of an intruder. If, however, the Canadians declined to concur in the maintenance of Imperial rights, it would only remain to acquiesce in a mortifying necessity.

To the ordinary evils of war both parties would be equally liable, except that the larger mercantile marine of England would offer a larger prize to hostile cruisers. As no third country can compete in maritime enterprise with England and the United States, the relative position of both countries to one another and to the rest of the world would be resumed when the war was over. Mr. SUMNER'S adherents probably hope to excite an insurrection in Ireland, and they may congratulate themselves that scrupulous good faith prevented England from precipitating the conflict when the success of a more formidable rebellion in America might have been easily insured. A civil war in Ireland would be a grievous evil; but rebellion would be perhaps more sternly repressed when it was promoted by a foreign enemy who could give it little effectual aid. An American army in Ireland would be more disadvantageously placed than an English army in Canada, and its destruction and capture would only involve a question of time and of expense. The pleasure with which Americans would regard a great increase of the English National Debt would be tempered by the accumulation of an equal burden of their own, probably at double the rate of interest. After a time the war would come to an end, leaving both parties injured and exasperated, although Englishmen would not follow the American example after 1783 and after 1815, by instilling into successive generations the duty of cultivating national animosity. It may perhaps seem premature to anticipate hostile enterprises which have not yet been formally announced. It would certainly not be expedient to engage in a long discussion of painful and uncertain contingencies; but it may be as well that the people of the United States should understand that English patience, unexhausted by any amount of vituperation, has its limits where language passes into action. If the impending danger is to be noticed at all, there would be little advantage in substituting fanciful risks for the practical object which must be contemplated by those who may wish to force on a quarrel. Mr. SUMNER, who is not the less a man of great ability because he shows himself the implacable enemy of England, cannot be suspected of having really hoped to extort a confession of error and a payment of half the cost of the civil war. His speech, if it is translated into diplomatic documents, will be altered into the demand of territorial cession, which has already been started by Mr. CHANDLER. The coarser demagogues who were lately clamouring for a recognition of the independence of Cuba have, since the delivery of Mr. SUMNER'S speech, suspended their demands, with the impudent avowal of their unwillingness to weaken by inconsistency the argument against England. It is possible that the unaccountable outcry for vengeance may subside as suddenly as it has arisen, but there is too much reason to believe that it is stimulated for a practical purpose. The cynical injustice of a Power which will within fifty years be the greatest in the world suggests regret rather than surprise.

THE MAYOR OF CORK.

ALTHOUGH much adverse criticism was bestowed during Wednesday's discussion on the course taken by the Government, yet the impression on both sides of the House seemed to be unanimous that the Government had taken the right course in bringing in a Bill to remove the Mayor of CORK from his office. That language so offensive, so reckless, so insulting to the Crown, so wildly indecorous in an official, should be passed over altogether was impossible. Whether the Government was or was not right in releasing the Fenian convicts was irrelevant to the immediate question. An indiscreet political act on the part of the Executive offers no shadow of excuse for a Mayor who says publicly that a wholesale murderer like BARRETT, and the intending assassin of a son of the QUEEN, were noble and heroic men. Even if the Government could by possibility have overlooked these words, they could not have overlooked the declaration from every magistrate of the city of Cork, of every creed and every colour of political opinion, that the mode in which the Mayor was conducting himself in his office was bringing the law into contempt and doing the most serious public mischief. The only ghost of an excuse or palliation urged by any one for the Mayor was urged by Mr. MAGUIRE, and what he had to say only amounted to a charitable supposition that the Mayor must have been drunk at the time when he spoke of O'FARRELL as he did. The Government, being on every ground imperatively bound to act, had to choose between having recourse to the Courts of Law and bringing in a Bill to remove the Mayor from his office. The objections to the first course were overwhelming. It was exceedingly doubtful whether a prosecution could have been successful in point of law: the Mayor would anyhow have gone on holding his office, and the punishment, if any had been inflicted, would have been of the wrong kind and for the wrong offence. The crime of the Mayor lay, not in talking sedition, but in using language which showed that he was totally unfit to be Mayor. The duty of the Government was to get the Mayor removed from his office as soon as possible, and the only way of doing this was to bring in a Bill for the purpose. During the debate a hint was thrown out that the proper way of doing this was to bring in a general Bill, affecting not only this particular Mayor, but all Mayors who might do what the Mayor of CORK has done; but the proposal would not bear a moment's consideration. A general Bill must in any case have been a special Bill, operating ex post facto, as regards the Mayor of CORK. Not only is there no ground to suppose a general Bill to be wanted, but no general Bill could have been made like the special Bill. It is one thing for Parliament to remove a Mayor, for that can only be done openly, rarely, and on grounds precisely stated; and it is quite another thing to enable the Executive to remove a Mayor who gives offence. As the Government had chosen the only right and satisfactory course, as a Bill to remove the Mayor was justifiable, and as there was a strong sense of the enormity of the offence which the Mayor, as being Mayor, had committed, they might have expected something like a warm and unanimous support. Mr. DISRAELI, however, led the way in using the Ministerial proposal as a means of attacking his political adversaries, and of lowering, if possible, the credit of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland, to whom a great part of the credit of having prepared the Irish Church Bill is generally assigned. It was not until Mr. BERESFORD HOPE had made an appeal to the Conservative leaders to restore the Opposition to its proper footing in the matter that Mr. HARDY spoke with a spirit and decision on behalf of the Government proposal which relieved the Conservatives from the reproach of seeking to make capital, in the mere wantonness of party, out of opposing what they really approved of thoroughly.

But, admitting that the proper course was to bring in a special Bill to remove the Mayor of CORK from his office, there were two points which deserved and received consideration on Wednesday. The first point was whether the Bill was properly introduced in the House of Commons, or whether it would not have been better to have submitted it first to the House of Lords. The second point was whether the Government had proceeded properly in their manner of dealing with the Bill, supposing they were right in bringing it first before the Commons. The arguments for beginning with the Lords were based partly on the ground that the Lords can, while the Commons cannot, examine witnesses on oath, and partly on the supposed precedent of the Provost of EDINBURGH in the reign of GEORGE II. Neither line of argument seems to have much force. The precedent of the Provost of EDINBURGH shows that on one occasion a Bill of Pains and Penalties was begun in the House of Lords, but that is all that it shows. In fact one of the objections taken in the Commons to the Bill when it came down from the Lords was that a Bill affecting in so unusual a way a commoner ought to have been first submitted to the Lower House. But it was not from any comparison of advantages that the Bill was begun in the Lords. It was purely by accident, for the Bill was not a Ministerial Bill at all. Lord CARTERET, a member of the Opposition, suggested to the Lords that some inquiries should be made as to the riots in which Captain PORTEOUS lost his life, the suggestion being that there was a widely-spread conspiracy to defy the law among some of the most respectable inhabitants of Edinburgh. The evidence failed to show this, but the Peers who had interested themselves in the matter thought that a Bill should be passed to remove the Provost, and inflict a penalty on the city. The Ministry neither opposed nor supported, the Duke of NEWCASTLE and the Chancellor, Lord HARDWICKE, voting on one occasion on different sides. When the Bill came down to the Commons, it was violently opposed, the Scotch members treating this high-handed dealing with their capital as an infraction of the spirit of the treaty of Union, and a large number of members being much impressed with the evidence which showed that although the Provost had been inefficient, he was a well-meaning loyal man, who had in a feeble way done his best. Sir ROBERT WALPOLE expressly said that he did not regard the Ministry as in any way responsible for the Bill, but that he thought it had better pass, as the Lords had chosen to take up the matter, although he was in favour of making its provisions much less stringent. There was nothing in this to show that if the Government themselves, as a clear act of public duty, proposed a similar Bill, they would be in any way bound to begin with the Lords. And if it were not for the difference which exists between the two Houses as to the capacity for administering oaths, there can be no doubt that such a Bill is better begun in the Commons. It is a Bill treating a commoner in a most exceptional way, and it is natural that the representatives of the people should be first asked for their approval. It is a strong step on the part of the Executive, and it is to the Commons that the Executive is primarily responsible. It is a Bill affecting an officer who holds his office indirectly by popular election, and it is natural that its consideration should be first remitted to the elective branch of the Legislature. Every general reason, therefore, prompted the Government to begin with the Commons, and they had only to ask whether they should suffer their decision to be reversed by the consideration that evidence in the Lords can, while in the Commons it cannot, be taken on oath.

How it happens that the House of Commons cannot administer an oath is one of those dark problems of constitutional law which no one can satisfactorily solve. It is a mere accident, based on no assignable grounds of reason whatever. Special Acts have been passed to enable the Commons to administer oaths to witnesses before Election Committees and Committees on Private Bills, but the old anomalous rule remains, that on public matters the Commons cannot swear their witnesses. Till within a hundred years they used to help themselves by getting magistrates to come and administer the oaths; but this manifest evasion of the law fell into desuetude, and now the Commons do not attempt to do more than order witnesses to appear before them, and treat refusal to give evidence, or the giving of false evidence, as breaches of privilege punishable with imprisonment during the current Session. The evidence given before the Commons is therefore inferior to that given before the Lords, inasmuch as it wants the sanction of an oath, and inasmuch as the penalty of imprisonment during a Session falls far short of the penalties attending on perjury. But even if it is intrinsically inferior, it is evidence on which the House of Commons acts. It treats it as evidence good enough for it. It acts on its own responsibility, and on the evidence which is taken. If it chooses, it may ask the Lords to communicate any evidence taken before the Upper House, but it has never admitted itself in any way bound to do so. If the House of Commons admitted that it could not safely act except on evidence taken before the Lords, it would entirely abandon a position which it has constantly asserted. It has always declared itself perfectly competent to proceed on the evidence which it declares satisfactory to it. Each House acts independently, and is guided by its own evidence, although, for the sake of convenience and despatch, the Commons often borrow the evidence taken in the Lords. But in Bills of Pains and Penalties each House, as a matter of ordinary practice, takes its own evidence, and satisfies its scruples in its own way; and, as a matter of fact, these Bills have more frequently been begun in the Commons. When they are introduced by the Government, it is entirely in the discretion of the Executive to choose one House or the other, and if the case were one where a vast mass of conflicting evidence had to be taken, it might be very advisable to begin first with the House which has most leisure, and where there are experienced lawyers without professional occupation to absorb their time. But in the case of the Mayor of CORK, the evidence must be in the highest degree short and simple, and the House may easily satisfy itself that it can safely act on the testimony submitted to it. When a Bill of this sort is begun in the Commons, the representative of the Government states, on the occasion of the first reading, what is the case on which the Government rests its appeal to Parliament to pass the Bill. The law officers are then directed by the House to have evidence to support the preamble of the Bill, and, generally, after the second reading, and before going into Committee, the evidence for the Bill is taken, and the parties affected by the Bill are allowed to give evidence in contradiction or exculpation. The House then decides whether it is satisfied with the evidence offered by the Government, and expresses its decision by agreeing or refusing to go into Committee. When, therefore, Mr. DISRAELI protested against the House being asked to pass the Bill on the mere ipse dixit of the Irish ATTORNEY-GENERAL, he entirely misconceived what the ATTORNEY-GENERAL had been doing. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had not asked the House to pass the Bill on his assertion, but had merely stated the case, which he offered to prove should the House be of opinion that, if proved, it would justify the proposed Bill.

Everything seems to have been in order, and the Government will probably not have much difficulty in inspiring a general conviction that the course they have taken with regard to this Bill has been the right one.

SPAIN.

THE Spanish Cortes appear to be animated by honest intentions, and many of the members possess considerable ability, yet it is doubtful whether they will succeed in the attempt to create a Constitution and a Government. Like similar assemblies in other countries, the Cortes are constantly tempted to debate first principles which ought in legislative discussion to be taken for granted, or generalities which are useless for practical purposes. A Republican member the other day proposed an unnecessary amendment to the effect that it should be legal to profess no religion. As there is no obligation to hold any religious faith, it would seem to follow that it was lawful to abstain from the adoption of any religious creed; but Mr. SUNER wished perhaps rather to announce his own opinion than to secure legal protection to non-religious persons. In an elaborate speech he undertook to prove that Christianity was unfounded; and, as if for the purpose of irritating the majority of his hearers, he directly attacked the newest doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. In most countries there is little difference of judgment as to the inexpediency of shocking religious prejudices and associations; nor could the exposure of theological errors, if it had been successful, have in any way borne on the issue proposed by Mr. SUNER himself to the Cortes. It is not because any dogma is true or false that every man has, so far as positive law is concerned, a right to believe or disbelieve it, without liability to persecution. The proposition which Mr. SUNER undertook to maintain would be compatible with the most extravagant intolerance. The Roman magistrates, who sometimes ordered that the Christians should be sent to fight the lions, held Mr. SUNER's opinion as to the falsehood of their doctrines. It was probably his wish to give the utmost possible offence to the more orthodox members of the Cortes, and he had no reason to complain of want of success. In the good old times St. Louis maintained that the most conclusive answer to an infidel disputant would be a sword through his body. After seven centuries of increasing toleration, the PRESIDENT of the Cortes was content to request the offending speaker to change the course of his argument. It would have mattered little that Mr. SUNER refused to proceed after the interruption, if the whole Republican party had not protested against the decision of the President by leaving the House in a body. In a French Chamber the interference of the presiding officer would have been unanimously approved, and even the impartial and taciturn SPEAKER of the English House of Commons would certainly have checked an irrelevant attack on religious doctrines. The Spaniards are perfectly right in taking precautions against the infringement of religious freedom, but when the minority of the Cortes demand the right to make the truth of creeds a subject of Parliamentary debate, they only illustrate their insufficient training in habits of business. The Immaculate Conception has nothing whatever to do with organic legislation, which ought to recognise the equal rights of all who believe the dogma and of all who reject it. It is highly probable that the majority in an inexperienced assembly may frequently be tempted to abuse its strength; nor can the remedy of secession be refused in the last resort to the Republicans. But their selection of an opportunity for withdrawing appears to have been extraordinarily injudicious, for the Ministers afterwards refused to concur in censuring Mr. SUNER, on the ground that it was necessary to allow unlimited freedom of speech.

The more violent discussions in the Cortes almost always turn on ecclesiastical questions. Marshal SERRANO lately threatened the resignation of the Cabinet, because a vote of censure was proposed on a great Church dignitary for whose actions the Ministers were in no way responsible. The Patriarch of the Indies was accused of retaining in the Liturgy the prayers for the fallen dynasty; and it is said that he might have been charged with the graver offence of misappropriating a charitable trust-fund. For a sum amounting to a hundred and fifty thousand pounds he had no better voucher to offer than the receipt of the ex-KING CONSORT, to whom the Patriarch had lent the money without security. It is not surprising either that the confiding prelate should be as liberal of seditious prayers as of money entrusted to his care, or that the anti-clerical party in the Cortes should resent his refusal to acknowledge the revolution. An Established Church must be content to recognise in its public services the de facto authorities of the time. The English Nonjurors who refused to pray for a Parliamentary King were compelled to surrender their benefices. As SERRANO is not known to be a bigot, his passionate resistance of the motion against the Archbishop was generally attributed to some secret cause of vexation. When the Minister promised that the matter should be subjected to official investigation, the motion was immediately withdrawn; and the surprise which was caused by SERRANO's determination to rest the continued existence of the Ministry on the result of an incidental and irrelevant vote was partially allayed when PRIM, in a patronizing tone, supported his colleague's objection, or rather requested the Cortes to humour SERRANO's mood. It was plausibly conjectured that the PRIME MINISTER had been thwarted in some recent Cabinet discussion, and that he was consequently disposed to regard as possible a resignation which might be as embarrassing to his rivals as to himself. By an ostentatious statement of his ignorance of ecclesiastical questions PRIM produced the impression that he inclined to the anti-clerical party, which is for the most part composed of Republicans. SERRANO has no wish that Archbishops should embezzle trust money, or utter illegal prayers, but the enemies of the priests are sometimes the same with his own. He cannot fail to perceive that the long delay in the completion of the Constitution increases the difficulty of re-establishing the Monarchy. If the Ministers had been united among themselves, they might long since have proposed a candidate for the Crown, in full confidence that the Cortes would have adopted their nomination. The only member of the Government who is of sufficient importance to prevent a decision among the pretenders to the Crown is the Minister of War. The Republicans want a leader, and perhaps a military chief; and PRIM, in separating himself from his colleagues, would become the chief of a formidable party. Although he has never shown any tendency to Jacobinical doctrines, he might hope to control his new associates, who are divided among themselves by many various shades of violence and moderation.

The Provisional Government will perhaps acquire a certain amount of popularity by the energy with which they have defended the national rights in Cuba. More than twenty thousand men, all volunteers for the special service, have been despatched to the colony; and it is said that General DULCE has already suppressed all organized and formal rebellion. The Spanish army will be fully able to deal with the American adventurers from New York or New Orleans who are preparing expeditions in American ports. The Government of the United States, notwithstanding the urgent recommendation of the House of Representatives, has postponed its interference, for the purpose perhaps of rendering its reclamations against England less flagrantly inconsistent with its present policy. It is nearly certain that Cuba will sooner or later be annexed to the Union; but the Spaniards are not yet reconciled to the loss. The unfriendly bearing of the people of the United States will perhaps diminish for the moment the popularity of the Republican party, but the prospects of the minority are on the whole encouraging. It would be almost impossible after the lapse of seven months to raise the Duke of MONTPENSIER to the throne, although the scheme might have been easily accomplished on the morrow of the Revolution. The Italian claimant has for a long time never been mentioned; and since the definitive refusal of King FERDINAND there has been no third candidate in the field. The partisans of Queen ISABELLA or of the Prince of ASTURIAS are probably numerous, but in the present temper of the population they cannot openly appear. The absence of a king involves a Republic, which will be less startling as it has, since the flight of the QUEEN, been practically established. The institution in a considerable European State of the form of government to which modern democracy aspires will be an important event. The Republicans of Germany, of Italy, and, above all, of France, will be excited and encouraged by the local triumph of their cause; and their enthusiasm will react on the Spaniards themselves. There is no reason why a Republic should not defend order and property as effectually as a Monarchy, except that the advocates of a Republican system everywhere include in their ranks the promoters of anarchy. The French Government has been suspected of having lately tolerated political extravagances for the purpose of exhibiting to the decent classes a set of drunken Helots in the form of infuriated Jacobins. In some parts of Spain Republicanism means a compulsory division of property; and consequently those who have anything to lose prefer a monarchical government. If it is true that PRIM inclines to the rising party, he may perhaps foresee the necessity of restraining Republican eccentricities by military force. The chief of the army will be virtually the head of the Republican Government, whether he bears the title of President or Minister of War. To Englishmen it seems that a constitutional king would offer some additional security for freedom; but Spanish notions of liberty may perhaps be associated with a Republic, and it must be allowed that their experience of past kings and queens is not encouraging. It may be urged in favour of a Republic that it will not be administered by a nun or a confessor.

THE IRISH LAND QUESTION.

At any rate we have one ray of light in the dark sky of Irish affairs. We have got to an end of the Mayor of CORK. It is using a tremendous machinery to bring in a special Act of legislation, hurried through Parliament, to snuff out the silly, prating creature, but there was no other remedy so efficacious; and the English Legislature may compare itself to a steam-hammer which can with equal ease deal out the exact stroke that will crush an elephant and the exact stroke that will crush a fly. The last buzz and flare of the Cork fly was, we must own, not without effect; and if the Mayor was to be crushed, he showed some ingenuity and humour in selecting as his last official act the holding a midnight meeting in which he expressed his confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT. He had at least the comfort of damaging his destroyers by swearing they were his friends. He is crushed now, and we may attend to other matters. He and his follies are but a speck on the surface of the great question of the real state of Ireland and of the remedies, if any remedies for that state are to be found. Possibly, as Government speakers urge, things have in past generations been worse, but they are in all conscience bad enough now. The murders are very wicked, very terrifying, and very successful. The assassin now seems always to hit his man. He shoots so well, and under such advantages, that he may quite calculate on putting at least seventeen slugs into the skull of his victim. He murders in perfect comfort to himself, at a convenient hour of the day, in broad daylight, and without any trouble of following or tracking his enemy. And he shoots with perfect impunity. English poachers would be delighted if they could shoot a pheasant so pleasantly, so safely, and so surely as any loafing Irish savage can shoot any man who presumes to own land, or to farm land, or to do anything which any one who has the remotest connexion with land can construe into an offence or grievance. Now why is this? Why do they shoot, and why, having shot, are they never found out? We do not find that the very best-informed Irishmen can give any answer to these natural questions, and how can Englishmen presume to have any opinion about them? All that we can attempt to do is to give the impressions which the various opinions of the best-informed Irishmen, amidst their vast differences, leave on us. Two things seem clear. These agrarian murders are not connected with the Irish Church debate, and they are only very remotely connected with Fenianism. The assassins may have a sympathy with Fenians, but they do not lurk behind a hedge or wall, and shoot a good, innocent, unsuspecting man as he is taking his walk before breakfast, from any real desire to uphold the green flag and fraternize with the Republic of the West. Nor, so far as appears, is there any distinct connexion to be traced between these murders and any hopes, delusive or otherwise, that the speeches of members of the present Government may have raised as to a large dealing with the land-laws of Ireland. The tenant-farmers are the people who would profit most if the wildest measures ever sanctioned by any member of the Government were carried, and the tenant-farmers not only are not assassins, but know that the assassins hate them almost as much as they hate landed proprietors. The truth seems to be that, so far as these agrarian murders are connected with land, they rest solely on the vague hankering after land in general which Irishmen believe they are born to feel. The Irish are bred up to think, in a dim shadowy way, that they have an ancestral wrong about land, and that something grand about land is going to happen to them some day; much as the Jews think the Holy Land belongs to them, and that they will some day have it restored to them, and will go back there and be happy, although in real life every Jew much prefers to stay where he can make money. The low Irish, in the worst parts of Ireland, have deduced from this totally unpractical sentiment the notion that they have a general licence to go shooting their enemies anywhere on Irish soil. This is the starting-point of Irish murders, but it is only the starting-point. What confirms and hardens them in their disposition to murder is their practical experience that they can murder with perfect impunity. All half-civilized people easily take offence, and an Irish peasant is very susceptible. Directly he is annoyed, he thinks naturally of vengeance. But from most kinds of vengeance he is debarred. He cannot insult or bully or assault his adversary, for the law would be down on him at once. But there is one thing he can do. He can go behind a hedge and shoot his enemy like a dog. Even this may be too mild an expression. We are not sure that an Irish peasant who shot a dog would not be found out and properly punished. But he can shoot his enemy as if he were, we will not say a dog, but an honest, straightforward, inoffensive Christian. He has his shot and his revenge. No one betrays him or knows anything about him. Possibly he condescends to hide; in extreme cases he goes to America; but more probably he walks about, feeling that, as the Mayor of CORK would say, he has something noble and heroic in his inmost soul, and at any rate is sure to escape detection. Thus murder leads to murder, and the security begotten of experience makes the peasants believe that all men whom they choose to dislike are given over to them for a prey.

What is to be done? And, in order to answer this, we must first ask, whether we are to legislate in a panic or not? Many speakers, especially in the Lords, during the debate of last week, seem to have been possessed by the idea that there was some one definite course which was startling and strong and unusual, but which, if the Government could but resolve to take it, would put down all these murders at once. This was, we believe, a mere dream. None of those who advocated recourse to a gigantic remedy gave the slightest clue to what they meant, and the obvious conclusion is that they meant nothing. We will pass, therefore to men of moderation and sense, or to men who, if they begin to think of a thing, can at least think it out in their own way. The mildest form of recommending action under a panic is that of speakers who, like Lord STANLEY, conjure the Government to offer a programme of what they think can and what they think cannot be done in regard to Irish land. Lord STANLEY was reasonable enough to own that the Government were not bound to bring in an Irish Land Bill this Session, as they would not have the remotest hope of carrying it. But he asked them to declare their policy. Now such declarations are eminently convenient to the Opposition, and inconvenient to a Ministry, and therefore it was not likely Mr. GLADSTONE would fall into so obvious a trap; but putting that aside, let us ask how is it conceivable that any declaration of the sort should have any effect on the contrivers of these hedgerow murders? Supposing Mr. GLADSTONE went so far as to say that he thought the tenant ought to be regarded most favourably as far as regards compensation for improvements, and that it would be desirable to secure greater fixity of tenure, so long as no compulsion were used, and no injustice done to any one, who would be the wiser or more contented? If we really want to do something great and heroic and startling, we must go much further in one direction or the other. Either we must say, as Mr. HARDY says, that the Irish have no grievances whatever, that they have now got all that they ever shall get or ought to get, and that the way to make them happy is to crush all political hope out of their breasts; or else, if we think that the way to govern Ireland is to please Ireland and the Irish and all these Fenians and hedgerow assassins, then we had much better let them have their own way entirely, and ought to create and recognise an Irish Republic at once. There is no real halting between these two extremes, if Ireland is to be governed by heroic remedies and under the influence of a panic. It must be kept down rigidly, unscrupulously, and consistently, as Russia has kept down Poland since the last insurrection; or if the Irish are to be gratified, and the numerical majority of Catholic peasants are to be considered exclusively as the Irish, and to represent all the rest, then they had better have the fun of getting their own way entirely for a while and of ascertaining what is the natural result of flying with waxen wings in the hot sunshine.

The other course, and, as it seems to us, the only wise and statesmanlike course, is to refuse to act or legislate under a panic, and to put the law, so far as possible, in force, while remedial measures of a moderate and sensible kind are worked out. At the same time, the Government may easily fall into the mistake of taking things too quietly, and of becoming enamoured of very inefficacious alteratives. It is wonderful how some of the leading members of the Government can seriously uphold as a sovereign specific the device of sending down a body of police to the district where a murder has been committed. The object of this inroad of police is not to protect any one, or to discover anything, or to render any service in harmony with their ordinary functions, but simply to run up a bill. The great aim of the whole proceeding is to fine the district, so that persons who know that a murder has been committed, and will not tell, may be punished in their pockets. The process seems equally demoralizing to the police and inoperative as a means of punishment. The police are made to feel themselves costly nuisances, eating their heads off in idleness in order to annoy a district; and in the district itself the chief sufferers by the arrangement are not the murderer and his friends and admirers, but the needy friends and relatives of the deceased. We hope, although without much confidence, that something better than this can be contrived in the sphere of police, and that in one way or other some clue to the secret of these murders may be discovered. Half-a-dozen convictions followed by capital punishment would do more to stop them than all the legislation under the sun. But we want not merely to stop murder, but to do our very best to make Ireland happy, and for that purpose we must see what can be done in the way of legislation by a Parliament which has been truly described as most friendly to Ireland, and bent on doing something for Ireland, and not merely talking about doing something. We are always brought back to this, that we must first deal with the Irish Church and then with the Irish land. The latter is a matter reserved by general consent for next Session, and when the time comes all liberal Englishmen will be bound to discuss the question of the Irish land and all the proposals of the Government about it in a candid and impartial spirit, with a hearty desire to do what is best and most prudent and generous, and to keep in mind what fraction of justice resides amidst all the nonsense and vapouring of the Irish about Irish land. But then there is this difference between dealing with the Irish Church and the Irish land. If it is right or wise to touch the Irish Church at all, it must be wise and right to deal with it in a sweeping and severe measure which goes to the root of the matter at once. But with regard to the Irish land everything is a question of degree. There are no grand principles which explain everything. Experience, and not logic, alone must show what compensations are to be given, and whether anything and what can be done to increase in a legitimate manner the number of Irish proprietors. A supporter of Mr. GLADSTONE closed the discussion last week by saying that a Government which had dealt so widely and comprehensively with the Church might be trusted to do the same with the land. But the hopes thus raised may be falsified; not that the Government will not have done as much as could be fairly expected, but because there may be nothing possible to do with regard to the Irish land, except to introduce tentative, imperfect, and unheroic measures. The Government can but do its best, but it may turn out that this best will be pronounced by eager Ministerialists to be rather disappointing.

THE FRANCO-BELGIAN PROTOCOL.

IN a campaign in which the opposing armies are very unequally matched, an obvious desire on the part of the general who commands the stronger force to postpone a decisive battle is commonly equivalent to defeat. The conduct of the French Government in the latest phase of its negotiations with Belgium suggests a similar inference. During the first week of M. FRÈRE ORBAN's stay in Paris M. ROUHER's courtesy seemed to veil a determination to be content with no arrangement but that he had himself proposed. The idea of compromise was abhorrent to him. The labours of the mixed Commission must have the consideration of the railway contract as their starting-point, and its acceptance as their goal. In comparison with these arrogant conditions the Protocol signed last week is but a meek and submissive production. The terms proposed by the Belgian Minister—once held so inadmissible—are, after all, to constitute the basis of the discussion. M. DE LAVALETTE contents himself with the expression of an opinion that a scheme of his own would have afforded a more favourable solution. Even this scheme, it appears, would have been a departure from that attributed to M. ROUHER. M. DE LAVALETTE did not ask for "an approbation pure and simple of the "proposed conventions"—which was exactly what, according to the best authorities, M. ROUHER did ask for. He only suggested a new arrangement for the working of the Great Luxemburg line "which should be surrounded with all the "guarantees of control, superintendence, and authority to "which the Belgian Government is incontestably entitled." But the Foreign Minister is not wedded to his own plan any more than to his colleague's. He will "be happy to obtain "the desired result" by other means, and accordingly the Protocol records that "the EMPEROR's Government, inspired by "sentiments of the most sincere cordiality towards Belgium, "and exclusively occupied with providing for the legitimate "expansion of economic interests," has "agreed to examine "whether the project presented by the Belgian Government" will attain the object indicated by M. FRÈRE ORBAN. A few weeks back the French Government was not so ready to take its statement of the end at which the mixed Commission ought to aim from the mouth of the Belgian Minister. Perhaps the explanation of the change is that the end it originally sought is not one which admits of being made public now that so much attention has been directed to the subject, and that it has too little real interest in the end which it now professes to seek to care by whom it is reduced to words.

When we turn to M. FRÈRE ORBAN's own "indication" of the object which it is proposed to achieve by the deliberations of a mixed Commission, the provisional character of the Protocol becomes very evident. The sentiments of the Belgian Government are as admirable as those of the French Government. It is "animated by an anxious desire to maintain the "most amicable intercourse between France and Belgium," and to this virtuous emotion it adds a not less ardent wish to "facilitate the commercial relations between those two States "and Holland." So far the two Governments are completely agreed. Neither will admit to being actuated by political considerations; both profess that their whole conduct in the business has been determined by purely economical considerations. But at Brussels a lamentably low view is taken of the measures which these economic considerations demand. The Imperial Government has such a lofty conception of what is implied in the "legitimate expansion of "economic interests," that it wants to see the Great Luxemburg Railway in the hands of a French Company. To this grand conception the Belgian Cabinet opposes a grovelling suggestion of a system of through trains. It will "most readily "assist in organizing direct services, the short trains being "appropriated to local requirements." This is the plan which, more in sorrow than in anger, M. DE LAVALETTE has consented to examine.

So ends for the present this very singular negotiation. Every one of its stages suggests inquiries which it is easier to state than to answer. First of all, there is the sudden intervention of the French Government in a matter with which it had to all appearance no concern whatever. A French Company contracts to buy a Belgian railway after receiving from the Belgian authorities distinct notice that the transfer will not be allowed. If there had been anything irregular in this notice, and if the French Company had sustained any damage in consequence, they had their remedy in the Belgian Courts; and that no similar cause of complaint might arise for the future, a law was made defining in unmistakeable terms the limits within which such purchases could be made. But of any injury done to the Eastern of France Company we hear nothing. The commercial element suddenly disappears from the transaction, and the French Government takes it up, not as a wrong done to a particular body of French subjects, but as an exhibition of distrust on the part of Belgium. The motive of this sudden sensitiveness is the first problem which has been submitted to Europe in connexion with the Franco-Belgian dispute. By the force of diplomatic pressure, or the want of diplomatic support, M. FRÈRE ORBAN was induced to present himself at Paris. If the French Ministers thought that on their own ground they would have an easy victory over their guest, they were soon disappointed. He had shown his elasticity by consenting to negotiate; he now showed his firmness by refusing to negotiate on any terms which involved a ratification by the Belgian Government of the contracts they had set aside in the first instance. Here arises the second problem. Have M. ROUHER and the EMPEROR been acting in concert all along, the former taking the lead as long as there was any probability of M. FRÈRE ORBAN being brought to submission, and the latter being only called upon when some new agency was required to get M. ROUHER out of difficulty? Or has the EMPEROR so far withdrawn from politics that he ordinarily leaves the whole conduct of affairs to the MINISTER of STATE, and only rouses himself from his indifference when it is more than usually clear that things have been mismanaged? Probabilities point in some degree to this latter explanation. The initial dispute with Belgium was hardly of a kind which NAPOLEON III. would have been likely to get involved in of his own mere motion. Unsuccessful as his foreign policy has been, it has not on the whole been devoid of a certain theatrical dignity. To bridle the ambition of Russia, to create a federal Italy, to found a Latin Empire in the New World, to secure the independence of the Pontifical throne—these are all objects which, whatever may have been the reasons that really recommended them to their author, at least admitted of being presented in attractive colours. But an obvious determination to pick a quarrel with Belgium, unless she consents to a concession as inconsistent with her neutrality as with her independence, has no such superficial merits. The designs to which it points are as mean as they are mischievous, and in this respect even his enemies will admit that they are not properly characteristic of NAPOLEON III. If this hypothesis be correct, a new element of uncertainty is introduced into the foreign relations of France. All calculations based on the supposed disposition of the EMPEROR may be falsified if his policy is ordinarily dictated by the Minister of the hour, with the possibility of its being reversed at the last moment by the direct action of the Sovereign. It must be admitted, however, that the supposition is surrounded with great improbabilities. It is hard to believe that the crusade of the semi-official press against Belgium could have failed to attract the EMPEROR's attention, even if it had been commenced without his orders, or that M. ROUHER would have committed the Government so positively to the maintenance of the railway contracts without first ascertaining the Imperial pleasure on the subject. The most that can be said in behalf of the theory is that it is not more inconsistent with the character of NAPOLEON III. than the alternative explanation.

As far as the peace of Europe is concerned, it is greatly to be wished that this view of what has happened may be borne out by future events. In that case we may fairly hope that we have heard the last of the dispute. If the interview of the EMPEROR with M. FRÈRE ORBAN, and the sudden change of front which followed upon it, were really the first-fruits of his looking into the subject for himself, there can hardly be the same field for Ministerial mismanagement that there was before the EMPEROR had interfered. If, on the other hand, this theory has no foundation in fact, there is every reason to fear that the danger is only postponed. The action of the French Government can only be regarded as harmless on the assumption that there has been no unity of purpose at the bottom of it. If there has been this unity—if the men who have now suddenly lowered their flag, and professed themselves happy to promote those economic interests with which they are "exclusively occupied" by the means suggested by M. FRÈRE ORBAN, are the same who determined in the first instance to support the demands of the Eastern of France Company, and let loose the semi-official press upon Belgium—their retreat need imply nothing more than a conviction that the time has not come for carrying out their designs to advantage. The terms of the compromise recorded in the Protocol afford no warrant that the original pretensions of the French Government may not be revived hereafter. It will be easy to discover, at any stage of the inquiry which may be convenient, that the commercial necessities of France—nay, of Belgium, if properly understood—require a more thorough fusion of the Great Luxemburg and the Eastern of France lines than can be obtained while they are in the hands of separate Companies. If the Imperial designs have reference to something else than the expansion, legitimate or illegitimate, of economic interests, the mixed Commission will be found an admirable apparatus for keeping the Belgian question hot.

MR. BRIGHT.

MR. BRIGHT'S late speech on Irish land tenure was open to criticism on several grounds, inasmuch as it tended to excite dangerous hopes, while it was scarcely consistent with official loyalty and discipline. The experiment of selling lands in small parcels to actual occupiers involves neither a violation of economic principles nor an interference with the rights of property. The scheme, as it was first proposed, was to be applied to the estates of the great absentee owners, who were to be tempted by the offer of a premium beyond the actual value of their estates. It was doubtful whether the best and richest landlords in Ireland would be disposed to sell, and it is but fair to admit that Mr. BRIGHT never suggested the employment of compulsion. The Irish Church lands supply the means of carrying out the project, and Mr. GLADSTONE intimates his intention of giving Mr. BRIGHT the opportunity of establishing a specimen body of petty freeholders. As small purchasers are generally willing to pay high prices, the proposed mode of sale will not be detrimental to the public interest. If the buyers are really occupying farmers, able and willing to retain their freeholds, their example may perhaps be followed by degrees when other lands come into the market. Nearly all writers on the condition of Ireland assert that small freeholds will be underlet and subdivided, with the result of causing excessive population and extreme distress. The present wretchedness of the country is largely owing to the long leases of the last century, which deprived the owner of all control over the land. In the present day small properties, when they are sold, generally pass into the hands of the traders in the towns, who drive the hardest possible bargains with the tenants; yet it is possible that the simultaneous creation of a considerable number of small freehold holdings might tend to discourage ulterior subdivision. It would be desirable, if it were practicable, to attach a part of the population to the soil by any legitimate method. A freeholder who had bought his property with hard money would effectually unlearn any respect which he might previously have cherished for chimerical titles of two or three hundred years ago, or for prospective rights to be acquired by rebellion and confiscation. There would be little objection to any supplementary machinery of loans and repayments by which sales to small freeholders might be facilitated; but Mr. GLADSTONE would require a check on his tendency to deduce arbitrary results from ingenious combinations of figures. As long as Mr. LOWE presides at the Exchequer, there will be no reason to fear that Treasury loans will be surreptitiously converted into gifts.

Mr. BRIGHT'S policy, as far as it has been disclosed, is not incompatible with his pledges that any measure which he proposes or supports will be in accordance with the laws of political economy; but his speech in the Irish debate was certain to be understood as conveying an entirely opposite meaning. It is an inevitable inconvenience of public discussion that everything is overheard. A speech on land tenure which conveys to the Irish peasantry a false or mischievous impression is not justified even by intrinsic soundness. When Mr. BRIGHT dwelt on the expediency or necessity of giving the Irish farmers a permanent interest in the soil, he ought to have remembered that his words would be accepted as arguments for the expropriation of the landlords. The popular demand is not for an opportunity of purchasing from willing vendors, but for a fee simple of the land to be conferred on the actual occupiers, subject perhaps to an immutable quitrent. Mr. BRIGHT'S words have probably by this time been circulated throughout Ireland as a proof that a chief member of the Government admits the justice of the claims of the tenant-farmers. The qualifying words which may have been used, either in the speech itself or on former occasions, will be carefully forgotten; nor will the tone and temper which gave significance to Mr. BRIGHT'S language tend in any way to discourage popular delusion. In answer to a petulant opponent, Mr. BRIGHT repeated his former assertion that, if Ireland were removed to the other side of the Atlantic, the grievance of the present tenure of land would be summarily abolished. As if for the purpose of giving unnecessary offence, he added the explanation that he assumed, in his imaginary reform, the admission of Ireland into the American Union. There is no doubt that in the supposed case the country would be at once relieved of the burden of landlords, but not by their voluntary cession in exchange for the money value of their property If the land of Ireland ought to belong to the occupiers, and if it is desirable that the transfer should be effected as if Ireland were removed two thousand miles to the West, it seems to follow that summary and violent confiscation would be the proper remedy for Irish evils. ROBIN HOOD would have welcomed an admission of his right to kill the King's deer, and he would have wholly disregarded a condition that he should pay twenty-five years' purchase for the manorial rights of Sherwood Forest. It is especially incumbent on statesmen who advocate any portion of the claims of the Irish peasantry to define the limits of the concessions which they approve, and to abstain from vague and angry declamation.

It is a fair subject of inquiry whether, to use Lord SALISBURY'S language, "the views of Irish policy said to "have been expressed by the PRESIDENT of the BOARD OF "TRADE are to be taken as the views of the Cabinet;" and also whether the members of the Government object to Mr. BRIGHT'S assumption of an external and independent position. There is no reason to suppose that he is intentionally disloyal to his colleagues, nor has he on ordinary occasions caused any embarrassment by proclaiming extreme views; but a Minister who announces for the next Session an important measure, which has never been approved by the Cabinet, infringes the conditions of joint political action. Lord JOHN RUSSELL on more than one occasion compromised the Administration of which he was the head by sudden and unauthorized declarations; but a Prime Minister possesses exceptional privileges, and tacit acquiescence in his proposals is equivalent to a ratification. When Mr. BRIGHT spoke of an Irish Land Bill, he probably forgot for the moment that he was a Minister, and intended to commit no one but himself. A popular leader, who has been accustomed during his whole career to rely implicitly on his own judgment, is slow in familiarizing himself with official restrictions and scruples. If Mr. BRIGHT had been admitted to office twenty years ago he would have been more amenable to conventional rules. It is not impossible that he may hereafter feel the limitations on his independent action to be too irksome, or that his colleagues may find it necessary to dissolve the present connexion; but the Government would be seriously weakened by his secession, from whatever cause it might proceed. Unmanageable politicians cause least trouble when their movements can be partially hampered; and even if Mr. BRIGHT'S aid were less valuable to the Government, it is of the greatest importance to avoid his opposition. The PRIME MINISTER perhaps finds in Mr. BRIGHT'S strong opinions a support against the more timid and backward section of the Cabinet. Although it was necessary to disavow the future Irish Land Bill, Mr. GLADSTONE assented to the suggestion that the Irish Church property should be, in part at least, applied to the purposes of Mr. BRIGHT'S experiment. He was perhaps not deeply shocked by the exhibition of a rhetorical rashness of which he has himself furnished many examples. Liberal orators enjoy a great advantage over their opponents in the popularity which rewards their most extravagant utterances. A Conservative exaggeration almost always damages the party, while a concession to popular prejudice or cupidity is eagerly accepted by the multitude.

Mr. BRIGHT'S occasional eccentricities naturally encourage sanguine opponents in the hope that the Government may sooner or later split asunder from internal dissensions, and such a result may probably occur when the Irish Church question is disposed of; but its importance may be easily overrated. Unless the supposed rupture leaves Mr. GLADSTONE on one side and Mr. BRIGHT on the other, the compactness of the present majority will scarcely be disturbed. Whatever may be the ability of other members, or the soundness of their political principles, they have no independent hold on the Liberal constituencies. Members were pledged at the hustings, not to support any general principles or any shifting party, but to vote for Mr. GLADSTONE; and, as long as the PRIME MINISTER commands the confidence of an electoral majority, he may, like JUPITER in the Iliad, defy the united resistance of the other denizens of Olympus. A breach with Mr. BRIGHT would create a suspicion that Mr. GLADSTONE was relapsing into moderate opinions. Other members of the Cabinet would be simply denounced as seceders if they refused to follow their chief. Mr. BRIGHT is probably conscious of his power; and as he is personally indifferent to the possession of office, he has nothing to fear from any assumption of independence. It would be too much to expect that in dealing with dangerous questions he should, for the first time in his political life, practise a statesmanlike reticence. Having always relied on the power of numbers, Mr. BRIGHT inadequately appreciates the inconvenience of popular agitation; yet he ought to know that the adoption of his own policy would leave many hopes and demands unsatisfied in Ireland. When some thousands of freeholders are settled in their possessions, demagogues will still remind their followers that other great estates might be subdivided into desirable holdings. The benefits to be derived from annexation to the United States are singular topics for an English Minister to dwell on, in a speech which is virtually addressed to the disaffected classes in Ireland. If Mr. BRIGHT'S conduct as a Minister is not entirely satisfactory to moderate politicians, their censure ought to be wholly unattended by surprise.

THE ST. JAMES'S HALL DEMONSTRATION.

ON the 6th of May, 1868, a grand Church and State Defence Demonstration was held in St. James's Hall; on the 3rd of May, 1869, an equally strong Demonstration was held in the same place against the Irish Church Bill, and for much the same purpose, but with a very considerable difference. Last year an Archbishop of CANTERBURY presided; this year the excellent Lord HARROWBY was in the chair. In 1868 the Archbishop of YORK announced, amidst frantic cheers, that "we in the House of Lords should know how to "deal with the Bill if it ever came up to us." We do not find that either the Archbishop of YORK or any English Bishop was present at Monday's Demonstration, though the Irish Archbishops attended. When Drs. LONGLEY, THOMSON, and TAIT are superseded by Lord FITZWALTER and Mr. S. S. HARPUR, we are in a position to estimate the prospects of the cause which is so significantly deserted and so significantly maintained. First, let us observe what the meeting was. Appropriately it claimed to be a demonstration. But "demonstrate" is an equivocal term; its meanings are, as the dictionaries tell us, first, to show or make evident by reasoning, to prove by inductive or deductive process, to establish so as to exclude possibility of doubt or denial; and secondly, to exhibit and to show publicly. The first and most important sense of a demonstration the meeting of Monday did not aim at. The secondary sense we frankly admit that the speakers very fully illustrated. There can be no question that they made a very decided exhibition of themselves and their sentiments. It is a real relief to certain minds, if minds they can be called, to have their say. Ladies, we all know, some of us by experience, feel it to be their duty to have it out with their feelings, and to give it to their enemies or husbands, as they say. The important "it" shows how unimportant the thing said is considered, the process of saying it being the prime object of the surcharged orator, or, as the Americans call her, the oratress. Few can be so hard-hearted as to deny to the sufferer from accumulated ill-temper the physical relief of discharging the unpleasant secretions. We accord, because we cannot help it, even to Mr. GLADSTONE, the luxury of making twenty speeches all about himself in ten days; why should not Lord FITZWALTER have his little hour in a room which he pays for, and with an audience which he has taken care should be entirely of his own way of thinking? Nobody can deny the St. James's Hall speakers their pleasant pastime of having it all out; but the question remains whether those who seriously object to the Government measure on rational grounds, whether those who still cling with the desperate tenacity of logical politicians to the principles of PITT and the present Lord GREY, and Earl RUSSELL when he was a Minister, have any reason to be thankful to Monday's demonstrators. Just as Mr. NEWDEGATE thinks that Mr. WHALLEY is a disguised Jesuit, the suspicion will be raised that Lord FITZWALTER and Mr. HARPUR are secret emissaries of Archbishops CULLEN and MANNING. We have a reason for saying so.

Some of the speakers, at any rate, cannot be charged with having no policy, though Lord HARROWBY consoles himself with the cold comfort that Mr. GLADSTONE'S majority lacks cohesion, and is already going through a process of disintegration. We do not grudge his amiable Lordship the consolation which he feels from this discovery, confronted as it is, and one would think neutralized, by an inspection of the daily divisions in the Commons. Nor, again, do we care to disturb the complacency of another speaker, who proposes to move for a new trial, and assures himself that "when the issue is fairly put to the "country the QUEEN'S people will give their verdict against "the most unscrupulous, the most unconstitutional, and the "most dangerous Minister who ever lived." But these reflections on the present state of things are not of a very practical sort; when Mr. GLADSTONE'S majority of a hundred melts away, and when, after another general election, Mr. DISRAELI resumes office with an overwhelming majority, we shall of course be all right. But till these things come to pass, those who look forward to this happy consummation have no very practical policy to propose. Those who followed Lord HARROWBY cannot be charged, however, with being unpractical. Mr. J. C. COLQUHOUN, we are glad to find, has a definite scheme to deal with the present distress; so has Mr. G. S. HARPUR. Here, at any rate, is something which looks like business. Mr. COLQUHOUN, calmly and with historic eye scanning the situation, finds his precedent and his good omens in the great English Revolution of 1688. The last of the STUART Kings, backed by the power of Rome, and animated by the treasonable purpose of destroying the laws, liberties, and Protestantism of England, is faithfully reproduced by Queen VICTORIA, acting under the advice of Mr. GLADSTONE and his majority—"the most daring and "desperate band of men the country has seen since the times "of JAMES II." Like evils must be met by like remedies. We must rewrite the annals of 1688. As the Seven Bishops, the Oxford Doctors, and the Convention Parliament won the battle of English liberties and dethroned the Popish tyrant, so now "the people of England, led by the peers against "prejudice, against passion, against conspirators, and against "Rome, will assuredly win the day." Some elements of the parallel Mr. COLQUHOUN omits. He does not tell us who is to take the leading part in this new Revolution of WILLIAM the DELIVERER. The drama is neatly cast, but who is to play HAMLET? Where is the Dutch fleet and army to come from?

We can always make sure of another Protestant wind while Mr. Colquhoun's blasts of eloquence are forthcoming; but, on looking over the thrones of Europe, we have some difficulty in fixing upon the living Protestant hero who is to reproduce William of Orange. If the right man were to land next week in Torbay, with the avowed intention of resettling the national Protestantism and expelling Mr. Gladstone from Downing Street, we make no doubt that he would have as easy a march of it as the Prince of Orange had from Exeter to Whitehall; but who is the coming hero of Protestantism? Exoriare aliquis is Mr. Colquhoun's prayer. But where is the aliquis to come from? Will Mr. J. C. Colquhoun himself take the part? Or is he, like some of the Somerses and other statesmen of those old Revolution days, actually in correspondence with some of the unemployed and discrowned regalities on the Continent to come over and help us against the traitorous Gladstone and his Jesuit Confessors? Is there now, as then, a band of seven great Lords who, as in the old time, are ready to send an invitation to the Deliverer? The Earl of Harrowby, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Rutland, the Marquis of Bristol, the Lord Longford, the Lord Fitzwalter, and the Archbishop of Armagh seven good men and true at St. James's Hall—can they be the revival in the flesh, by some fortunate metempsychosis, of the famous Seven who conspired against James II. in the cloisters of Bisham Abbey? In a word, is another Glorious Revolution impending? Are we in for another battle of the Boyne? It looks like it, for the siege of Derry may already be said to have commenced, and the Bishop of Cork is quite equal to Walker.

Not that Mr. J. C. Colquhoun stands alone in these genial aspirations for another civil war. Mr. S. S. Harpur says openly, that "if this Bill were carried, the people of Ireland "would be justified in throwing off the yoke of this country"; and he asks, with significant derision, "whether the people of "England are so strong that she can dispense with a million "and a half of able arms and willing hearts?" As far as we understand this alarming threat, it means that the Ulster and other Irish Protestants, whose cipher we suppose amounts to this million and a half, are panting for rebellion. So, on the other hand, are too many of the Roman Catholics. If the Bill is passed, says Mr. Harpur, the Protestants ought to throw off the English yoke; if the Bill is not passed, say other people, the Papists will on the other hand be justified by throwing off the English yoke. Either way we are in for a civil war, which is a consoling thought, and which evidently is balm and oil to Mr. Harpur. We see but one way out of the Irish difficulty, which, exactly because it is impossible, is most suited to the Irish emergency. What if it could be so managed that both factions should be gratified by the excuse for rebellion, revolution, civil war, and bloodshed which they want? Let them both throw off the yoke; let both Fenians and Protestants hoist the standard of independence. We should for some reasons be glad to take these windy talkers at their word. The end would be the catastrophe, on a larger scale, of the Kilkenny cats; and we are not so sure that we in England should be the losers. With one serious word we dismiss this flatulent Demonstration. The trials to which the Irish Church is now subjected demand, if not the reverence, at least the sympathy, of those who have doomed it; but its worst enemies could not find a better justification for the severity with which it is treated than in the language of some of the St. James's Hall demonstrators, or, if we are to take Mr. Harpur as their type, these empty conspirators.

GERMAN CATHOLICISM AND THE COUNCIL.

II.

After dwelling on the real nature of the proposed dogma of Papal infallibility, the Allgemeine Zeitung proceeds to indicate its consequences, theological, ecclesiastical, and political. There will be an end of all laborious study either of Scripture or Church tradition, for who need waste time on it when any question can receive an infallible answer by telegraph in two or three hours? Theologians will have to devote their ingenuity not to unravelling the antiquated tomes of Prophets, Apostles, and Fathers, but to the interpretation of Papal Bulls; for it has happened before now that the place of a comma in one of these infallible documents (Pius V.'s Bull against Baius) has led to endless disputes. They will have a still harder task in reconciling the manifold contradictions of these oracular responses with each other and with themselves. It may suffice here to remind theological readers of the theory and practice of re-ordination according to Pope Formosus; the conflicting Papal decrees on infant communion; that fatal crux theologorum, Eugenius's IV.'s instruction to the Armenians on the Sacraments, which by direct implication upsets the validity of every ordination in Christendom for the first twelve centuries, and therefore of course of all since; of Paul IV.'s Bull, Cum ex apostolatus officio; of the contrary decisions of Nicolas III. and John XXII.; of Clement's VII.'s Bull Unigenitus, and the precisely opposite decisions of Benedict XIII. and Benedict XIV.; not to dwell here on the condemnation of the infallible Honorius for heresy by three infallible Councils, which Mr. Rénouf roused the fury of the Ultramontane press in England last summer by exposing with incisive accuracy. Nor is the significance of the new dogma less momentous in a social and political sense. For with the assertion of Papal infallibility all former decrees of Popes wake into inextinguishable life. Nullum tempus occurrit Ecclesiæ, and even in 1805, when the Papacy might seem to be at its lowest ebb of political influence, Pius VII. would only say that "the holy maxims of his predecessors against heretical monarchs" could not at that time be opportunely appealed to. Their operation was merely suspended for awhile for the sins of men. It must, therefore, be remembered that from Gregory VII. downwards the Popes have explicitly claimed full authority by Divine right over all temporal governments. The famous Bull of Boniface VIII., Unam Sanctam, claims for the Pope possession of "the two swords," and absolute superiority over all princes and peoples; kings can only exercise their authority ad nutum et patientiam sacerdotis, and in accordance with the Papal will. Fénélon says this Bull was the cause of Louis XIV.'s assertion of the Gallican Liberties. Its immediate result was the appeal of Philip the Fair, whom Boniface excommunicated, to a future General Council, and the secession to Avignon. But if the Pope be infallible, this and a host of similar doctrines are laws of eternal truth. And at Rome they are so regarded. A curious illustration of this may be given, which is not generally known. There is a letter from M. Puysieux, addressed under date of July 22, 1609, to the French ambassador at Rome, preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, from which it appears that James I. wrote to Paul V. offering to recognise his spiritual primacy and re-unite the English Church to Rome on condition only of his disclaiming political sovereignty over kings. The offer was promptly and peremptorily rejected.

Nor is this all. Not only the deposing power, but the persecution and murder of heretics, the Inquisition, the dispensation of the nearest degrees of kinship, will be raised into sacred principles. Urban II. authorized the murder of any excommunicated person; Innocent III. directed the horrible Albigensian crusade; Alexander III. declared the adultery of a priest to be a minor sin not deserving even temporary suspension; Clement VII. and others claimed authority to absolve sovereigns from all obligations or oaths to their subjects; Henry IV. of Castile was dispensed to marry a second wife during the life of the first, on account of her being childless, but, if no children were born to the second within a fixed period, was to return to the first; Urban V. gave Casimir the Great of Poland a dispensation for his marriage to his cousin, Hedwig, though his second wife, Adelaide of Hesse, was still living; Alexander VI. and Julius II., those bright models of sanctity, allowed Alexander, King of Poland, to put away his wife, because she remained in communion with the Greek Church, and this against his express oath not to interfere with her religion, at the time of their marriage; Clement VI. granted an indulgence to the Kings of France allowing them and their successors to break any oath they might find it inconvenient to keep (quæ vos et illi servare commode non possetis), with the exception of vows of chastity and vows "to the Blessed Apostles Peter and Paul"—that is, to the Holy See. All these Popes were alike infallible. Interest, under the name of usury, has been again and again infallibly condemned as sinful. The manifold complications of this doctrine of infallibility have led the Jesuits, who invented it, to extemporize the ingenious but arbitrary distinction between the Pope's statements ex cathedrâ and his statements as a private doctor, so that any inconvenient decree might be got rid of for the nonce by relegating it to the second category. But the defence is suicidal, for the endless quarrels as to what are the true criteria of an ex cathedrâ judgment reduce infallibility to an empty name. According to the moderate school of Ultramontanes—which Dr. Newman, in the Apologia, seems to support—the Pope has perhaps spoken infallibly some half-dozen times in history at the outside, and then only to say "what any good Catholic, of fair abilities, though unlearned, would say himself, from common and sound sense, if the matter could be put before him." According to the thoroughgoing and more consistent Ultramontanes, represented by the Civiltà at Rome and the Dublin Review in England, there is a perennial stream, not to say torrent, of infallibility which never runs dry at the Vatican, and the present Pope alone has added many volumes of infallible teaching on all sorts of matters to the inherited faith of Christendom. In short, any one possessed of a well-indexed collection of Papal pronouncements could put his finger in five minutes on the infallible answer to almost any question of intellectual or practical interest, putting aside pure mathematics, and, with certain important reserves, physical science. It would be well to burn all other books, like the Caliph who is said to have burnt the Alexandrian Library, for all which contradict the Papal decisions are pernicious, and all which agree with them are useless.

These, then, are some of the inevitable results of the definition of Papal infallibility which the Jesuits hope to extract from the approaching Council, acting under inspiration of the Holy Ghost and the Civiltà Cattolica. The mass of immoralities and contradictions which such a principle would evoke into new life from the past is portentous enough, and naturally presents itself with peculiar force to the historical genius of the German mind. But there is in fact a readier test for gauging in the very passage quoted in the Allgemeine Zeitung. The last

ope was the Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864, and this long string of propositions de omni scibili, all good Catholics, according to the Civiltà, hope to see expressly received and promulgated by the Council. The motive for this desire is obvious enough. The Syllabus contains, among other things, a recapitulation, in studiously unmistakeable language, of all the most extravagant claims and most obnoxious doctrines propounded by former Popes. To attempt to carry out its principles would be to revolutionize, not only the whole fabric of Christian society, but the deepest instincts of the Christian moral sense. An ingenious lady once suggested that theological controversies might be summarily disposed of by transferring the negative from the Commandments to the Creeds. We do not say that the Syllabus exactly does this; but to accept it ex animo would certainly oblige us to believe—what many Popes have taught by act as well as word—that in a vast number of cases treachery, oppression, and falsehood are preferable to their opposites. The "interests of the Church"—that is, the immediate aims of a well-drilled hierarchical police—would become the ruling standard of right and wrong. And when those aims could be most effectively promoted, as has frequently happened, by force or fraud, we should have to witness with admiring acquiescence a repetition of the policy of the forged Decretals and the Albigensian massacres. All would alike be shielded from criticism or resistance under the broad ægis of Papal infallibility. The Allgemeine Zeitung, after observing that the Syllabus would saddle the Church with "a large number of new doctrines hitherto unknown or constantly opposed, which would only be the first fruits of a rich crop of similar innovations in the future," proceeds to examine in detail the bearings of some of these 80 supplementary articles of the Creed, which must be believed on pain of damnation. One proposition (24) rules that the Church has "temporal power, both direct and indirect, and the right of using compulsion"—that is, the right to inflict civil and corporal punishment; or, as the Jesuit Schrader puts it, "Not only souls, but bodies, are subject to the power of the Church," and she may punish heretics with confiscation, imprisonment, the galleys, or the stake. The Church—that is, the Pope—is supreme over all earthly sovereigns, and, according to Schrader, no Popes have ever exceeded, or indeed can exceed, the just limits of their power. It follows, therefore, that Martin IV. was right when he handed over the kingdom of Pedro of Aragon to the French because he asserted his hereditary claims in Sicily, and Clement IV., when, in 1265, he threatened the millions of South Italy, whom he had sold to the Duke of Anjou, with interdict if their King ever omitted the payment of his yearly tribute to the Papal treasury. For these are not exceptional but specimen cases, and are clearly covered by the terms of the Syllabus. Moreover, not only must our consciences be remodelled, but our histories rewritten, to harmonize with the new standard of belief. It has always been hitherto supposed, and stated in all books on civil or canon law, that the immunity of the clergy from the civil courts came in gradually by concession of the Roman Emperors and later sovereigns, and is thus matter of political and human origin. By proposition 30 of the Syllabus this will be made heresy. The privilegium fori is part of the Divine law. It will also be heresy to say—what all historical evidence from the twelfth to the sixteenth century goes to establish—that the extravagant claims of the Popes were one main cause of the schism of East and West. "All Catholic authors who are writing historical or juristic works had better take care to publish them before December 30, 1869 (when the three weeks' Council is to be over), for thenceforth only the Jesuits and their dancing dogs can safely meddle with such subjects." In propositions 77, 78, 79, the whole civil and social system of the modern world, and the rights of conscience, are absolutely condemned. Even to allow foreign Protestants the enjoyment of their worship in a Catholic country is wrong in principle, though it suits the interests of the Papal Government to violate the principle at Rome. Freedom of opinion and worship produces "profligacy and the pest of indifferentism" according to proposition 79. "We are therefore bound to believe that those peoples among whom these liberties are fully recognised—the Germans, the English, the French, the Belgians—are the most profligate of men, while the Spaniards, Neapolitans, and Romans, who enjoy, or did enjoy till lately, the full blessings of religious intolerance, are conspicuous examples of virtue." The testimony of our eyes, as well as the testimony of conscience, reason, and history, must be sacrificed to the infallible Pope. The last proposition condemns the damnable error of those who think "the Pope should reconcile himself with modern civilization," to which Russia and the States of the Church form the solitary exceptions in Europe.

No doubt the modern principles of freedom and self-government are in glaring antagonism to the entire recent course of Roman ecclesiastical policy. "For centuries the hierarchical system has been more and more building itself up into a rigid oligarchical absolutism, and a constantly developing bureaucratic centralization has gradually killed out the life of the ancient Church in its harmonious disposition of parts and synodical self-government, or at least reduced it to an empty form." The whole spirit of modern life is at direct issue with Ultramontanism, and the close interdependence of Church and State on one another, under whatever system of established or unestablished Churches, cannot fail to bring them into sharp collision. The Ultramontane hatred of all free institutions is, therefore, a logical and inevitable corollary of their creed. Innocent III. emphatically condemned Magna Charta, "the honourable source and mother of all European Constitutions," pronouncing it null and void, and excommunicating the Barons who obtained it. The seed there sown has grown into a mighty tree, overshadowing half the civilized world; and as Innocent, in 1215, cursed the root, so his feebler successor, in 1868, cursed as "an unspeakable abomination" one of its youngest branches in the free Constitution of Austria. Yet this same pontiff, a few years ago, asked if he might not find a refuge, when driven from his own city, in this very England, the mother of these "demoralizing" principles of liberty! And so his partisans in this country, and notably their spiritual head, are constantly using and appealing to, for their own purposes, that very freedom of speech which, if they believe a word of what they teach, it will be their first duty to gag, should they ever get the power. Let it not be thought that this is a mere matter of formal professions, which those who make them only regard as a decent concession to the requirements of ecclesiastical etiquette, and would never dream of acting on. The abstract duty of persecution is openly advocated by all the leading spokesmen of the party, both in this country and abroad, though they are of course obliged to let it lie in abeyance till better times. It is distinctly laid down in a volume of essays published under Archbishop Manning's editorship, and reviewed in our columns two years ago. It is habitually defended in its fullest sense by the writers in the Dublin Review, and if they have not yet quite attained to M. Veuillot's magnificent capabilities of cursing, it is abundantly clear, from the tone of their arrogant abuse, that they only lack opportunity to substitute for the semblance of argument the more effective reality of an auto da fé. "The Civiltà and its allies will say, what has been often said already since 1864, that the Church must practise a wise economy and conform to present circumstances, but this submission or silence is only provisional, and is chosen as the lesser of two evils." The moment circumstances change, their policy will change too, all oaths or engagements to the contrary notwithstanding, for such oaths have no binding force. Thus Innocent X., in his Bull of November 20, 1648, condemned the Westphalian Peace, which was based on the principle of toleration, as null and void, and declared that no one was bound by any oath he had taken to observe it; and Pius VI., in 1789, renewed this censure in a letter addressed to the German archbishops. These "holy maxims," as Pius VII. called them, are not dead, but slumber for awhile. The Jesuits bide their time.

There is, indeed, one section of Ultramontanes who think any return to the happy reign of fire and faggot so hopeless that they anticipate a speedy end of this blind and God-forsaken world. Their views found expression, some years ago, in a pastoral of Cardinal Reisach's, then Archbishop of Munich, who was inspired by his Vicar-General, since dead—one of the very few men of ability the party has produced; but the larger and more influential section of Ultramontanes, and the Jesuits at their head, look for a thousand years' reign of Christ, that is, of the Popes, in more than mediæval power. And they expect this reign to be ushered in by the proclamation of Papal infallibility and the Syllabus at the ensuing Council. "Archbishop Manning, who has taken up the theory with the red-hot zeal of a convert, has announced that, when the new dogma is proclaimed, there will be a tempest for the moment, and then a great calm, and the Church will bask in a continual sunshine." Men will burn what they adored, and adore what they burnt, and all that has hitherto been regarded with distrust or aversion will be seen in its true light, and reverently accepted as the work and deed of God's infallible Vicar, the pure exhibition of eternal holiness and truth. The Allgemeine Zeitung thinks Dr. Manning may in one sense be right. There may be an external calm, but the principle, credo quia absurdum, finds no inner response in the heart of modern Europe. And it is with the mind as with the body; you may cram it till nausea and vomiting is the result. Niebuhr remarked long ago that it was no wonder so many Italians were Atheists, considering the impossibilities they are required to believe as part of the Gospel; and the proclamation of Papal infallibility would extend the terrible alternative from Italy to the Roman Catholic world. "A deep and permanent weakening of all belief throughout Catholic nations would be the immediate result of the decree, and opponents without and within the Church would point with triumphant scorn to this first consequence of exalting the caprice of the Curia above the traditions of the Church. As a companion picture to the Concilium Latronum of 449 we should be able to point to the Concilium Adulatorum of 1869—a Synod of Sycophants who smile away the truth instead of a Synod of Robbers who trample it to death."

TRICKS OF SPEECH AND MANNER.

THE vagaries of habit are a never-ending source of perplexed inquiry. How comes it that people fall into the queer habits, the tricks of speech and action, that distinguish them, often so disadvantageously, and divert our attention at critical or wrong times from what they say and do to the manner of their saying and doing it? There are people who, deliberately and through affectation, never let themselves alone; but we speak of those illustrators of the rapidity of the mind's action adduced by Locke, who by custom have acquired some eccentric action or got the use of a by-word, and in almost every sentence pronounce words which, though taken notice of by others, they themselves neither hear nor observe. The most opposite temperaments and degrees of intelligence fall into these habits—the impatient and the apathetic, the stupid and the intellectual, the great and the insignificant. Is there any common link to account for these awkwardnesses when we see them? for awkward they always are. We are not now concerned with legitimate traits of manner or character, but with abnormal excrescences and developments.

Without pretending to discover the reason for this exceptional deportment, some general distinctions are, we think, observable; as, for instance, that, where thought is rapid, it is the body which is set in uncongenial motion—where slow, the tongue is the offender. The abstract thinker has not tricks of speech, but of action; some independent and inappropriate movement betrays the theorist; as though the body, indignant at being forgotten, were for setting up business on its own account. While the mind pursues its speculations, the body paces uneasily to and fro, fitfully and without purpose, guided by some under-current of volition entirely outside consciousness or control. A man of this stamp will walk miles in an argument, or unfolding an idea, and at the end be unaware that he has ever left his chair. In the apathetic and sluggish temperament thought is accompanied by sedentary performances, twirling of thumbs—the conventional sign of Quaker stagnation—jerks, spasmodic quiverings or monotonous involuntary motions of knee and instep. Tricks of speech are surely not characteristic of vigorous thought in any form. The by-word is adopted as a stop-gap while reflection and memory drag. Facility and rapidity of utterance are very apt to slip into tricks. The mind cannot keep up with the tongue, which will not willingly, and indeed cannot, arrest its flow till the lingering idea come up.

Though, of course, all tricks may be pronounced ill-bred, though the fine gentleman and lady are incapable of them, and it is part of a polite education to subdue the demeanour into graceful sympathy with every occasion, yet high rank offers some of the most marked and curious illustrations of the bad habits we speak of. Kings, especially sticklers for prerogative, are notable examples of this. Walter Scott has given us the portrait of James I., grotesque in his involuntary awkwardness, toddling, hitching his chair, and fumbling his points and ribbons; and Peter Pindar made capital out of George III.'s well-known trick of senseless iteration. As in the scene at Whitbread's, where the King, upon being informed that the dray horses eat grains as well as hay and corn, exclaims:—

> "Grains, grains," said Majesty, "to fill their crops?
> Grains, grains?—that comes from hops—
> Yes; hops, hops, hops!"

And further, being reverently set right by the loyal brewer:—

> "True," said the cautious monarch, with a smile,
> "From malt, malt, malt—I meant malt all the while."
> "Yes," with the sweetest smile rejoined the brewer,
> "An't please Your Majesty, you did, I'm sure!"
> "Yes," answered Majesty, with quick reply,
> "I did, I did, I did, I, I, I, I"—

These are privileged eccentricities. Courts and courtiers only know them in royal and imperial personages. The exigencies of society are too pressing for lesser mortals. Tricks are ungraceful tokens of freedom, whether from the trammels of careful rigid training or from the demands of the hour. An original mind—a genius—will scarcely be without some singular or inelegant badge of emancipation from custom; nor will the dreaming wool-gatherer. In both there is sure to be an absence of exact accord between body and spirit. We do not observe tricks where these are in perfect understanding; where the outer frame is the attentive handmaid of a clear, but not too imperious or exacting intelligence; where each may be said to be conscious of the other. Where the mind is present to the scene around it, is not tempted to reverie, does not occupy itself on ideas which outstep the capacity of tongue, eyes, and limbs to express after their fashion, there is propriety and often grace. The thinker and philosopher on the one hand, and the absent, the slow, the dull on the other, are the natural victims of unreasonable movements, antics, set smiles, vacant irrelevant laughter, incoherent formulæ of words and unmeaning repetitions. In either case the body left to itself fills up gaps and vacuities by a pantomime of its own.

Not that all tricks are ungraceful; they may be simply perplexing. Hazlitt, taking a walk with Coleridge on their first acquaintance, observed that he continually crossed him on the way, shifting from one side of the footpath to the other. This at first struck him simply as an odd movement; afterwards he connected it with instability of purpose and involuntary change of principle. And in this way many tricks may be regarded as expressive. They are unmeaning for any present use, but a restless change of place or shifting from one leg to another, though betokening nothing to the purpose of the current topic, may indicate habitual vacillation or suspense of judgment; while the frowning scowl we sometimes see on good people, or the glittering grin which some faces show, while neither merry nor savage, from mere play of the muscles in the mind's abstraction, may betray an undreamt-of cynicism. Certain it is, whenever the face has an accidental ill trick of this sort, something sooner or later happens to account for it; that is, to any one on the watch for a reason.

The worst of tricks is that they exaggerate themselves in excitement when emotion or tragedy demands grandeur of action. Then the grinner grins with an added fierceness of impropriety, the biter of his nails gnaws the quick with a more terrible avidity, the thrummer and hummer, if the disease take a musical turn, thrums and hums with most distracting pertinacity. And whenever it is important that a man shall seem his best, there they betray him into more notable exhibitions. The curl or the moustache is tugged at more unrelentingly than ever, the legs writhed into more curious contortions, or turned and scrutinized with a more absorbed attention. We have heard of a preacher, accustomed in his cooler moments to fumble with his wristbands, who, in the pulpit, as he warmed to his subject and his ardour deepened, had a way of gradually baring his arms as far as linen and broadcloth would let him, till the climax found them naked to the elbow, prepared as it were to fight his congregation for the cause his eloquence had advocated.

Tricks of speech or action often characterize people who have risen into position or prominence by genius or good-fortune. This probably arises from a consciousness, more or less dim and unacknowledged, of unfitness for a new sphere. These words or actions began as the shelter and resource of shyness, which must be doing something immaterial while thought hesitates. This is a state in which habit will spread deep roots; the familiar phrase sinks into the man's very nature, and once firmly adopted is all but ineradicable. Wilkie had a trick of speech of this sort, which it is very improbable would have haunted him if he had remained in Scotland, and followed some humble calling. "Do you know," said Calcott to him, "that every one complains of your continued rea-al-ly?" Wilkie mused a moment, looked at Calcott, and drawled out, "Do they rea-al-ly?" "You must leave it off." "I will rea-al-ly." "For Heaven's sake don't go on repeating it," said Calcott; "for it annoys me." Wilkie looked, smiled, and in the most unconscious manner, said, "Rea-al-ly!" In Wilkie's case, whose tongue was not his instrument, this peculiarity, as showing a simple nature, is not unpleasant. We think of him more as a painter since his genius, thought, and recollection all went into his art. But people who are not geniuses sometimes become intolerable to susceptible nerves from some unmeaning expletive having grown to their tongue's end as it were. And there is no phrase too futile to serve for every conversational purpose, when a weak head and a shy embarrassed manner have to make their way as they can amongst new people and scenes.

Even a harmless trick is to be avoided and guarded against; for, like snuff, it soon comes to be indispensable not only to comfort but to efficiency. The modern Greek, we are told, is not—or was not—himself, without his string of beads to pass between his fingers, and Madame de Staël used to be provided by her friends with a sprig of myrtle to assist her eloquence. We now and then see the most curious performances carried on by the fingers, while the thoughts are intently engaged in an interesting topic. We have known a stick of sealing-wax gradually reduced to a thread in the course of a discussion by a man who could not talk without some vent for his activities, and the contents of a lady's work-box cut into fragments in the course of converting her to his views. Whittling, the trick of the backwoodsman, so gigantic in its prevalence and its destructiveness, is a national characteristic suggestive of unbounded hyperbole to the local wit and humourist. Scott in his autobiography tells a story against himself illustrating his early perception of personal peculiarities. One boy was always above him in his class, and, do what he would, he could not pass him, till, observing him always fumbling at a lower button of his waistcoat as he answered a question, it occurred to him to cut it off on the sly. He watched with some anxiety for the result. The ruse answered only too well. When the boy was again questioned his fingers sought for the button; missing it, in his distress he looked down for it in vain. "He stood confounded," says the penitent aggressor. "I took his place, nor did he ever recover it, or suspect the author of his wrong." This story, however, tells two ways. Doubtless some bodily habits establish associations favourable to the memory, and quieting to irritability; the mischief is that the mind becomes dependent, and is stranded when cut off from the old moorings.

The twitchings which disturb some pleasant countenances with involuntary action may or may not be tricks, and therefore can only be hinted at. But the laugh which some persons indulge in must have been at some time under control, and is nothing else than a trick in its continuance beyond the occasion and singularity of intonation. Yet often such eccentricities are only outlets of an irrepressible originality, and perhaps there is not one of the friends or acquaintances we most value but has some distinction of the sort, not good or graceful in itself, but which becomes him, or at least is pleasant as lending a colour and characteristic to what we admire and value. It is a token of unconsciousness, and, it may be, of simplicity. So long as people have strong points to our mind, we like them to have an assailable side—one open to amused comment and good-natured derision. It is probable that we, as a nation, are subject to these little disorders. Free gesticulation is an outlet for superfluous activities, and a ready utterance and facile verbiage are a similar preservative from tricks of the tongue. Healthful bodily exercise, a life of sober, steady labour, generally exempts from them among ourselves. People who are busy with their limbs all the day can rest them in quiet. They will be awkward when called to unaccustomed exertion, but will not be habitually eccentric in movement. It requires an amount of leisure and voluntary action to develop these singularities. The vacant open mouth, as much a trick as any other, belongs to no handicraft. It is seen in the girl who chooses to be idle mentally and bodily. The tricks of impatience and impetuosity are observed where labour is not compulsory, however congenial; in fact, tricks generally are an expressive, however ill and awkward, assertion of liberty of action, and began in some exercise of independence, in however unconscious defiance of convention.

MR. H. TAYLOR ON HABITUAL CRIMINALS.

MANY persons will be attracted by Mr. Taylor's name to an article in the current number of Fraser's Magazine. The cause of attraction will be the position and reputation of the writer. Mr. Taylor is known to the general world as the author of Philip Van Artevelde. To a smaller circle he is known—less favourably—as the author of the Statesman. To a still smaller circle, again, he is familiar as the real controller and director of the Colonial Office. While the outer world has been accustomed to regard Earls Grey, Russell, and Granville, or the Dukes of Newcastle and Buckingham, as the chiefs who moved and governed the Colonial Empire of Great Britain, the esoteric world has more accurately credited with this vast responsibility the poet who condescends to work a Greater Britain from a clerk's desk in Downing Street. That powers so ubiquitous and so vast should attract attention when exercised on a new field of speculation, is not wonderful. People like to contemplate the labours of an intellect which the supervision of forty colonies is insufficient either to exhaust or to satisfy. And to those who, like ourselves, find in Mr. Taylor an ally and a fellow-worker, the contemplation is doubly gratifying. The gratification is enhanced by the fact that there is, after all, not very much that is new in Mr. Taylor's paper, and that we have in our own humble way said nearly the same thing ourselves. If we ventured—only we do not venture—to criticize the virtual ruler of transmarine England, we might be so bold as to hint that the essay, with the majesty, combines also the obscurity, of genius. But we shrink from such audacity. Ought we not rather to be grateful when he emerges from the humble and unpretending station in which he pulls the wires of his department, and condescends to talk with us outer barbarians about our convicts and our felons, the ruffians who assail us in the streets, and the burglars who violate the tranquillity of our homes? We are grateful for his condescension, and more grateful for his help; and especially grateful for the elasticity of a department which allows its most important and hardly-worked officer to occupy himself with the ordinary cares of ordinary men.

We are pleased to find that Mr. Taylor repudiates the canting creed which proclaims its sympathy with the perpetrators, but has none with the victims, of crime He thus gets rid of the antecedent objection to life-long imprisonment in the case of hardened and oft-convicted criminals. He brings also before the mind, though perhaps with insufficient force and clearness, the reflection that every ruffian who has been but once convicted has wrought a huge amount of wrong and violence on innocent persons, for which he has never been brought to justice at all. And he shows that a hardened offender of the criminal class, even as it now is, does by his manifold kinds of crime, at one time light and at another heavy, often subject himself to imprisonment which is all but life-long in its duration. He illustrates this position by the biography of a Mr. Smith, who, within ten years, underwent periods of imprisonment amounting to seven years, and then was sentenced to six years more. Mr. Taylor's natural inference, and one which is confirmed by the experience of magistrates, gaolers, and policemen, is that these imprisonments are not deterrent, and that some more effective punishment remains to be devised. His theory is, that increasing lengths of imprisonment do not make a corresponding impression on the mind of the prisoner; and that, though he dreads a fifteen years' incarceration more than one of five years, he does not fully realize the respective magnitudes of the two. At least, we suggest that this is the true meaning of the mystic passage:—"It does not follow that computations of severity by duration are made in like manner with severity by differing intensities of immediate and paulo-post future inflictions." The upshot is, according to Mr. Taylor, that all the suffering represented by penal imprisonment beyond the shorter term is suffering thrown away. Twenty years are not more deterrent than ten, he says. But why does he stop at ten? why not say five, or two? Is he not here confounding two things—the temporary recklessness of the man who commits unpremeditated violence, and the proved inefficacy of certain punishments on habitual criminals? There are men who commit great crimes—murder, rape, and assaults approaching to murder—under circumstances which preclude all reflection at the moment of their commission. They are mad with drink, lust, or wrath, and they are incapable of thinking at all, while this æstus is on them. Would Mr. Taylor say that this fact would justify the curtailment of their punishment? It is usually cited by the opponents of capital punishment as fatal to the reasonableness of the extreme penalty. Would Mr. Taylor admit this argument? Would he not rather say that the deterrent effect of capital punishment is general, and that the fear of it regulates men's usual conduct, and moulds their ordinary habits, although it may fail to affect all men in an equal degree, or to exercise its normal sway under abnormal conditions? No man when he stabs another in a fray thinks of the gallows; but in how many men's minds is the commission of murder associated with a violent and ignominious retribution? How many men's conduct does not the horror of such an end insensibly modify? How many does it not wean from scenes and haunts of violence or intemperance? The fact is that there are men whom no punishment will deter either from grave or petty crimes. But as it would be unreasonable to abolish capital punishment because, despite of its terrors, men are still found to commit murder, so it would be unreasonable to limit penal imprisonment to its shortest term because certain criminals appear to be indifferent whether they are imprisoned for ten or for twenty years. For our part, we believe that only by a small portion of the really criminal population is this indifference either exhibited or felt. No one who has ever been present in a court of justice when a sentence of penal servitude for life has been passed on a prisoner can have failed to observe the stupefaction and dismay which fell upon the convicted man and his friends. And this should be borne in mind. It is not only by the possible criminal himself, but by his friends, associates, and kinsmen, that the deterrent effect of every punishment is felt. It is the knowledge of the disgrace which may be reflected on them by him that operates to shield a man from the temptations which induce to crime. Of course this reasoning does not apply with equal strength to the habitual criminal. But it applies to him in an inchoate state. It applies to him while he is tremblingly taking up the profession of crime. Imprisonment, its disgrace, its annoyances, the vexations and disgrace which it entails on his family and friends, all these are matters of reflection to the unhardened tyro. Other reflections come into the mind of the man who has deliberately chosen crime as a profession. And these reflections—we differ from Mr. Taylor in thinking—distinctly involve a comparative computation of the penal consequences which attach to different degrees of crime. Every man who is familiar with Assize Courts knows how often it is shown that the prisoner stopped short at a certain degree of violence in order to avoid a heavier penalty in the case of conviction. That all prisoners do not compare and compute in this way proves nothing against the longer periods of imprisonment. But the fact does suggest certain considerations on the nature of imprisonment. Mr. Taylor's view is that, in the case of criminals who have been thrice convicted, there should be what he calls "protective" imprisonment—protective, that is, not of the prisoner, but of the public. The nature of this imprisonment may best be gathered from his own words:—;

> It should be divided, we will say, into three successive terms, of five years each, the first of which should be exempt from any rigour of discipline not required for the maintenance of order and for pecuniary purposes, whilst each of the others should bring with them more and more of indulgence. During the first so much labour should be enforced as would provide the cost of the prisoner's subsistence on prison diet, such cost to be computed as for a diet regulated under the provisions of the Prisons Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vic., c. 126, § 21). But after so much labour shall have been exacted as may be sufficient to pay for his prison diet and other costs of his confinement, the prisoner should be at liberty to improve his diet, so far as food is concerned, by the fruits of any additional labour he may be disposed to employ for that purpose. In the second quinquennial term he should be privileged to provide himself, at his own cost, by additional industry, with tobacco and a duly limited quantity of spirituous or fermented liquors, and with harmless books, whether instructive or entertaining, and with any other innoxious articles which may contribute to his comfort and enjoyment. In the third quinquennial term he should enjoy, in addition to the privileges of the second, that of absence on leave within prescribed limits of time and place, and on prescribed conditions, one of which should be that he shall have previously earned by prison labours such a sum of money beyond his current cost to the establishment, as will enable him to subsist without temptation to dishonesty for the period of his permitted absence. For the remaining portion of his life, besides leaves of absence with more liberal conditions as to time and place, he might be allowed to receive visits in prison, more frequently and freely than before, from any respectable person of his own sex whom his leaves of absence might have afforded him an opportunity of interesting in his welfare All these privileges, from first to last, must of course be made to depend upon continued good behaviour and the strict observance of all prescribed conditions.

In this plan we see the old system of marks, tickets of leave, allowances, &c., kept alive. There may be some novelty in the details, but none in the principle. We do not say that such a scheme would not work at all, but it appears incapable of working in many conceivable cases. The first difficulty is, how to apply it to those men who forswear all labour, have never laboured, and vow that they never will labour at anything at all except stealing from the person or from a private dwelling-house. All this distribution of quinquennial privileges will be lost on a man who goes into prison with the sullen determination to eat and drink his full prison allowance, and to give not one jot of work in requital. In the case of such a man, the punishment becomes perpetual imprisonment. This may not be undeserved by the culprit, and it may also be for the protection of the public. It certainly will be both in the case of the man who has been reared and educated in crime and for crime. But it is not the protective imprisonment intended and described by Mr. Taylor. And to carry it out would require not only new gaols and new rules, but also a new classification of crime. Nor would these be the only requisites. It would further require a new sentiment on the part of the public. For, as yet, the public is not prepared to see a man imprisoned for life, even with the limitations of Mr. Taylor's plan, except by way of commutation for a capital sentence. It will be necessary to educate the public mind on this subject. And by way of beginning this education, we submit the following statement of Mr. Taylor:—In 1866-7, the proportion of recommitments to the total of commitments was 38 per cent. The whole number of those once, twice, and thrice recommitted was upwards of 32,000; the whole number of those more than thrice recommitted was near 14,000; and the numbers of those recommitted more than ten times nearly equalled the numbers of those recommitted thrice—the one being about 3,900, and the other about 4,700. When these numbers approximate so nearly, it becomes a question whether the best use to which a professional criminal can be turned be not that of being kept in perpetual confinement. When we reflect that already the whole number of criminals, convicted and presumable, is over 112,000, we see the urgent necessity of some substitute for the transportation which we cannot revive. Had Mr. Taylor's article been written with more clearness and less pretentious dogmatism, it might have been a valuable contribution towards the solution of a difficult problem. As it is, its heavy style detracts from its inherent value.

DINNER-GIVING.

No wise or good man would depreciate the importance of the art of dinner-giving. The happiness of a large number of educated persons, so far as it depends upon social enjoyment, is principally determined by the nature of their dinners. The growth of this monstrous metropolis constantly increases the difficulty of indulging in other social pleasures. Theatres are apparently arranged with the express purpose of making it as troublesome to reach them, and as unpleasant to stay in them, as possible. Evening parties of all kinds recall tortures of dreariness and discomfort from which the male imagination shrinks in despair. But at dinners, however unsatisfactory, one has at least the power of falling back upon a certain amount of sensual enjoyment. If the worst comes to the worst, if the guests are sulky and silent, and the dinner has all the faults to which dinners are liable, we can at least enjoy the negative comfort of quiet sitting; and after a day's work that is a pleasure not to be altogether despised. A good dinner, again, where sensual is skilfully combined with intellectual gratification, may give the pleasures of society in their highest form. It is worth while, therefore, to consider the bearing of any of the changes which are gradually modifying one of our most cherished institutions. We cannot defend too jealously any of the principles on which its purity depends, nor would a wise Conservative retain certain forms which are obviously unsuited to the habits of the day.

Dinners may be divided into two classes, according to the predominance of one of the two main objects for which they have been instituted. The class in which the sensual enjoyment is the main purpose, or even a very conspicuous purpose, should perhaps be called feasting rather than dining. The occasions on which our forefathers consumed two bottles apiece of thick, black, stupefying port; those in Scotland, when a servant was told off to keep sober in order to loose the gentlemen's neckcloths as they reposed under the table, were proofs that the barbarous instincts of the savage were not quite extinct. Though eating regular daily meals, we unfortunately retain a capacity, if we like to use it, for the ravenous feeding with which the wild Indian makes up for long periods of semi-starvation. The practice has not utterly died out; there are bachelors' dinners in which eating and drinking is the end rather than the means; and the British alderman, if we may give credit to the legends which occasionally circulate in civilized society, is capable at times of a performance for which gorging is a more appropriate name than dining. It is a profanation to apply the same word to a satisfaction which we enjoy in common with the Esquimaux when swallowing twelve pounds of blubber, and to that which has been pronounced by a philosopher to be one of the main objects of civilization—the collection of a number of agreeable people with their legs under the same mahogany. It is therefore the fundamental canon of dining, in a lofty sense, that the food consumed should be only of that quantity which a rational being may think upon without regret, because it is enough to stimulate, without overpowering, our social instincts. As a practical test, it may be said that whenever the meat or the drink becomes a substantive topic of conversation, instead of a merely incidental subject of reference, the dinner belongs to the lower or semi-barbarous category. Rightly understood, this principle does not tell against refined skill in cookery or excellence of wines; it merely implies that they should be kept in due subordination to the more essential objects of the meeting.

A dinner, therefore, may be defined as a gathering for the purposes of pleasant conversation, and the art of dinner-giving is a branch of the art of promoting sociable talk. Hence we may deduce some obvious conclusions as to modern methods of society. Conversation, it is sometimes said, is a lost art. When we read of the great lights of former days who studied it seriously, and attained real eminence for their skill, we feel that reputation of that kind is almost unattainable to the same degree. One reason is obvious. Conversation of any brilliance demands a comparatively small and select society. It is the natural product of a time when the town was composed of a few cliques in the constant habit of meeting. Talking, like all varieties of eloquence, depends as much upon the audience as upon the speaker. It requires a favourable medium as well as a powerful performer. The great talker should be surrounded by a little court who are able to take the less conspicuous parts of the game. An actor cannot do himself justice unless he knows that he will be properly supported. He is easily damped if he cannot reckon confidently upon the sympathies of his audience. When he throws the ball it must be returned to him quickly; he must have some assistance in bringing out his favourite topics, and must know what blows will tell. The good talker, in short, resembles those ingenious gentlemen who exhibit tricks with the three cards for the benefit of an intelligent public; if they had not unavowed confederates in the company they would never be able to get up the proper degree of enthusiasm. A brilliant conversationalist has always two or three friends who spontaneously take the same part; he has his regular butt and his regular opponent, who is ready to go through the regular parade of fencing, and to bring out his most brilliant thrusts and parries. Boswell tells us of some one who was called the literary anvil, because Johnson's sledge-hammer used to bring out so many sparks by striking upon him. If the great doctor had been taken away from his ordinary surroundings, from Goldsmith and Burke and Reynolds, he would have been at a loss, and half his good things would probably have missed fire for want of a congenial atmosphere. For this reason we have little doubt that better conversation is frequently to be found in provincial towns, where a few clever men are in the habit of meeting and learning each other's style of play, than in the metropolis, where so vast a crowd is usually shuffled and mixed together. Good talk is common where there is something in the nature of a foreign salon to serve as a practising ground in which a few people meet to sharpen their weapons and get rid of the shy reserve which is fatal to happy conversation. In proportion as society extends and becomes more miscellaneous, we must be content to lose the high art of talking. There is, however, a good deal of compensation to be found. In the first place, there is no greater bore upon earth than the skilled professor of conversation. Many of the great men of old undoubtedly said very good things, and every one would be glad to have an evening with Johnson, if spirit-rappers could recall him without making him talk in the style of the mediums. But in the reports which excite our envy, we lose that impression of overbearing and monopoly of the conversation which must have made many of these great performers a weariness to the flesh; we forget the vexation which others besides Goldsmith must have felt when they were invited to be silent because the great doctor was going to speak. Democracy generally produces the evil that there is less elaboration of the highest works of art; but in society the greatest pleasure is probably produced on the democratic theory, where every one can take his share and nobody is either able or willing to usurp the control of the company.

We must be content, then, to abandon the old ideal when people came early and sat long, and the appropriate entertainment was provided by a long dissertation from some self-constituted autocrat of the dinner-table. Compensation must be sought in the greater variety and equality of modern society; where we may expect to meet daily some new person who is familiar with remote regions of speculation or of the world. We shall not often see the exhibition of perfect dialectical skill, or listen to an outpouring of a careful collation of anecdotes and facetiæ. But, on the other hand, we should be able to meet men familiar, say with Chinese metaphysics, or with the central parts of Africa, or with the furthest recesses of the solar system. Such a man ought not, it is true, to be encouraged to talk like the book which he is probably writing, or to pitch out raw masses of information upon our heads. But if he is a clever man his mind has probably been enriched by his knowledge, and he is able to look at things from a new point of view, and to supply fresh illustrations of ordinary topics. A great traveller, for example, need not bore us with facts about the peculiar dialects of Central Asia; but, without directly indulging in actual "shop," he can probably contribute new elements to the conversation. The hours allowed for meeting are generally shorter than in former days. Consequently, it should be the main object of a host to bring his guests together as rapidly as possible, and to raise the social temperature to that pitch at which people begin spontaneously to emit light; and, without pomp, to talk freely and easily upon the topics of the day. Now it is the main fault of modern dinners that this object is very seldom secured or even definitely aimed at. The dinner-giver catches the last new lion, at some trouble, and exults over his capture. So far there is nothing to be complained of. In spite of a certain prejudice against lions, we are all glad to see them, and to hear them roar in moderation, and we know that feeding-time is propitious to that process. But the subsequent arrangements are generally devised as if with the express purpose of making the roaring inaudible. In the first place, we have given up the practice of introducing, doubtless on the ground of its apparent formality, and we laugh at Americans for their elaborate system of carrying a guest round the room, and making him shake hands with everybody in succession. But the practice, as has been recently hinted at, has its advantages. In spite of its clumsiness if badly done, it at any rate prevents the common catastrophe, when strangers are left in the perfect solitude of a crowd, and find great difficulty in surmounting the preliminary barriers to conversation. The duty of giving a man a chance to show what is in him is too generally neglected from an exaggerated fear of making him awkwardly conspicuous. The proper medium no doubt requires skill; but a person who wishes to give a really pleasant dinner should not shrink from attacking a problem whose solution is necessary to success. We collect crowds, and then make no attempt to bring them into harmony. In the next place, we put our lion down on one side of a table so broad, according to the modern detestable fashion, that it requires the voice of a Stentor and the impudence of a Thersites to address anybody across it. We plant on each side of him the ladies, who are carefully selected, it is true, but most frequently not on account of any presumable congeniality with their neighbour, but with a view to some imaginary requirements of social precedency. And, finally, by way of quenching any sparks of general conversation, we erect in the centre of the table a huge display of works of art or botanical products, which would be very pretty at a flower-show, but puts the unfortunate victim into isolation as strict as the gentleman in a portrait with large red curtains on each side, and two or three cannons firing in the distance. The old methods of establishing a communication by such artless modes as drinking wine or proposing toasts are rigidly, and not without reason, proscribed; and the result often is that a pleasant companion passes an evening about as cheerful as that of a prisoner in solitary confinement, with no other recreation except what he may gain from an occasional talk with the visiting chaplain. After which we complain that London dinners are frequently dull, and that conversation is apt to be limited.

It is difficult to lay down any code of laws for the remedy of these evils, and in fact it is essential to pleasant society that there should not be anything in the nature of absolute laws. But one or two results are plain. In the first place, small parties are generally pleasanter than larger ones, because those awful breaches of continuity which sometimes cut off from each other two people who are disposed to be sociable become impossible. We get rid of the lumps of non-conducting resistance. In the next place, whether large or small, it is preposterous to collect a number of persons, presumably for social purposes, and then to erect so many physical and moral barriers between them as inevitabl to keep them at arm's length. Dinner is the period at which th most morose of mankind are sensible of a certain expansion o their social instincts. It is a singular solecism that we should contrive, by an unreasonable system, to make it as difficult as possibl to give free play to our sympathies Wine and meat ought to b transmuted into warmth of feeling; too often their action is limited to their mere physical consequences, and a dinner-party breaks up just as the ice is beginning to thaw under the heroic efforts of a few exceptionally unquenchable spirits. That dinners should be short is inevitable; that they should be too large is rather to be lamented than condemned; but it is a pity when they are attended with such elaborate solemnities that a modest man has not time to get over his natural reserve.

ARMY ORGANIZATION.

IN spite of the excitement, such as it is, of Irish remedial legislation and Irish sedition and crime, the thought of the country is drifting fast in a very different direction. Military organization will soon become the question of the day, and the newly developed temper for striking at the root of indefensible abuses must before long sweep away such peddling projects of reform as the wisdom of our rulers has as yet been able to mature. The one great measure which the Government has introduced on the subject is a Militia Bill, which proposes to revivify that ancient force by giving a few extra shillings a day to the officers, and by allowing Militia Colonels who cannot find subalterns to obtain the assistance of Lieutenants of the Line. No one can deny the harmless nature of the proposed changes, but to put them forward as the official respons to the universal demand for increased military efficiency is one of the most ludicrous of the many small efforts of our army rulers. Meanwhile the great question remains unsolved, how the strength of the country may be made available in the event (not very imminent, perhaps, but certainly not very improbable) of a gigantic war. Our army expenditure is about on the same scale as that of the greatest military nations, and on a pinch we might be able to place in line upon a foreign field of battle about one-tenth of the force which either France, Russia, Austria, or Prussia could singly oppose to us. True, behind our little handful of regular troops we have about as many more Militia, something less than half-drilled, and with little more knowledge of the use of a rifle than they had when they were following the plough. It has always been the fashion to speak respectfully of this constitutional force as it is called, and no one doubts that, as raw material for making soldiers, most of the Militia regiments—though inferior in physique to the army, and probably also to the Volunteers—would be found most valuable when their services were called for, if there were only time to train them to a fair standard of efficiency. Their numbers, however—as the numbers of a paid force raised by voluntary enlistment must be—are altogether deficient in time of peace, and we have to look further abroad for the means of creating a national army. We shall be told that we have the Volunteers; and, as far as mere numerical strength is concerned, there is no doubt that the force could grow to any dimensions that might be desired, if occasion called for rapid recruiting. But they, like the Militia, would require some interval of time, though probably much less than army pedants assume, to fit them for the rough work of war. With the exception of a few crack regiments which have been trained almost up to the standard of professional troops, they are not very much more advanced in drill than average Militiamen, though the majority of them are immeasurably superior in rifle practice, not only to the Militia, but to most of the regiments of the Line. In actual present efficiency (creditable as their manœuvring, even in large bodies, is always said to be by the Inspectors and Generals whose duty it is to report upon it) they have much to acquire; and the redeeming points about them are an energy which would enable most of them to compass a twenty miles' march without straggling, and an intelligence that would enable them to complete their military education, when once they were called out, with a rapidity which officers accustomed to train the average army recruit would consider quite incredible.

These are the materials at our disposal, and the best way of utilizing them has yet to be discovered. Opinions range over the widest possible area. There are some who, with more enthusiasm than prudence, would imitate the American policy, and rely almost entirely on what they could make of a countless body of Volunteers in the short interval which might elapse after a declaration of war. Theorists of this stamp are always of the non-intervention school, and would answer the objection that their army, when made, could not be sent abroad, by the assertion that the proper place for an English army is within the four seas. But a man need not wear a red coat to see that, even for purposes of defence, the method of counter-attack may often be the most effective; and though it is very likely that, on a sufficient occasion, volunteers for foreign service would be found in abundance in the ranks of such a civilian army, it is obvious that no prompt action could be attempted at the commencement of a war. Even the Americans, who alone have tried the experiment on a large scale, found, in the first year of their civil war, that neither their officers nor their men had acquired the military aptitude for which they were afterwards so greatly distinguished. Practically, this purely volunteer system has nothing to recommend it except that it would provide soldiers when called for in almost unlimited numbers, and would reduce the cost of the army when on a peace footing to a minute fraction of what it now amounts to. Economy and numerical strength are, it is true, the two first elements of military power, but, out of America at any rate, they need to be supplemented by other considerations. While it is impossible not to reject this, which we may call the mad-civilian theory of army organization, there is at least as much to be said against the mad-military ideas which form the opposite extreme of the floating opinion of the day. Starting with the acknowledged and obvious fact, that a soldier ready trained in peace time will be far more efficient on the outbreak of war than one who has half his lesson to learn, the ultra-professional school would be willing to sacrifice both numbers and economy to the creation of a highly-finished machine such as the British army. The most extravagant of military organizers would not, perhaps, venture to suggest that our normal army estimates should be more than, say, double those of the great military empires; and yet even if we went as fas as this, the strength which we could put out would be utterly insignificant when judged by the standard of modern armies. It is true that the cost of the Volunteers might be saved by disbanding the whole force and substituting one enlisted soldier for every Volunteer company, but even this would add but a battalion or two to the Line, and we should be driven to fight with odds of ten to one against us, or to decline fighting altogether. Finished excellence is an admirable thing in an army, as in everything else, but it is fearfully expensive, and it has no element of expansion in it. A million of raw or half-drilled men might possibly gain little advantage over 100,000 first-rate troops in a short campaign, though even then numbers would be apt to tell; but every day would improve the one host while it thinned the other, and at the end of six months we should see the rough levies growing into a vast and formidable army, while their opponents were dwindling into a handful of disabled veterans. For military purposes numbers and skill should never be divorced, but of the two, numbers with only limited skill have a vast prospective advantage over the highest skill with limited numbers, because skill can be improved very much more easily than numbers can be augmented. And to this view all the great military nations are coming round. They have different systems, none of them suitable in detail to the circumstances and prejudices of this country, but the leading idea of them all is of universal application, and our Government is the only one which has not found it out. No country can be strong without both a nucleus of highly-drilled troops and a very large reserve of partially-trained men ripe for speedy conversion into effective soldiers. Add to this a rational organization of the whole, capable of easy and rapid expansion, and you have all that need be desired.

It is remarkable that every professional or Ministerial project for the organization of army reserves which has been propounded of late years has set this plain principle at defiance. Complicated schemes for grouping together a few worn-out pensioners and time-expired soldiers have been prepared, but they have all failed to provide the numerical strength without which reserves are of little account. The schemes for converting soldiers into Militiamen and Militiamen into soldiers all have had the same defect, and the one essential condition of putting the real strength of the nation in a state of readiness for military training and military organization has never for a moment been kept in view. There is one source, and one only, from which a reserve of adequate numbers can be obtained, and that is the Volunteer body; but nothing whatever has been done to give them such an organization as would render their transformation into an efficient army an easy or even a possible task. A certain very variable measure of proficiency in drill has been acquired, which would give them an enormous start, when war broke out, over a body of raw recruits; but mere drill is far less important than organization, and this the military authorities have steadily refused to bestow upon them. Lord Northbrook intimated, in a recent debate, that some project of the kind was under consideration, but it must be very different in scope and character from anything which has hitherto come out of the War-Office, if it is to lay the foundation of a really national army reserve.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY DINNER.

THE Beaux Arts and the Belles Lettres have nobly dined during the present week. The Royal Academy and the Literary Fund have celebrated, by a meat-offering and a drink-offering, the cultus of the Muses and Graces, and the worship of themselves. A grotesque element is inseparable from these annual banquets and annual glorifications. These dinners have grown into recognised institutions, but it would be difficult to vindicate on any rational ground their existence. Resolved into its first elements, the Royal Academy can justify its dinner to the great notables and patrons of art on the intelligible but not very dignified purpose for which a new baker's shop is inaugurated, as the newspapers say, by presenting a glass of gin to every purchaser of a quartern loaf. Such, we can quite conceive, was the original and not unpractical object of the Royal Academy dinner; and, though we and our art-critics are justly indignant at the practice of some proprietors of private Picture Exhibitions who offer a champagne luncheon to their visitors at the private view, we must remember that the Pall Mall and Haymarket dealers have at least a precedent for their mercantile conception of art in the Academy itself. We will, however, admit that the dinner has outgrown this sordid object. It has come to be an institution. But institutions, the more permanently they are established, acquire an inevitable dulness and monotony. There is a terrible tedium in those repetitions of commonplace on the objects, advantages, and pleasures of the fine arts; and as the orations, like the menu, admit of little variety, the interest of the speeches generally turns on a single point, how the speaker can contrive to make some new hit on the most threadbare topic of talk. After-dinner speeches generally, and these Academic speeches particularly, look like a string of oratorical conundrums, which at the best engage no other faculties of the mind than that of a certain tedious ingenuity. This year's Academy dinner illustrated fully this peculiarity of the occasion. Her Majesty the Queen is toasted. Immediately it occurs to the President of the Academy that the Sovereign can handle the pencil—though, by the way, if this did occur to him, he said nothing about it, but expatiated, by way of honouring the mother, on her Royal daughter's talents as a sculptor, and proceeded to eulogize Princess Louise's work in the very enigmatical announcement of a bust "executed and, as I understand, chiselled by her own hand." Lord Stanley, at the Literary Fund, of course celebrated the Queen's rank among Royal authors. But it was reserved to Lord Chelmsford to make the hit of the evening. By a grotesque ingenuity the great Law Lord was toasted, or replied to the toast of the Navy, on the strength of the fact that he was once a midshipman. On this hint the ex-Chancellor spoke, and delivered himself of a string of facetiousnesses which would qualify him as a contributor to the funniest of those melancholy periodicals which call themselves the comic press. Aristotle—we think it is Aristotle—says somewhere that the mark of a sharp man is to discover or invent resemblances in incongruous things. Lord Chelmsford has shown himself a master in this not the highest of rhetorical arts. Required to invent some connexion between lawyers and sailors, Lord Chelmsford solves the problem both ways by showing that the professions are like both by their likeness and unlikeness. Sailors hate lawyers, and call them land-sharks, but a shark is a fish; and fish and sailors have something to do with the sea; therefore sea-sharks and land-sharks meet in Lord Chelmsford. Again Lord Chelmsford once held the seals; therefore Lord Chelmsford is himself a great seal; but a seal is a fish, which by the way he is not; therefore, as before, great seals are a common nature and property of lawyers and sailors.

Mr. Disraeli's gracious fooling was more elaborate than that of the Chancellor whom he cashiered. The late Prime Minister had to return thanks for the House of Commons; the riddle he had to propound was—Why is the Royal Academy like the House of Commons? A question which sounds as rational as, How far is it from Wednesday week to the Antarctic Circle. Mr. Disraeli knocked off a very creditable and characteristic quibble on this great theme; or, as he more sonorously expressed it, he was privileged to dilate on "the many points of significant sympathy between the present situations" of the artists and the senators. As thus—the House of Commons has lately been reformed, so has the Royal Academy. The Royal Academy has got a new house, so have we; which may be true in the sense that a house six months' old and a house some thirty years' old may both be said, with some license, to be equally new. The Royal Academy has rejected many pictures; and many Parliamentary candidates failed at the late general election. The Royal Academy and the House of Commons have alike many old members and many new ones. Many of the new ones are men of promise in either case; and Mr. Disraeli might have added, which he did not, that both at Burlington House and St. Stephen's many of the veterans are great bores, and many of the neophytes are ambitious failures. Why did not the facile joker go on with this ingenious parallel, and run out a reel of puns on the housewarming of the Academicians and the fiery debates at Westminster? We certainly missed a telling witticism—of which we reserve the copyright, having the fear of the cartoonists of the comic journals before our eyes—in which the senatorial joker might have suggested that Landseer's great picture was only a subtle allegory of Mr. Gladstone, terrible in beak and claw, swooping down on the placid swannery of the Irish Church. Mr. Gladstone, we observed, as though in anticipation of his rival's coming vivaciousness, was serenely and solemnly dull; and when Mr. Gladstone throws all his powers into an earnest and solid dulness, the result is a work of very high art indeed. As a Chinese landscape is to Turner in his latter days, so on this occasion, because it suited him to bring out a strong contrast, was the earnest Gladstone to the vivacious Disraeli.

We are glad to see all interests and institutions represented at this dinner, though why such representative men as the Chairman of Customs should be honoured with this official recognition any more than the Chairman of the Great Western Railway we are unable to conjecture. The presence of the Lord Mayor and the Governor of the Bank is much more intelligible. They represent the mercantile aspect of art, and this aspect is a very prominent one in these days. It may sound ungenerous to fling into the cup of adulation and salutation which was handed to the Academy by their noble guests on Saturday evening a single drop of bitterness; but we cannot but feel that if in these days art is honoured, it also pays, and pays well. Artists not only live to paint, but paint to live. And we are by no means sure that the present state of the picture market in this country may not, unless our artists are strictly on their guard against the temptation, prove very injurious to the highest interests of the highest of the fine arts. We say nothing of pictures which are avowedly, in the slang of the profession, pot-boilers. But the increasing influence of the dealers, the middle-men between patrons and artists, is a thing not to be regarded with entire satisfaction. The dealers are a very formidable body. They make a fashion and a popularity in such expensive luxuries as pictures, china, plate, and jewellery, merely for shop purposes. Pictures in these days are as much a necessity of their position to the nouveaux riches of trade as carriages and horses and satin gowns for their wives. A picture-dealer is as much a tradesman as a stockbroker, and there is just as much of speculation and excitement in modern pictures as in shares and sugar. This state of things cannot be without its influence on the artistic mind, and while we have artists who work for fame and not for greed, the painters of the Hero or the Medea of the present year, the existence of sentimentalities and sensationalisms manufactured for sale and got up for the print-shop, such as the "Railway Station" of last year, or as many of the namby-pamby domesticities addressed to the feminine and lower intelligences which can appreciate as sweetly pretty subjects taken from the annals of the nursery and school-room and feeding-bottle, is a serious danger to the interests of English art. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who made the best speech of the evening, dilated on what is a fact, that in the wealthiest cities art has flourished most. This is true; but the distinction is between the appreciation of art by a community which is wealthy because cultivated, as in the best ages of Italy, and by a community which, like our own, is wealthy but not cultivated. Florence saluted Cimabue because he made an immense advance on the art of his day; Manchester buys Turners because in a rising market Turners are a profitable investment. The Borgo Allegro represents one inducement to artists; Christie's rooms and his annual trade-dinner present another.

WHALLEY AND NEWDEGATE.

WE have been informed, on the best authority, that there are degrees in Protestantism; and, although Protestantism endures and rather approves its ducal and lordly champions, it draws the line at Mr. Whalley. We had ignorantly supposed that the difference between Mr. Whalley and Mr. Newdegate was no greater than between tweedledum and tweedledee, but having listened to explanations of this abstruse matter, we are now convinced that Pompey and Cæsar are very much unlike, and particularly Pompey. If there ever was any association in Parliamentary business between the members for North Warwickshire and for Peterborough it is now dissolved; and each of them desires to announce that his is the original establishment where the genuine old-fashioned article called Protestantism is served hot and strong, that the public are respectfully invited to look for the well-known and world-famed trade-mark, and are earnestly cautioned against dishonest imitations, and that there is no connexion whatever with over the way. We believe, as we are bound to do on such assurances as we have received, that there is a difference, but we are still without the smallest notion what the difference is. To recur to an illustration already used, we feel like people of small musical cultivation who cannot perceive any distinction between the rival parties of nigger melodists at St. James's and St. George's Halls. Cæsar is very unlike Pompey, and Pompey is still more unlike Cæsar; but which is Cæsar and which is Pompey we really cannot tell. "Just before the Battle, Mother, the beautiful and pathetic ballad originally introduced by the Christy Minstrels at St. James's Hall, will be sung at every performance until further notice. These are the only original and world-famed Christy Minstrels." We do not find the name of Mr. Newdegate among the principal artists who appeared at St. James's Hall on Monday last, but if he did not perform upon the banjo or the bones, we feel sure that he must have lent his aid to swell the magnificent choir which gave thrilling effect to the lovely ballad which awakened such emotion in the audience. The Protestant version of this beautiful and pathetic composition would probably run somewhat thus:—

> Just before the battle, mother,
> I really cannot stay.
> Just before the battle, mother,
> I must run away.

The Knights of St. James resemble other religious champions in remembering that he that fights and runs away may live to fight another day; and when an enthusiastic orator inquires,

> How can man die better > Than facing fearful odds, it may be answered that nobody need die at all until Heaven pleases, and in fact nobody intends to do so. We cannot help thinking that the threat of the Protestant warriors to die for the cause they advocate will be received by the country with as much equanimity as Miss Lydia Languish was expected to exhibit when her lover, Captain Absolute, should threaten to fall upon his sword's point and expire at her feet:—

> Oh, Lydia! forgive me, or this pointed steel—says I.
> Oh, booby! stab away and welcome—says she.

Yet the world would be a dull place if we lost our Whalley or our Newdegate, and therefore we hope that they will study in private the art of make-believe dying before they perform in public. Let them not imitate the impatience of the actor at rehearsal who declined to stand dying all night, but let them practise carefully how to thrust a sword resolutely under the arm, to groan and stagger, and fall with an emphatic smack upon the boards, and to be able to make a pot of beer look foolish directly afterwards. The parallel between the bands of nigger melodists and the Protestant parties may be drawn more closely by observing how both invoke the name of Royalty to sanction their proceedings. At St. George's Hall may be heard the Royal Christy's Minstrels, the only company who have had the honour to perform, by special command, before the Queen and Court. We are not aware that Mr. Whalley and his friends have held a public meeting at St. George's Hall or anywhere else; but Mr. Whalley's well-known vocal talent would ensure the success of his appearance at any music or other hall in London. We should confidently predict that, if Mr. Whalley and his friends did hold a public meeting, they would talk nonsense about the Coronation Oath and the Royal Supremacy as plentifully, and with as complete a belief that they were talking sense, as did the ducal, lordly, reverend, and pious Protestants who assembled at St. James's Hall on Monday. We are told that this meeting commenced with special supplication to Heaven for protection of the Church from its enemies. We should have thought that protection of the Church from its friends was more immediately desirable. There came to the meeting deputations from Constitutional Societies and from Working-men's Conservative Associations, and there was talked the tallest kind of talk about upholding banners and defending bulwarks in the present great crisis of our country's destiny. This is, as we suppose, the sort of Protestantism which is approved by Mr. Newdegate, and we should feel greatly obliged to any one who would inform us wherein it differs from the sort of Protestantism which is propagated by Mr. Whalley. It may be that the sham niggers at St. George's Hall paint themselves a shade darker than their competitors at St. James's Hall, and, as in the lowest deep there is a lower deep, it is possible that the Protestantism of Mr. Whalley may be more extravagant than that of Mr. Newdegate. This is possible, but not, to our thinking, probable. Mr. Newdegate explained to the House of Commons that after the death of his late colleague, Mr. Spooner, he was asked what course he was prepared to pursue with regard to Maynooth College. He stated that he would support anybody who would take up the question. "At that time he had not heard of the honourable member for Peterborough, but when that honourable gentleman was introduced to him as one who was willing to take up the question of Maynooth, he promised to give the honourable gentleman all the support in his power." That promise he kept for some years, but he found his attempt to support Mr. Whalley utterly hopeless and useless. Mr. Whalley, according to Mr. Newdegate, was always tumbling down in the mud, and requiring to be picked up, and washed and dressed. The result of Mr. Whalley's advocacy was to bring the question into total disrepute, but Mr. Newdegate could not pretend to say whether this result should be ascribed to Mr. Whalley's "inefficiency" or to "peculiar views incident to his position on the Protestant question." If Mr. Newdegate cannot explain this result, we shall not attempt to do so; and we will only venture to say that the assumption that Mr. Whalley is an inefficient Protestant appears to us utterly unwarrantable. As to the question having been brought into disrepute, that is matter for various opinion; but it is to be observed that two dukes and two archbishops, besides smaller notabilities, were able to appear at St. James's Hall on what we should have supposed to be the same side of the same question that occupies Mr. Whalley in the House of Commons. We have read Mr. Whalley's speech in the House, and we have read the speeches of Dukes and Earls at St. James's Hall, and we are bound to say that, in our judgment, Mr. Whalley does not suffer by the comparison. Mr. Newdegate assumes, according to Mr. Whalley, an affectation of superiority and supremacy to which Mr. Whalley has been contented to submit for the sake of the prosperity of their common cause. It is to be feared that Mr. Whalley has humiliated himself to little purpose, and his self-sacrifice is cruelly requited by the charge that he has brought the cause of Protestantism into ridicule. Mr. Newdegate asserts that Mr. Whalley has made this subject of Protestantism the laughing-stock of the House. Mr. Whalley answers that he cannot discover on this question any difference between himself and Mr. Newdegate. We are bound to say that we agree with Mr. Whalley. There are, as it appears to us, only three possible suppositions—either Mr. Whalley makes Protestantism ridiculous, or Protestantism makes Mr. Whalley ridiculous, or Mr. Whalley and Protestantism act and react upon each other to the promotion of general hilarity. We are summoned in terms of earnest warning and entreaty to the defence of our beloved Queen, our hallowed Church, our venerated Constitution, and we feel an irresistible tendency to laughter. If the newspapers report Protestant speeches in Parliament and at public meetings, they accompany their reports with leading articles directed towards the object of bringing the speakers into ridicule. Mr. Whalley says that he was told by Mr. Newdegate that the organization of the press by the Roman Catholic party is so complete that a prominent advocate of Protestant principles would inevitably be made a laughing-stock. He was nevertheless encouraged to undertake that advocacy, and the expected result has followed.

In this sea of controversy we can find only one point of solid land. It is agreed that the House does laugh when Mr. Whalley speaks. Mr. Whalley ascribes this result to the nature of the antagonists of Protestantism. Mr. Newdegate ascribes it to the nature of Mr. Whalley. It is difficult to understand what is the precise result which Mr. Whalley, or Mr. Newdegate, or both of them, represent to have been attained by the alleged Roman Catholic organization of the press. The enemies of Protestantism are at most chargeable with reporting truly the explanations of Protestant leaders as to how the Maynooth question came to be taken up. Mr. Newdegate seems to have thought that the chestnuts were warm, and he advised that some enterprising person should be engaged to take them off the fire. Mr. Whalley was engaged accordingly, and the chestnuts certainly were warm. This seems to be the whole story.

THE RIVAL SITES.

EXIT Inigo Jones. Introduced by Mr. Lowe in a puff of vapour, he has very soon vanished in a cloud of smoke. Really, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, this won't do. Big boys should not bully little ones; but if they do, they should be sure of the captain's leave, and should not rush off without the grace of an apology. You have frightened everybody, you have irritated the whole tribe of architects, you have aroused the whole phalanx of amateurs, you have brought an eminent memory into contempt, and now you can only sit by and listen while the First Commissioner reports that he is in communication with Mr. Street, who is not likely to stand any nonsense, even from a Cabinet Minister. This little episode in the domestic life of the happy family in Downing Street is in itself sufficiently absurd. But there is a serious side to the affair on which we must speak out distinctly. Whether it was right to think of Carey Street at first, and wrong to think of Howard Street afterwards, or whether Howard Street has been the happy solution of an unhappy muddle, whether the Gothic of Street or the Italian of Jones best meets the spirit of the time and the uses of the building, it is equally certain that the question, in its inception, its growth, and in the actual deadlock, is a pitiful example of the imbecility which stamps the whole administration of arts and works in this country. To have had the question of the site of the new Law Courts—a long admitted need—so long unsettled, and when settled so soon upset; to see the Minister of Works out of the Cabinet; to hear another Minister, himself a member of the Cabinet, usurp the proper functions of the Office of Works, and majestically announce a policy, and then to find the rightful official himself quietly ignore the proceedings of his superior, is to be witness of a spectacle of official mismanagement of which no other country can show the parallel. One thing only is wanted to complete the embroglio—that the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works should show the door to Chancellor and First Commissioner alike; and we dare say that we shall be the witnesses of this incident.

The remedy is to be found in a reform which we have persistently advocated in this Review ever since its earliest numbers, when there was no one to back us in our protest. The First Commissioner must be raised to the dignity of a first-class Minister of Arts and Architecture, independent of the Metropolitan Board, and no more directly dependent on the Treasury than the First Lord, or the Secretary for War, both of whom are officials who fill departments which make long pulls on the national purse. The mind of Parliament has, we are glad to see, been tardily directed to this subject, and Lord Elcho's Committee, which is primarily discussing the local grievance of the proposed viaduct from Charing Cross Bridge to Wellington Street, has also the broader duty of taking up at least the fringe of this great question, and of investigating the vassalage in which the First Commissioner is held by the Metropolitan Board. It is no secret that out of the moral support which this Committee has given to the Office of Works has already grown the opportunity, of which Mr. Layard took advantage, to propose the transference of the Natural History collection of the British Museum to that portion of the Thames Embankment which lies between Charing Cross and Waterloo Bridge. The question is, in all its incidents, different from that of the site of the Law Courts. The two competing sites for the new Museum are not two spots in such close proximity that their respective altitudes form a main element of comparison. The choice lies between the dreary waste of Brompton wilderness, where once the Exhibition shed of 1862 was planted, or else the broadest space of all the reclaimed Embankment land, which is large enough, without encroaching on the town behind, to hold a vast building, girt with terraces, fringed by gardens, and masking the huge abortion of the Charing Cross station. On the other side is the alternative of the best part of the ground being sacrificed to a misplanned viaduct, and the residue abandoned as a tumbling ground for City Arabs. In respect to popular convenience the Thames locale distances competition, for it fills the central position of all London; it is easily accessible from the old Museum, whether or not the Natural History Library be kept there; the artisan class, to whom this kind of collection is peculiarly interesting and useful, will easily and cheaply reach it by penny steamer, street, and district railway; while it meets the grievance of which all London south of the river complains, that all the national museums are placed on spots which Southwark and Lambeth find it most difficult to reach. The ventilation of this scheme, approved from different sides by Professor Owen, Sir Roderick Murchison, Professor Huxley, and Mr. Cole, was, as we said, the first result of relaxing the fetters by which the administration of Works has hitherto been shackled. The Law Courts muddle is the last and worst example of the old mismanagement.

As to the immediate controversy we have not heard one word urged, nor traced a single local incident to show that the Carey Street site is not of ample area, good proportion, and dignified elevation in relation to the surrounding levels, and therefore eminently suitable to form the site, not it may be of a city of possible departments, but of the existing Courts and their dependent offices. Artistically located it offers a point of view of exquisite picturesqueness to the spectator moving up the Strand. We find it already the property of the nation, bought, paid for, and cleared. The Howard Street plot, as now offered to us, is limited, unbought, low-lying, and irregularly graded, with a sharp central rise, as well as a rapid slope to the river. Therefore we are of opinion that, simply matched with each other, the already adopted position of the Law Courts is decidedly superior to the one which is being proposed to us. Touching the comparative comfort to the lawyers of the two positions, we candidly own that we think it very much a question of six and half-a-dozen. If, however, we import into the question the consideration of the Embankment, then we cordially and unhesitatingly confess that we attach great value to unworthy buildings not being placed upon this magnificent and conspicuous area. But of this misfortune we have little fear. The drift of events is floating it away; the public eye is on the river-bank, and it is certain that the better the buildings are upon the Embankment, the more probably will they pay. It is not equally certain that, if the State were to forfeit its possession of the Carey Street property, that space would still be covered by creditable constructions.

It will be so much the better—this is self-evident—if the Government would clench the bargain which it believes itself enabled to make, and secure the Howard Street site. We have already indicated that as, in spite of Mr. Lowe, a Probate Office is imperatively demanded, that structure may reasonably be planted between Somerset House and the Temple. If, out of some fancied consistency, the Government should elect to build the Probate Office between the Strand and Carey Street, and bring the Courts down to the river-side, we should wonder at what we should esteem an eccentric and unnecessary alteration of well-formed arrangements. Still the Carey Street property would not be wholly sacrificed, and if a noble pile were placed on it, a considerable compensation would be given. But the Government must say—as it has not done—that it means to put some public building upon the high level, and then we can estimate the salvage; or else it must say that it has no such intention, and then we are free to reckon our loss. As yet it has not ventured to do either the one or the other, and we are only left with the certainty that its intentions are to shift the Law Courts from a commanding site to a depressed position. So long as this is all the comfort which is vouchsafed to us, we repeat that we refuse to surrender Carey Street, with its assured and evident advantages—for what? For the vague expectation of ground to be bought very cheaply from owners who will most certainly awaken to this sudden windfall of luck; for an area cramped in its dimensions, tortuous in its contour, low-seated in its level, inaccessible on three out of its four sides.

Our comfort is, that the question will come again before the House of Commons, forewarned and full of the spirits which a long recess is apt to give; and if that body does not exact a very searching reason why, we shall be even more surprised than we were at the escapade of Mr. Lowe.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

I.

THE Academy, which has lived for a century in lodgings, is happy, at the mature age of one hundred and one years, to pass into the independent position of building and maintaining a house of its own, and that out of honestly-earned resources. The congratulations at the Academy dinner on Saturday last were warm and well deserved. The aspect of the rooms is pleasing, even imposing; and the promise thus held out "for the promotion of British art," if not all that might be desired, is almost more than could have been anticipated. Mr. Sydney Smirke, the Royal Academician entrusted by his brethren with the duty of erecting this seemly home, has acquitted himself fairly well. The office scarcely called for the exercise of genius. Plain walls, coved ceilings, skylights, with a glass dome as a masterpiece crowning the central hall, are the sum and substance of such architectural creation as was needed in this goodly array of picture-galleries. Thus, by the simplest means, and no doubt at very moderate expense—seeing that the ground, including Burlington House, did not cost a penny, being the free gift of the nation—the Academy become their own landlords, and may promote the arts in general, and their own interests in particular, without any control whatsoever, save such faint whisper as may occasionally come from a sensitive conscience. The tone assumed at the dinner was of course jubilant, and the President actually indulged in a strain befitting injured innocence; he complained that the Academy "has constantly had to suffer from attacks, often unjust and frivolous—stereotyped attacks which have never ceased to assail the institution from its foundation to the present hour." One attack, however, cannot long have become stereotyped—the assault likely to be made on behalf of the unhappy owners of the 3,500 works which this year have been turned out, notwithstanding that vacant wall space proves that there was room enough and to spare. The Academy, though at this moment in its zenith, points to the vanity of human wishes, and we cannot but contrast the applause which followed the declaration of the President, "that no artists should consider themselves outside this institution," with the fact that at that very moment there had been cast far away from the banquet-table a larger number of rejected works than was ever known in the bad old times. Having briefly said thus much, were it only to indicate that the Academy can scarcely yet safely deem itself beyond the reach of criticism, we may add that great credit is due for the good work accomplished, and that we cannot but hope the time is now come when the Academy will act under the sense of the responsibilities which devolve on a powerful public body, instituted, not for private ends, but to promote the wide interests of national art.

The unusually high character of the Exhibition is at once a proof that the standard of excellence has been raised rather than lowered; in fact, the rejection of an almost incredible number of works indicates how thorough has been the process of refining or winnowing. The measure, if cruel, we cannot deem wholly unsalutary, especially when we remember how the quality of the French Salon is brought down by the free and wholesale admission of pictures by comparative tyros. The number of works received last year within the small interior in Trafalgar Square was 1,206, and this year in the vastly extended building the total does not exceed 1,320. It is evident, then, that the difference between what was confessed to be bad and what is now extolled as good is not in mere numbers. We believe, as we have said, that the standard of excellence has been insensibly raised. Furthermore, too much stress cannot be laid upon the fact that, while very many pictures in Trafalgar Square were killed in the hanging, there is not a picture in the new building which has not the privilege of enjoying life according to its deserts. We must also add that the rooms in Piccadilly have been so designed and decorated as to be peculiarly well fitted to show works of art off to advantage. As for the lighting, it is only too good—blinds must speedily be provided; and as to the wall decoration or colouring, the only fault is that it may be a little too positive in hue; certainly the red ground inflicts injury upon some of the pictures. But on the whole, we repeat, the rooms tend to a dressy and stylish appearance, so that we do not hesitate to declare that in no gallery in Europe would the same pictures be seen to greater advantage. The cornices and ceilings are picked out here and there with gold, the details incline to pure Greek rather than to the corrupt Renaissance; and even on parquetry floors, and especially around doorways where stand out heads of lions after designs by Landseer, there arises a pleasing suspicion of polychrome. Thus these galleries, instead of being, like too many others, cold and starved, respond from floor to ceiling, in modest tones, to the colour of the pictures. This pervading harmony of the rooms has moreover been materially enhanced by a hanging unusually symmetric and well balanced. We need not point out that these satisfactory results cannot have been secured but at the cost of much forethought. The success on the whole is great.

In the present introductory notice we shall not attempt more than a cursory sketch of an Exhibition which, as we have already indicated, rises considerably above the average of late years. The building, like certain great galleries on the Continent of Europe, has been specially arranged for its contents, whether of oil pictures, water-colour drawings, architectural designs, engravings, or sculpture. Of the fourteen rooms all in suite, "Gallery No. III."

measuring 82 feet long, 43 feet wide, and 38 feet high, is, both for size and by reason of its contents, the grand climax to the whole. Here the guests of the Academy were dined, and here pictures specially choice or representative are hung. On the walls abundant space is found for not fewer than twenty-six Academicians and thirteen Associates, among whom appear to special advantage Sir Edwin Landseer, Mr. Calderon, Mr. Frith, Mr. Hook, Mr. Webster, Mr. Leslie, Mr. Yeames, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Elmore, and Mr. Maclise. Also, in this the distinguishing post of honour, we gladly welcome certain illustrious, as well as certain non-illustrious, foreigners. Without invidious distinction we lump them together as follows—M. Edouard Frere, M. Merle, M. Corot, M. Alma-Tadema, M. C. F. Daubigny, M. Rudolf Lehmann, Madlle. Rosa Bonheur, Madame Jerichau, M. Portaels, and M. Legros. By way of parenthesis we may observe that, among the legion of foreigners who have invaded the Academy, some show pictures that are certainly not superior to at least a considerable percentage of the 3,500 English works cast into the street from lack, it is said, of room. It would seem that we have forgotten the virtue of patriotism in the pleasure of showing hospitality.

The great room—where, as we have seen, the united forces of the Academy obtain grand concentration—has a focus of peculiar attraction in one of the most scenic and sensational of Sir Edwin Landseer's creations. "The Swannery invaded by Sea-Eagles," of which great expectations had been raised, now asserts itself as the favourite picture of the year; no other work seems to have equal fascination for the crowd. And its quickly acquired popularity will be easily understood by those who know how consummate is the skill of Sir Edwin, here at his best, in the dramatic management of unrivalled resources. The subject itself is highly melodramatic; indeed it may be questioned whether, since the "Rape of the Sabines," there has occurred in history anything more sensational than the invasion of this swannery—pure and of unsullied white as unsunned snow—by the ravenous troop of sea-eagles. No circumstance is wanting which can either awaken sympathy or intensify horror. The swans are as lovely as swans can be, and the quiet retreat among hills and sedgy grass might seem an abode sacred to peace and happiness. We can only say that the nursemaids and children who feed swans in the parks will be horrified when they hear what cruel fate Sir Edwin Landseer has permitted to befall their favourite bird. But then the art of the painter has become proverbial for cruelty; massacres and martyrdoms inflicted on the noblest of God's creatures it gloats over. Perhaps it may be pleaded by way of apology that in the picture before us blood, save in a few smears, is kept out of sight, just as when the Princes in the Tower are murdered on the stage the horror is veiled. Still the torture of these swans is sufficiently brutal; the writhing in death's agony of the necks is, as was evidently intended, excruciating. And yet, possibly, the picture would otherwise fail of its effect, for we do not esteem its directly art qualities as very high. The wings, the heads, the plumage, and a pair of black feet brought in with admirable effect and force, are painted by a master-hand; yet it strikes us that the yellow eye of the eagle must have come from some shop where glass optics are supplied wholesale to the stuffers. The picture, too, is rather chalky, slaty, and opaque, and much of the distance, with the blanket fog in the sky, is what artists would call scamped. It is evident that when the painter comes to the background he scumbles on colour with broad hog's-hair brushes; and when he wants extra sentiment he needs only to rub in more paint. Infinitely higher for true art quality do we place a couple of lions, studies by the same artist from the life for the bronze lions at the foot of the Nelson Column. These sketches are thrown off with a bold, facile brush which knows where to seize on the points of anatomy, and how to depict at a stroke life, movement, and character. The lord of the forest stands nobly. These studies confess to the hand of the master.

Landscape art seems likely to obtain the justice long denied to it, if not by the election of landscape-painters themselves into the body of the Academy, at any rate by the placing of their works fairly upon the walls. For example, even in the first room the best possible positions are accorded to not less than seven outsiders—namely, Mr. Vicat Cole, Mr. Peter Graham, Mr. E. H. Johnson, Mr. Oakes, Mr. Hering, and Mr. MacWhirter. Thus, almost for the first time, the collective strength as well as the distinctive individual character of the English school can be seen and judged. And such timely justice will come as an encouragement to many earnest students of nature to put out their powers fully and strongly. An artist who may have made a good beginning will feel that the eye of the public remains upon him, that he is not in the same danger as heretofore that for long years he may be overlooked and his work forgotten. How some of our landscape-painters have borne up against discouragement, it is not easy to understand; but the good time may at length be coming. Among the artists who this year appear before us with renewed power are Mr. Peter Graham and Mr. W. Linnell. By the latter, "Aurora in Romagna; Peasants from the Mountains on their way to Rome" is solemn and grand; for colour and for strong appeal to the imagination this landscape is nowhere surpassed. Mr. Peter Graham too must have been once more under the guidance of his good genius when he painted that scene in the wild Highlands, "On the way to the Cattle Tryst." The style recalls the manner of Rosa Bonheur when she chooses shaggy cattle as her models and makes the mountains of Scotland her sketching-ground. We look forward with pleasure to the comparisons which these rooms will in the sequel suggest between our own painters and the schools of the Continent.

The Water-Colour Gallery, from which much was expected, is, at least in its contents, disappointing. The Societies in Pall Mall have evidently, this year at all events, nothing to fear from threatened rivalry. However "Gallery No. IX." in addition to No. VIII. seems, by the colour on the walls, designed rather for drawings than oil-pictures. Thus the Academy has space, and possibly ambition also, sufficient for the annexation of one or more of the Water-Colour Societies. But such a consummation we should regret. Passing next to "The Lecture Room," we find that ample provision has been made for "Miniatures, Architecture, Engravings." Along the dais are ranged fifty interesting "Sketches made in Egypt during the years 1858–1859," by Mr. F. Goodall, R.A. These are the materials whence the artist has taken several well-known pictures.

It is too early to conjecture what changes the new building may bring upon the character and fortunes of our national school. One result, however, we think it evident will follow on the vast accession of space—the painting of pictures on a larger scale. Works not in excess of the usual size become dwarfed in these rooms. A premium will thus be put on the painting of pictures of dimensions which formerly could not be conveniently housed. Moreover, we are glad to see that, for similar reasons, there will be an inducement to adopt grander styles of design, greater breadth in composing masses, with more firmness and purpose in drawing. Thus our British school may possibly obtain deliverance from a certain smallness and feebleness which have afflicted its later years; it may approximate, in fact, to schools of the Continent, and especially, let us hope, draw nearer to the manner of great artists in the olden time whom we desire still to call our masters.

RACING AT NEWMARKET.

FURTHER reflection confirms the opinion freely expressed immediately after the Two Thousand, that Belladrum, even if he could not have beaten Pretender, ought to have been within a head of him at the finish. It is a common thing indeed to make excuses for a beaten horse, and hardly a year passes without the partisans of the second in a big race asseverating that if something had not happened, if the jockey had acted differently or the tactics had been slightly varied, the result would have been reversed. In nine cases out of ten little attention need be paid to these cavillings, but in the present instance it was plain to every spectator that Belladrum overpowered his jockey. In plain English he ran away with him. It is hardly likely that a runaway horse, however good he may be, can win a great race from other horses whose energies are directed, controlled, and reserved by their riders to the proper moment. It stands to reason that the best horse in the world must exhaust himself by running away, as Belladrum did, at a terrific pace, and must exhaust his rider also. When the effort was wanted, neither horse nor rider was equal to the task. A fortiori, if he is really subject to any affection of the throat, the course adopted last week was fatal to his chance. The only hope under such circumstances would have been to make a waiting race, and to save him for one final rush, when his splendid speed might have been serviceable. It strikes us as bad policy in such a case to put up two stone of dead weight, and it may be doubted whether Kenyon is physically able to exercise adequate control over such a tremendous puller as Belladrum, who requires to be ridden by a strong man. On the whole, since everything was done that ought not to have been done, and left undone that ought to have been done, and yet Belladrum was only beaten by half a length, we think we are justified in saying that, under other circumstances, the race between the first two must have been much closer, and their positions might have been reversed. Why Mr. Merry showed such apathy about the race it is difficult to say. He might have been disgusted at the liberties that had been taken with his horse, and at the wholesale lies circulated about him, that he was lame, that he could not gallop half a mile, that he was a rank roarer, and that it was not worth while to take the trouble of starting him. Or he might have distrusted him, just as Sir Joseph Hawley distrusted Blue Gown last year, and imagined that he had lost his form, or that he was unable to stay. Indeed we believe it to be a fact that Mr. Merry has tried Belladrum to be a non-stayer over the Derby distance, but that is not a criterion of success over the Rowley mile, and it will be remembered that Liddington, a far inferior horse to Belladrum except over a very short course, was only two necks from the great Gladiateur in the Two Thousand of his year. But we must admit that, allowing for all improvement of which he is susceptible, and also for any advantages which he may enjoy in the way of jockeyship, we scarcely expect to see Belladrum so forward in the Derby as he was at Newmarket. The Two Thousand was within his compass; and we would gladly have seen him win that, if only to witness the discomfiture of a new class of Turf ornaments who have lately come into being, called amateur bookmakers, and whose speedy and total collapse we fervently desire.

How a race may be won by superior judgment and ability under disadvantageous circumstances was shown in the other great event of the meeting, the One Thousand Guineas. There were nine starters—Scottish Queen, Morna, Brigantine, Toison d'Or, Heather Bell, Carita, Minaret, Crocus, and Music. The fillies have so trained off that even out of this limited number there were only two who seemed to have any chance. Scottish Queen and Brigantine are both roarers, and had both been beaten, it was understood, in their trials. Crocus looked and ran so badly in the Craven Meeting that her victory seemed impossible. Morna and Heather Bell were of quite a different class from the remainder, and to this pair it seemed likely that the race would be confined. Heather Bell in point of fitness and condition was the best-looking of the lot; but she ran so very weakly after half a mile that it is evident she is a filly of very little stamina. It seemed towards the finish a match between Morna and Brigantine, but Fordham nursed Scottish Queen most carefully, and calling on her for one effort in the cords, her fine turn of speed landed her a clever winner. Ridden otherwise—that is, hurried along, or allowed to make play earlier in the race—she would have finished last more probably than first. Martinique, we should say, could not start, having gone amiss the week before, or she could scarcely have failed to win. Scottish Queen's infirmity must stop her over the severe mile and a half at Epsom, and, looking at collateral running, the best of the fillies cannot have a chance with the colts of the same year.

The general racing of the week was of the most meagre description. The only two-year-old winners worth mentioning were Atlantis, Mahonia, and Guy Dayrell. The latter carried off the Newmarket Two-year-old Plate in a canter, and it seems unfortunate for his owner that he is not in the Derby. There was a fair field, but in races of this class an approved public performer generally has little to fear. Baron Rothschild's colt by North Lincoln out of Mentmore Lass will grow into a racehorse, and indeed if his big two-year-olds are allowed time, and not hacked about as King Alfred and Suffolk were, he ought to have a first-class representative next year. Moonstone, Mahonia, and the Mentmore Lass colt are all promising ones, to begin with. Still we think that Lord Stamford's Normanby is the best two-year-old that ran during the two Spring Meetings.

The handicap races were only noticeable from the successes obtained by Silenus, who has come back to his best form of last year. First, he won the Prince of Wales's Stakes easily from Sycee, Typhon, Mysotis, King Victor (who, by the way, was quite unfit to run), Robespierre, Cocoa Nut, Lady Beaconsfield, and some others. Last year he lost the same race by a head only, being defeated by Kingsland. Next, carrying 9 st. 2 lbs., he beat Siderolite over the Rowley mile, and later in the week, carrying 9 st. 7 lbs., he was beaten a head by Acaster over the severe Ancaster mile. These performances were pretty fair, and served to illustrate the extraordinary merits of Knight of the Garter, who at Warwick gave Silenus 25 lbs., and beat him easily. Matches, alas! are fast dying out at Newmarket, but the contest between Vespasian and Blue Gown was one of the really stirring events of the year. The course chosen was a mile and a quarter, across the flat, and by the terms of the match Blue Gown had to concede two years and 4 lbs. to Sir C. Legard's horse. At Epsom Blue Gown received 7 lbs. from Vespasian, and beat him by four lengths; now he was meeting him on 11 lbs. worse terms, and accordingly the contest promised to be close. Captain Machell considered that Vespasian had a little in hand; but the British public, to whom Blue Gown has been a source of considerable profit, would not desert the Derby winner. The result was a surprise, for not only did Vespasian win, but he won with the most consummate ease. He pulled over his adversary the whole way, and Fordham had the greatest possible difficulty in holding him in. Blue Gown ran gamely as ever, but he has done some hard work this year, and his severe and punishing race at the Craven Meeting with Blueskin over those long two miles from the Ditch in must have considerably jeopardized his chance for this match. In addition, he has had a great deal to do at home in leading work and in trials, and it is very plain that he requires a good rest. Vespasian, on the contrary, had been specially preparing for this encounter since Epsom, and was brought out for it in the most magnificent condition. Under any circumstances the weight was a great deal to give away; but being at the time stale and stiff, Blue Gown had not a chance. It is scarcely necessary to say that on the next day Athena, receiving only 6 lbs. from Vespasian, over the Rowley mile, could not get within sight of him.

The commencement of an era of Turf reforms was singularly unlucky. Lord Coventry's sensible motion that 6 st. should be the lowest weight in any handicap was rejected by a majority of nine, Admiral Rous leading the opposition. Thus the boys of 5 st. 7 lbs. who have neither hands nor head nor power to do anything but worry the starter and delay the progress of a day's sport will still be permitted to accomplish their disagreeable destiny. We are curious to know what arguments can have been used against Lord Coventry's motion, which has received the unanimous support of the press, and of those who sincerely wish to promote the true interests of the national sport; but the counsels of the Jockey Club are not made known to the outer world, and the only information vouchsafed by its official organ is that, after "some observations by Admiral Rous," the motion was rejected by a majority of nine.

REVIEWS

THE BOOK OF ENOCH.*

THE Apocryphal book which bears the name of one of the most remarkable persons mentioned in the Biblical record of the antediluvian world now exists only as a literary curiosity, but it was recognised as a source of instruction by the Christian Fathers, from the earliest period to that of St. Augustin, and it derives a sort of indirect canonical authority from the reference made to it in the general Epistle of St. Jude. By the Church, indeed, it was soon rejected, and some of its enemies went so far as to condemn the Epistle of St. Jude likewise. The general opinion seems, however, to have been that, if not canonical, it contained some good matter that could be profitably used. As for Tertullian, he received it in a spirit of lively faith which probably the author himself would scarcely have anticipated. After St. Augustin the Book of Enoch fell into oblivion, its memory enduring longer among the Greeks than among the Latins, till at last all that was left of it for the Western world consisted of some Greek fragments cited by Georgius Syncellus, a learned monk of the eighth century, in his Chronographia, an historical work which, beginning with Adam, ends with Diocletian. When we state that the fragments preserved by Syncellus fill four octavo pages, whereas eighty are covered by the entire book, it will be seen that his legacy to posterity was not on a grand scale. However, what he did leave, though it belongs to a portion of the Book which the best editor (of whom presently) considers spurious, is of great use to critics of the text. Whether the work has been better preserved among the Jews seems to be a doubtful point, but at all events there is no Hebrew manuscript of it that has come to the knowledge of Gentile scholars.

Rather less than a century ago, however, the position of the learned world with regard to the Book of Enoch was suddenly reversed. Even in the seventeenth century there was a notion that the lost treasure was, in some shape or other, to be found in Abyssinia, and in 1773 two original manuscripts of the work (besides a copy) in the Ethiopian language were brought to Europe by the celebrated traveller J. Bruce, who presented one of them to the Library at Paris, the other to the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Other manuscripts have since arrived, and now the difficulty among scholars is occasioned by a suspicion that instead of too little we have too much, and that a great deal of matter included in the Book of Enoch does not really belong to it. For a considerable time no use was made of the manuscripts, but they lay neglected in the libraries, and the first notice of their existence afforded to the world in general was a paper by M. de Sacy, which formed part of the Magasin encyclopédique published in the year VI. (1800), and which, in addition to the author's remarks, contained some chapters of the Ethiopian text, translated into Latin. But the entire work was not made public till 1821, when an English translation by Dr. Laurence, the Regius Professor of Hebrew, was published at Oxford. This translation, and the Latin extracts of De Sacy, which were reprinted by Dr. Laurence, seem to have formed the basis of the first part of a German translation by Dr. A. G. Hoffmann, published in the year 1833, though for the second part, published in 1838, he used a Frankfort manuscript of the Ethiopian text. In the same year, 1838, Dr. Laurence published the Book in Ethiopian, on the authority of Bruce's manuscripts, under the title Libri Enoch, versio Ethiopica. In 1851 another Ethiopian version, after five manuscripts, with the title Liber Henoch Æthiopice, was published by Dr. Dillmann at Leipzig. It may not be out of place to remark here that the modern Germans habitually prefix an "H" to the name of the antediluvian seer, the English form of which, "Enoch," is derived immediately from the Roman Vulgate, which follows the Septuagint. In 1853 a German translation of the Book by the same Dr. Dillmann was published at Leipzig, with an introduction, and a most ample exegetical comment, which in itself is a thesaurus of critical erudition; while, by way of appendix, the fragments preserved by Syncellus are given in the original Greek. This translation those of the learned world who are not disposed to study the Ethiopian tongue must accept as the genuine Enoch; and even those who are disposed to go to the fountain-head, and grapple with a language which is the most difficult and least grateful of the Semitic family, must at any rate regard it for some time with implicit faith, since Dr. Dillmann is the editor of the text with which they will have to compare it, and is, moreover, the author of the Ethiopian Grammar (published at Leipzig in 1857) with which they must commence their studies, for the old grammar of Ludolf now belongs to the past, that eminent Orientalist having died long before the discovery of the Ethiopian manuscript. Under any circumstances we may predict that the name of the Ethiopian scholars will never be legion. That great incentive to the study of a difficult language, the hope of reading works in the original, is wanting in the case of Abyssinian literature, since the Book of Enoch as found in Abyssinia is but a translation after all, and chiefly owes its value to the fact that the original work is altogether lost.

Following the text of Dr. Dillmann, we now proceed to give a summary description of the contents of the Book. After a general introduction which introduces Enoch as a man whose eyes were opened by God and who was instructed by angels, the author at once proceeds to the history of the fall of the angels, briefly narrated in the sixth chapter of Genesis. Certain angels, sons of heaven, admiring the daughters of men, and willing to become fathers of a human progeny, their chief, Semjaza, doubting their stability, and fearing that he will be the only sufferer through the transgression of many, binds them all by a common oath, whereupon they descend, two hundred in number, to the summit of Mont Hermon. Each of them takes to himself a mortal wife, and the result of the unhallowed union is a race of giants, who starve mankind by their excessive voracity, and finally become cannibals. Moreover, the sinful angels, especially one whose name is Azazel (rendered "Scapegoat" in Leviticus xvi.), diffuse over the earth the arts of fabricating weapons, offensive and defensive, of painting the cheeks and eyebrows, and of fashioning meretricious ornaments, adding instruction in sorcery and astrology. The human race, heavily oppressed, lift their voices to heaven, and attract the attention of the four righteous angels, Michael, Gabriel, Surjân, and Urjân (Uriel), who, perceiving the justice of the complaints, lay the piteous case before the Almighty, who at once sends Arsjalaljur (supposed to be another name for Uriel) to Noah, the son of Lamech, to announce to him a deluge that will cover the whole earth, and warn him to escape with his children. Rufael or Raphael (supposed to be the same with Surjân) is enjoined to bind Azazel hand and foot, to throw him into a hollow made in the desert of Dudael (Kettle of God), and, laying sharp stones upon him, to cover him with darkness till the great day of judgment, when he is to be cast into the fiery pool. It is a special sin of Azazel that he has revealed to man the secrets of heaven, and Rufael is ordered to revivify the earth and proclaim that the whole human race shall not perish in consequence of that knowledge unlawfully communicated. To Gabriel is entrusted the destruction of the offspring of the unholy alliance, the giants, who, in spite of the entreaties of their fathers, are to perish by the hands of each other. Michael has the charge of Semjaza and the rest of his associates, who, when they have beheld the slaughter of their sons, and also the destruction of their mortal wives, are to be bound fast under the hills of the earth for seventy generations, and after the final judgment are to be cast into the fiery abyss, there to be tormented for ever. A general purification and restoration of the earth is then promised, with the assurance that it will not again be destroyed by a deluge. Enoch, who has long been hidden from man, occupied in holy converse with angels, now appears, being ordered by the angels to convey the message of Divine wrath to the transgressors. Proceeding to Azazel and the rest, he accordingly executes his mission, but is so deeply moved by their contrition that, in compliance with their entreaties, he reduces to writing their petition for forgiveness, in order to present it to the Almighty. Having finished the petition he seats himself by the waters of Dan (the Upper Jordan) in Dan (or Lais), and falling asleep has a vision, the purport of which on waking he communicates to the suppliants whom he finds assembled deeply dejected in Ublesjael, a place situated between Lebanon and Seneser. Their petition has been summarily rejected, but the vision which Enoch has seen affords him an opportunity of describing at length the glory of the Deity into whose presence he has been admitted, and the splendour of his habitation. On this occasion we learn that the bodies of the giants, after they have been slain, will decay, but that, as they derived their origin from above, they will remain as evil spirits on the earth, to work wickedness. We are afterwards told that, in addition to the crimes already mentioned, the fallen angels introduced the worship of these demons; and thus we have the approximation to the doctrine of the early Christian Fathers that the Gods of paganism were not mere human inventions, but demons, endued with certain supernatural powers. The reader, however, is not to infer that the spirits of the departed giants are identical with the Satanic host, and that consequently the writer of Enoch, by recording the transgression of Azazel and his colleagues, has post-dated the event, known as the "Fall of Lucifer." In a subsequent part of the Book we read of Satans who, appearing as agents of the Divine wrath, are clearly distinct from the demons, and it is even mentioned, as an offence of the transgressing angels, that they became subject to Satan. The origin of these Satans does not appear in the Book, and it will be remarked that the Old Testament is equally silent on the subject. With the doom of the fallen angels—to whose story the fragments of Syncellus are confined—the historical portion of the Book terminates, and the reader, without preparation, suddenly comes upon the marvellous voyage of Enoch, accompanied by archangels through earth and the lower heaven, till he reaches the confines of both. The voyage is twice described, on the second occasion more in detail than at first; or perhaps we are to suppose that two journeys were actually performed. Here ends the first part of the Book, according to the division of Dr. Dillmann.

In the second part the account of Enoch's travels is resumed, but generally the objects seen greatly differ from those described in the first; for whereas these belonged to a terrestrial region, the mysteries of the upper heaven, the angelic host and the Messiah, are now revealed, earthly things, when mentioned, taking a subordinate position. This part falls into three parables (if we may use a somewhat inappropriate expression), of which the first extols the glory of heaven; the second exhibits the Messiah; and the third shows the bliss of the righteous and the misery of the wicked in the Messiah's kingdom. The second of these parables is theologically more important than any other portion of the book, inasmuch as it clearly sets forth the author's conception of the Jewish Messiah, who is thus introduced:—

> Then I saw One, who had a head of days, and his head was white as wool; and by him was another, whose face was as the countenance of a man, and full of grace in his face, like one of the holy angels. And I asked one of the angels, who went with me and showed me every secret thing, concerning that Son of Man, who he was, and whence he was, and why he accompanied the Head of Days. And he answered me and said:—"This is the Son of Man, who has righteousness, in whom righteousness abides, and who reveals all the treasures of that which is concealed, because the Lord of Spirits has chosen him, and whose lot before the Lord of Spirits has surpassed all through uprightness unto eternity. And this Son of Man whom thou hast seen will raise up the kings and the mighty from their couches, and the powerful from their thrones; and he will loosen the reins of the powerful, and break to pieces the teeth of sinners."—Chap. xlvi.

Though the expression "Head of Days" seems to denote no more than "aged head," we retain it, on account of its resemblance to the "Ancient of Days" of Daniel, the substance of whose revelation (chap. vii. 9–14) is here substantially repeated. The parallel to the rest of Daniel's more elaborate description must be sought elsewhere; and, as the writer of Enoch here appears somewhat meagre, it is well to observe that on occasion, when he has to describe in detail the visions of heavenly glory, he can become more copious even than the author of the Apocalypse.

Soon after the passage cited above comes another of singular importance:—

> In that place I saw a fountain of righteousness, which was inexhaustible; it was encircled by many springs of wisdom, and all the thirsty drank of them and were full of wisdom, and had their dwellings with the righteous and the holy and the elect. And in that hour that Son of Man was named before the Lord of Spirits, and his name before the Head of Days. And before the Sun and signs were created, before the stars of Heaven were made, his name was named in the presence of the Lord of Spirits. He will be a staff to the righteous and the holy to lean upon and not fall, and he will be the light of peoples and the hope of those who are troubled at heart. All who dwell on earth will fall down and worship before him, and will extol and glorify and sing praises to the Lord of Spirits. And therefore was he chosen and concealed in His presence before the world was created, and he will be before Him for ever.—C. xlviii.

According to this passage the Messiah was not only named before the creation—that is, not only was his existence predetermined—but he actually existed from the first in the Divine presence, though not to be manifested before the appointed time. We have followed the precedent of Dr. Laurence in making use of the periphrasis "in the presence," as an ambiguity might be occasioned by too frequent an employment of the word "before." Dr. Dillmann simply employs the preposition "vor," which we may fairly assume to be the equivalent of the "πρὸς (τὸν θεόν)," in the first verse of the Gospel of St. John, rendered in the Authorized Version "with," and in the Roman Vulgate "apud." Although the Messiah is thus exalted above all creation, the author's belief in his humanity is proved not only by his frequent repetition of the expression "Son of Man," familiar to every reader of the New Testament, but by the use of the singular term "Son of Woman," which seems to have precisely the same signification, and not to bear the special import of the "seed of the woman" in the third chapter of Genesis:—

> Pain will seize the mighty of the earth, when they see the Son of Woman sitting on the throne of His glory.—Chap. lxii.

In the day of the Messiah there will be a resurrection of the dead:—

> In those days the earth will give back what has been confided to it, and the kingdom of the dead will give back what has been confided to it, and Hell (i.e. Hades, Hebraic Sheôl) will restore what it owns. And he (the Messiah) will select from among them the righteous and the holy, for the day is come when they are to be saved. And in those days the Elect will sit on His throne, and all the secrets of wisdom will flow from the thoughts of His mouth, for the Lord of Spirits has given this to Him and glorified Him.

The Elect, specially so-called, is here, of course, the Messiah, but something like the indication of a general theory of predestination is to be found in the Book. In a subsequent part Uriel shows Enoch the "heavenly tables" on which are recorded all the deeds of men that will take place on earth to the most remote generation.

In the second, and more particularly in the third, parable, passages occur which refer, not to the coming kingdom of the Messiah, but rather to the Flood, the Fall of the Angels, already recorded, and the preservation of Noah, who sometimes takes the place of Enoch as the privileged beholder of mysteries.

The third part, which likewise belongs to the narrative of Enoch's travels, contains a rude theory of the world, in which the variations of the heavenly bodies are accounted for in a very primitive manner, and which may be regarded as an amplification of the portion of the travels narrated in the first part. This is the least theological portion of the work, but it must be borne in mind that, from the point of view taken by our author, the boundaries between natural science and theology never appear very sharply defined.

The fourth part consists of two visions seen by Enoch in his youth. One, which is very fully described, refers to the impending judgment of the Flood; the other presents a summary history of the Israelites, who are traced from our common progenitor Adam, and followed through all their days of prosperity and tribulation to the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. As the Book is ostensibly antediluvian, this history naturally takes the form of a prophecy, but critics, however they may differ from each other, are pretty sure to agree on this point, that the apparent revelation of the future is, in fact, an allegorical record of the past. The persons and nations whose fortunes are predicted are all represented as brute animals, or as herdsmen to whom these are given in charge, though occasionally one of the animals assumes a human form. First, there is a white bull from whom proceeds a cow, and the issue of these are a black and red bull, of whom the former kills the latter. The persons here indicated are, of course, Adam and Eve, and Cain and Abel. Jacob is not a bull, like his progenitor, but a sheep, and the children of Israel remain sheep to the end, their oppressors being sometimes ferocious beasts, sometimes cruel herdsmen. The long and elaborate allegory which thus grows before us offers a wide field for debate, since the figures that appear after the decease of Moses are not so readily to be traced to their historical prototypes as those which open the narrative, and there are sundry chronological indications which, taken one with another, make up a very pretty puzzle. One curious fact may, however, be remarked—namely, that in the list of conspicuous persons, David is no extraordinary figure, and is scarcely distinguishable from Solomon.

The fifth part is supplementary to the rest. Enoch, as an affectionate parent, warns his family, and indeed the whole human race, of the coming judgments, and exhorts them to remain true to the right path, in the full hope of an ample reward when the kingdom of the Messiah is established. An awkward conclusion is made by an account of the wonders that preceded the birth of Noah, with a prediction of the Deluge, and the future condition of the righteous and the wicked.

It will be seen that we have confined ourselves to a description of the Book as it lies before us, without reference to the controversies that have arisen as to the date of its production. It would be impossible here to give any account of these without far exceeding the limits of a single article.

BARNES'S EARLY ENGLAND.*

MR. BARNES is most likely better known to our readers as a poet in the living West-Saxon dialect than for his occasional attempts in the way of West-Saxon or other Teutonic philology. Those attempts have always been praiseworthy. Mr. Barnes is, in the eye of rigid criticism, what the late Lord Strangford used to call "pre-scientific," but he is pre-scientific of the class which is feeling its way towards the Scientific—we do not mean by our initial capital to imply that the Scientific is at all akin to the Insoluble—not of the class which stands obstinately aloof from it. And in some points we must ourselves look upon Mr. Barnes with those feelings of distant admiration with which a weaker brother looks on the career of a stronger. We feel that we have at least tried to do something for our old Nether-Dutch tongue; but we feel also that any one who may have been fed at our hands has been fed only with milk—we are tempted to say with skimmed milk—compared with the strong meat, the very roast beef of old England, which is offered them by Mr. Barnes. We once called Mr. Furnivall the Ealdorman of the Semi-Saxons; but there is nothing "semi" about Mr. Barnes; we are inclined to up-heave him on a shield, and proclaim him Heretoga of Nether-Dutchmen in general. The only pity is that he came into the world five hundred years too late. He should have lived at the same time as Chaucer, and he might perhaps have acted as an opposing influence to Chaucer. He has done us the honour to quote part of our notice of the Ayenbite of Inwyt. Now, if we could believe in the transmigration of souls, we should set down Mr. Barnes as an avatar of the author of the Ayenbite of Inwyt. The object of both is as praiseworthy as may be; but can the object be compassed in the nineteenth century any more than it could in the fourteenth? We cannot get rid of Latin and French words; we may fight hard against the needless bringing in of new ones; we may fight hard to keep those that have crept in unawares down in their proper secondary place; but we cannot turn them all neck and crop out of our speech. Mr. Barnes cannot do it; the author of the Ayenbite could not do it. We do not know how far Mr. Barnes would really use his ultra-Teutonic style in writing upon all subjects, or whether he does it simply as a kind of show on this particular subject. We do not like to apply so hard a word as affectation to Mr. Barnes; if his style be affected, it is a much more harmless kind of affectation than the affectation of the penny-a-liners; still there are sentences in his book where the English is so very undefiled that we really do not understand it. Here, for instance:—

> The heads or motemounds of many of our hundreds are in oustep-spots, where there was never a hamlet of English people, and the British Cantrevydd were made of andershares very unlike our Tithings.

Mr. Barnes says, and historically with perfect truth:—

> English has become a more mongrel speech by the needless inbringing of words from Latin, Greek, and French, instead of words which might have been found in its older form, or in the speech of landfolk over all England, or might have been formed from its own roots and stems, as wanting words have been formed in German and other purer tongues.

And presently he adds:—

> It may be said that the words brought in from Latin, Greek, or French were all needed for new things as they were brought under speech, and that our tongue richer by all of those words than it was in the olden time.

Not so, those who read the books in our earlier speech find English words which have been offeast, and see that many foreign words which have taken their places stand now only as a word intaken for a word cast out.

And he strengthens his case by two lists, of words where the foreign word has turned out the English, and of words where the English and the foreign word both still exist. Now here we must to some extent part company with Mr. Barnes. We will certainly not talk about "vicinity" when we can say "neighbourhood," or about "vocation" when we can say "calling," or "environs" when we can say "outskirts"; but we doubt about our old friend "Inwyt," and when we are obliged to talk about "continuity," we doubt whether any one would understand us if we said "ekeness." In some cases we do not quite understand the principle on which Mr. Barnes goes. He suggests words which are certainly purely English, but which are now quite unintelligible, while there are other words equally English which everybody understands. We need hardly talk about "evenglome" and "wonstead," when we can say "twilight" and "dwelling." But the following remark is very good:—

> Luckily our tramways and railways were first made by working men who used for things under hand, English words of their own, as rail, railway, sleeper, ballast, tram, truck, trolly, shunt, and a siding; but, when the railway was taken into the hands of more learned men, we had the permanent way for the full-settled way, and the terminus instead of the rail-end, or way-end, or outending.

Yet all praise to those who write up "The Way Out," as near an approach as we are likely to make in these times to the more compact "Ausgang."

Mr. Barnes's little book strikes us as a little unconnected. He begins with a "Fore-note," a word which we do not remember to have seen before, though we have seen "noteworthy." But we confess that we do not see the gain either of "fore-note" or of "noteworthy," both being hybrid compounds. "Vorwort" is pure German, but "fore-note" is not pure English, and we may just as well say "preface." Well, in the fore-note Mr. Barnes tells us that his book is meant to supply "readers who may not be quite ready to furnish their bookshelves with works of costly sizes, or may not have time for long and deep reading," with a "handy book on the history of their forefathers." The question with us would be whether an altogether unlearned reader would understand a series of rather desultory notes, put together in Mr. Barnes's peculiar style. A person who already understands the subject will pick up some fresh hints in looking through Mr. Barnes's pages, but we doubt whether a quite ignorant person would make out very much. A child, the most important learner of all, would certainly make out nothing. The very title of the book, though we can see in it a certain feeling after the right way, would only mislead. Why "Saxon-English"? a form which clearly implies some other English who are not Saxons. And so, to be sure, there are plenty such in Mercia and Northumberland, and Mr. Barnes may, if he pleases, call his own Dorsætas "Saxon-English" in opposition to them. But he is not talking of his own Dorsætas, but of Englishmen in general from Wight to Forth, and as applied to Englishmen in general that form is misleading. Yet we are glad to hail it as a sign of the breaking-up of that confused way of speaking according to which "the Saxons invaded England":—

> The Saxons lived about Holsten, and would seem, on sundry grounds, to have made some settlements on the eastern shore of Britain before the time of Gwrteyrn; and, indeed, the name Saeson, by which the Welsh now call us, would seem to have been first given to some such earlier Saxons rather than to the Saxon-English of Gwrteyrn's time, as they always called themselves English and not Saxons.

The last sentence we of course welcome, even though Mr. Barnes goes a step further than we should venture to go. Can he prove that the Jutes of Kent under Hengest "always called themselves English"? We can only say that we do not know, but that it is enough for us that the oldest English records call them so. As for Saxon "settlements on the eastern shore of Britain," Dr. Guest has knocked them on the head; still Mr. Barnes is quite right in his general meaning. It was the Saxon invasions repelled by Theodosius which first led the Celts of Britain to call all Teutons Saxons—a habit strengthened by the fact that those Teutons who first attacked modern Wales were actually Saxons.

Some way on Mr. Barnes has a note on the Bretwaldas. Mr. Kemble, it will be remembered, derived the name, not from Britons but from Bryten, wide; so that Brytenwealda, one of the forms in use, would mean the "wide ruler." Mr. Barnes has another idea:—

> Then Walda or Wealda has been read as of the singular number, and meaning a Wielder or Ruler, rather than a wielding or rule, which it would mean; and Walda ending in a would show itself as the possessive plural of Wald, and as meaning "of dominions or powers;" and the word Brytta, or Bryta, again means Bestower or Lord, as "Life's Brytta," Lord, or giver of life; "Goldes Brytta," Gold bestower; "Sinces Brytta," Treasure bestower; "Morðres Brytta," Lord of slaughter; "Tires Brytta," Lord of glory; and it seems likely that Bretwalda is Lord or Bestower of dominions, a name given to the king who made himself, or was owned, among the English states as arbiter.

But surely, to make Walda a genitive plural, it ought to come first, and it is somewhat against even Mr. Kemble's explanation that, when Æthelstan calls himself in an English charter (Cod. Dipl. . 258) "Brytenwalda ealles þyses iglandes," the Latin version has "totius Britanniæ Rex." Some of Mr. Barnes's other derivations sound queer. What can ceorl have to do with ceor a bondsman, or þegen with þing? Nor is it easy to see what Mr. Barnes means when he says that the letters b and s, as "root marks"— what on earth is a "root mark"?—"betoken" this or that, b betokening "to bow, bulge, bunch, or bulk up, or to biggen," and s betokening "to sink down, or to sink under pressure, to be soft." Possibly Mr. Wedgwood might understand this, but we really cannot. Did the Brytenwealda, whatever his derivation, bow, or bulge, or bunch, or bulk up, or biggen? Or were the Saxons themselves especially soft people, or particularly given to sinking?

We fear we must say that Mr. Barnes had better keep to his English and Frisian, and not meddle with the tongues south of Hæmus and the Alps. In the controversy as to the origin of the word Church, we suspect that a careful examination might reveal the painful fact that the corporate personality of the Saturday Review has sometimes wavered from one side to the other. But in all our encampings with either party we certainly never came across any one so depraved as to derive Church from τὸ κυριακὸν οἶκον, or to think that a church was, in any time or place, called τὸ κυριακὸν οἶκον. Mr. Barnes seems to have met with such men, and he naturally dissents from them. His mythology too, especially his Greek mythology, is somewhat hard to understand:—

> So it is clear that Demeter, the Great Mother, the Δαι μητηρ, Δαις-μητηρ, the Food Mother, is the Earth, as Arnobius writes to the heathen.

The words which he quotes from Arnobius are:—

> "Terram quidam e vobis, quod cunctis sufficiat animantibus victum, Matrem esse dixerunt magnam; eandem hanc aliquot, quod salutarium seminum frugem gerit, Cererem esse pronunciant."

It is odd to go to Arnobius for our Comparative Mythology, but Arnobius certainly says nothing, at least in the passage quoted by Mr. Barnes, about Δαι μητηρ and Δαις-μητηρ, forms both of which are quite beyond us. It is more strange when Mr. Barnes calls the fifth day of the week "Thor's day" and adds—

> Thor is pretty clearly shown by the sagas to be the Jupiter Tonator (Thunder); indeed, Thorsday is now called by the Germans Donnerstag, Thundersday (Thursday).

No doubt Jupiter and Thor do in a certain way answer to one another, though, so far as Jupiter answers to Zeus, the real Teutonic cognate of Jupiter is Tiw. But Mr. Barnes has got into a manifest puzzle. Has he never read in the Chronicles how Earl Godwine died "on þone Đunresdæg"? No doubt Thor and Thunær (Thunder) answer to each other in Danish and English: but Thor by that name is no English God, and Thursday is not called from Thor, but is a mere contraction of Thundersday.

But we are glad to see Mr. Barnes on the right scent among our dear brothers the Frisians. We really believe that it is not too much to say that a Frisian is simply an Englishman who stayed at home and did not go into Britain. At all events the Frisians are our nearest Continental kinsfolk, nearer than Danes, far nearer than High-Dutchmen. This is just what writers like Mr. Pike and Mr. Nicholas (who are just now at such amusing loggerheads in a court of law as to the true paternity of their crotchets) cannot be made to understand. They crow mightily if they show that an Englishman's tastes differ in some points from those of a High-Dutchman, and that his hat is not exactly the same shape. After fourteen hundred years' separation there is likely to be some difference, just as after only two hundred years' separation there is some difference between Englishmen in Britain and Englishmen in America. But, after all, no amount of difference between Englishmen and Swabians or Bavarians will prove us to be Welshmen, Greeks, Jews—for we cannot forget Mr. Lysons—or anything else that ingenious men may choose to call us. There are both eccentricities and mistakes about Mr. Barnes, but he has that which makes up for all. He does indeed carry out the motto in his title-page, by looking to the rock whence he is hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence he is digged. It is a wise child who knows his own father, and this mark of wisdom at least Mr. Barnes possesses in its fulness.

A RESIDENCE IN BULGARIA.*

THE writers of this volume claim, as narrators, to have put on paper nothing which they have not seen themselves. They assert, as critics, the power of appreciating what they have seen. One of them professes a thorough acquaintance with all Slavonic languages, as well as with Turkish, and a long experience of the peoples of Eastern Europe. His head-quarters for the last three years have been fixed in a Christian village in the Balkans, where his literary colleague, who also lays claim to a fair knowledge of Turkish, has been his companion for half that period. Roving about the country in shooting excursions, depending on their guns alone for escort, and on themselves alone for interpreters, these two Englishmen have enjoyed opportunities of seeing the life of a Turkish province from a point of view not preoccupied by the more cursory traveller or the resident official dignitary; and they have seen it, as they believe, more closely and more truly. They have passed their time in close contact alternately with the Christian rayah and the Turk of Bulgaria, noting the ways and listening to the talk of the villages belonging to either religion, without unavoidably tempting misrepresentation on the one side or the other as professed hearers of complaints and redressers of grievances. In a country where, if anywhere, there are wheels inside the wheels which run within the visible wheels of administrative and political life, they have seen (so to speak) the greasing of the innermost axles. They have obviously formed a very strong (and, they are at some pains to assure us, a strictly unbiassed) opinion on the comparative capabilities of the rayahs and their so-called Mussulman masters. They show a considerable power of stating this opinion clearly, and of marshalling for their readers the evidence which has convinced themselves. Even those who may not wholly agree with their conclusions cannot but find their chapters interesting.

At a moment when Western Europe is thoroughly tired of the pertinacious violation of international law by successive Hellenic Governments in the matter of the Cretan insurrection, many of the English public are prepared to believe on easier terms than usual that > Turk 's not so black, nor Greek so very white.

But Captain St. Clair and Mr. Brophy will hardly be satisfied by any qualified admission that after all the Turk is not so much worse than his neighbours. They say, with the fervour of the apostles of a new faith, that he is very far better. They tell us that the pure and unadulterated Turk of the villages of European Turkey (very different from the Europeanized Turk of the capital or the large cities) is by nature a gentleman, as well as an honest, brave, and hardworking labourer. In virtue of the morality which his religious teachers impress upon him, he is sober, kind as a husband and father, true, just, and generous in his dealings with strangers, loyally patient in bearing the burdens of taxation and military service imposed by the Padischah. They paint the rayah, on the other hand, as essentially an idle, ignorant drunkard, who, rather in virtue than in spite of his religious teaching, grovels in the basest mud of a cowardly and superstitious existence, who is ready to lie, cheat, rob, or, if need be, murder, but all in a mean and short-witted way. He has no feelings of nationality, except such as are inspired by the interested propagandism of Russia; no sentiment of even local patriotism or family affection strong enough to overcome the rooted laziness which is content to leave nine-tenths of the most fertile land of Europe uncultivated, while the producing tenth is merely scratched and sown. The cardinal points of his practical orthodoxy consist in the union of licensed feasting with entire abstinence from toil for 182 days in the year, alternating with the most rigorous fasting and the most dawdling attempts at labour on the 183 so-called working days. The very forms of his popular superstitions are of the basest, most prosaic, and material order. He has no strong ambition to learn, to do, or to be, anything beyond to-day; no genuine instinct except a zeal to cheat and hate the dominant race before which he trembles. "Brutish, obstinate, idle, superstitious, dirty, sans foi ni loi"—the negative character of Bulgarian Christianity is forcibly summed up in the words of a transplanted English navvy to the authors of this volume, that, "for all he could see, the only Christians in that part of the world were the Turks."

It can hardly be denied that the picture is true in the main. Greeks themselves have been honest enough to speak (or at least one Greek in our knowledge has been honest enough to write, at the cost of excommunication) as freely as these authors of the character of the country priesthood in the Ionian Islands, and of the purely degrading influence exercised by their teaching and example on the peasantry who maintain them. The details of the manners and customs of the Bulgarian rayah, given by the two Englishmen from their own experience, are sufficient to justify the general terms of their description of him. Some allowance should, however, be made for the sensitiveness of distaste which is sure to be produced in the temper of a civilized critic by enforced hourly familiarity with the lower habits of a subdued and uncultivated people. Had the head-quarters of Captain St. Clair and Mr. Brophy lain in a Turkish instead of a Christian village, it is probable that we might have heard from them rather less of the positive virtues, and rather more of the necessary defective tendencies, of the Mussulman religion. Upon the faults and failures of Turkish administration, and the vicious Western semi-civilization of Constantinople, they are severe enough. Granting that the natural man in the Turk of the provinces shows many of the fundamental virtues with which their experience credits him, we may yet doubt whether he is so pure a specimen of the unalloyed perfection of humanity as, in contrast to the miserable rayah, these pages make him appear.

The functional disorders of the Turkish Empire are, even on the showing of its genuine friends in this volume, bad enough to cause ample anxiety to all who believe that its entire disappearance would certainly lead to a lower, rather than a higher, level of society in the East. The land laws are bad; the administration of justice defective; the waste of Government resources, under the present system of tax-farming, enormous; peculation and corruption so universal in every lower grade of office, that the energy of the most honest Pacha is apt only to lead him blindfold into fresh pitfalls of some shameless abuse or concealed iniquity. The well or ill intentioned interference of European diplomacy on every possible occasion, aided by the exceptional leverage of the capitulations by which Turkey is bound to almost every European Power, has led to a policy of "making things pleasant" by concessions which those who make them know to be contrary to the general welfare of the empire. The conventional Western phrase of equality before the law for all the Sultan's subjects, without distinction of creed or race, has been ostentatiously impressed as a registered patent Government stamp upon all recent plans of reform, as a tribute to the ideas of the West paid by Turkey for the recognition of a national place in the European system. The practical application of an ill-understood device consists in the strenuous enforcement (say Messrs. St. Clair and Brophy) of the rule that right is always on the side of the rayah, who will complain and will find listeners, as against the Turk, who will endure injustice without complaining. Standing orders from Constantinople, to favour the rayah in every possible manner, take the place of any real exertion to raise the rayah's moral level. The much abused commutation tax of four shillings a year now paid by the rayah in lieu of all military service, is so disproportionately small in comparison with the worth of the personal service given by the Turk, as to constitute an unreasonable privilege to the one, and an exhausting injustice to the other. The reception of Christian evidence has done little but encourage professional perjury; the admixture of Christian jurors in the communal tribunals has increased judicial bribery and favouritism. Unless the rayah can be "levelled up" towards the morality of the Turk, every material advantage by which the terms of his present animal life are made easier turns into nothing but reciprocal sourness and bitterness between the two races, whose living side by side becomes thus more impossible year by year. If the mere pampering of the inferior being under the pressure of foreign patronage goes much deeper into the system, it is predicted that things will go from worse to worse until the patience of the overburdened and over-insulted Turk of the country breaks down. He will then re-assert his position as master, once for all, by a holy war of Islam, or perish in the attempt.

* A Residence in Bulgaria. By S. G. B. St. Clair and C. A. Brophy. London: John Murray. 1869.

Degraded as the type of the Bulgarian rayah may be, and thin as is the varnish of civilization which at present he is competent to assume, it is impossible to forget how and why he is destitute of the natural civilizing influence of an aristocracy of his own. No permanent peace, no loyalty to the sovereignty of the Sultan, can grow up in Bulgaria till the rayah has learnt that there is a future for himself under that empire. However much the individual Turk may be personally preferable, we cannot contemplate as possible that he should in any case be allowed to exterminate or crush the recalcitrant rayah by sheer re-conquest in a war of creeds. But it is another thing to say that the common State to which both Turk and rayah belong shall be sovereign within itself, and suffer no hindrance in applying its own remedies to the evils for which it bears all the responsibility. We are inclined to think with Messrs. St. Clair and Brophy, that until the capitulations are abolished, the power of Turkey to improve herself will never be fairly tried. When foreign settlers can reside in Turkey as holders of land in their own names, with their rights and duties governed by Turkish law alone, it may be that Western industry and wealth will elbow the rayah out of some of the land which he now rather negatively than actually occupies, and by pushing him into a corner help to make a man of him. The Tartars who migrated from the Crimea by arrangement between the Czar and the Porte at the end of the Russian war, though cheated by the Sovereign whom they left, and neglected by the Sovereign to whom they came, are already making their mark upon the soil of Bulgaria, and showing a pattern of thrift and foresight, the profit of which even their thriftless and short-sighted neighbours must by degrees come to understand:—

The Rayah leaves everything to nature, and gets more than enough for his wants; the Tartar assists nature, and his crops are treble those of the Christian.

A Tartar boy of fifteen years old has lately constructed a marine steam-engine out of some bits of old iron, and a kettle as boiler, and a tiny craft worked by this machinery is at present conveying passengers on the Black Sea, between Varna and the Monastery of St. George, a distance of about eight miles.

By the efforts of these colonists the forests are being gradually converted into arable land—gradually, because their system is different from that of the Rayah, and they only clear as much land as can be properly brought under cultivation, whilst the other burns down fifty acres of timber to make one field of five acres, which, after the first year's ploughing and sowing, is probably neglected for the next quarter of a century.

Alongside of the Tartar settlements are the encampments of other exiles of a different stamp—Circassians from the Caucasus. Handsome, proud, and warlike, with all the memories of the mountain-homes from which they have been driven still fresh and warm, they have no heart to till the soil to which they have been transplanted. Like the Scotch Highlanders of our own ruder times, they do a little cattle-lifting and a little highway robbery in a quiet aristocratic style. Their chief capability for becoming good subjects of Turkey lies in their genuine hatred of the Muscovite; and if they can be preserved from the gradual extinction which would appear to be the natural end of their manner of life, they may perhaps yet do service to the land of their exile, by growing into the natural garrison of the natural fastnesses of the Balkans. The Circassian type is that of a hardy but elegant mountain chivalry; but our authors clearly feel most sympathy with the Tartar exponents of the lesson inculcated throughout this book upon all whom it may concern, that the wealth, the resources, and the future of Turkey lie in that which hitherto has been not only neglected but discouraged—the development of the powers of the soil. Arare est orare is the motto which the blameless life of the Tartar immigrant spreads before the boozy eyes of the indigenous Christian in Bulgaria. The necessity of a return to first principles in religious morality is illustrated by the following account of what the rayah, as taught by his Greek Papas, at present believes to be serious wicked-

It is a sin—

1. To give a child a spoon to play with.
2. To give away or sell a loaf of bread without breaking a piece from it.
3. Not to fumigate with incense the flour when it is brought from the mill (particularly if the mill be kept by a Turk), in order to prevent the Devil entering into it.
4. To wash a child before he has come to the (canonical) age of reason, that is to say, seven years.
5. To sell flour before making a loaf from it.
6. To clean a stable, sell milk, or fetch water from the fountain after dusk.
7. To allow a dog to sleep on the roof of the house, as this gravely imperils the soul of any defunct member of the family.
8. Not to throw some water out of every bucket brought from the fountain, as some elementary spirit might otherwise be floating on the surface of the water, and not being thrown out, take up his abode in the house, or enter into the body of any one who drank from the vessel.

Finally, it is a sin to fail in the observance of any of the hundred superstitious practices approved or tolerated by the Papas.

An intelligent Oriental visitor of the midland counties of England, thoroughly conversant with the dialectic varieties of our language, might perhaps pick up eight as curiously silly superstitions floating upon the surface of agricultural or mining life. But he would hardly find that they were approved or used by the vicars and curates of the English Church, as the main leverage wherewith to work upon the souls of their parishioners.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.*

If compelled to choose between the rough, hasty work of a man of talent and experience, and the laboured effort of a dull but conscientious novice, we conceive that few people would find much difficulty in making their election. The gleaning of the grapes of the one would be better than the fullest vintage of the other. But want of care is less venial than a mistake in one's vocation, and we protest against being driven to such an alternative at all. Except occasionally, towards his third volume, when he has dashed into a subject too hastily and got thoroughly bored with his characters, Mr. Lever rarely sinks to dulness, and in That Boy of Norcott's he is never dull. Something of the verve and vigour of Charles O'Malley and Jack Hinton lingers still, and carries you along in spite of yourself. But all the time you have a presentiment that your course will end in disappointment, and when you come to the end and find your fears realized, if you are not indignant it is only because you have been preparing yourself. Mr. Lever knows the world well, but it must be confessed that he presumes very often on the innocence of the bulk of his readers, and if he did not carry them off with a confidence that will not be criticized, more of his incidents would be condemned as extravagantly unnatural. In a quiet way Mr. Lever works hard, and not unsuccessfully, to demonstrate the absurdity of the saying that truth is stranger than fiction. We are aware that human nature is a strange tissue of inconsistencies, but in this book, in the personages on whom the author bestows most pains, he weaves it into patterns that are simply monstrous, while of others that ought to be among the most prominent he barely indicates the outlines. When we come to the close of the story, the lady who, as it turns out, was its heroine, is scarcely better known to us than to the hero who marries her. Taken in its several chapters, it is generally good and animated, with much that is fresh and original. Read it as a whole, and you are distressed by the perpetual want of sequence in plot, thought, and characters. The impression it gives is that the writer shaped his conceptions from the caprice of the moment, and that he had been too impatient in the execution to care to bring each part of his work into keeping with the rest. Still we admit that art gains whenever men like Mr. Lever have opportunities of acquiring fresh experience of life, and we are indebted for several most graphic sketches to the new ground which our Consul at Trieste has broken on the Eastern Adriatic. The scenes in the Schloss in Hungary too are good, although perhaps he has scarcely made so much of them as he might have done, and the local colouring is too vague to give much assurance of the vividness of the author's impressions.

The title—That Boy of Norcott's—strikes us as a taking one, although it proves to be fanciful enough, as the story proceeds to unfold itself. The hero is the son of a rich and reckless baronet, Sir Roger Norcott, whose eccentricities have made him much better known than respected. Oddly enough, wherever the son goes, by a strange series of coincidences he hears himself spoken of as "that boy of Norcott's," and he accepts the form of words as pregnant with slight and contumely. In accomplishments of mind and person, and in unsuspected resources of both that only wait occasions to elicit them, he is a good deal of an Admirable Crichton. But the difference between creations of this sort by a man like Mr. Lever, and analogous ones by his sisters of the pen, is that theirs shock our common sense at every turn, and make us laugh where we ought to stare, while we find ourselves receiving his with a sort of respectful admiration, and only come upon reflection to wonder where these prodigies can have picked up all they know. Young Norcott was born in Ireland of an Irish mother, and it was part of his Hibernian birthright to take naturally to the saddle, and witch his little world with noble horsemanship; but he must have been almost a Mezzofanti to master foreign tongues as he did. He is the child of a marriage of caprice rather than of love, which his father made with the daughter of a small shopkeeper by way of amusing himself in his country quarters. By a touch at the beginning of the book, which he may have afterwards forgotten, Mr. Lever betrays us into what must be a false impression of Sir Roger's character. We are led to think that, under its cynical, repelling surface, there must be sluices of tenderness to which his son has the key, and we have no doubt whatever that they will be unlocked sooner or later. In a trial in which he claims possession of the child (the ill-assorted marriage had been followed by a separation), the father gave his evidence with a certain hard defiance of opinion. The child is taken from him. "Will you leave me, Digby?" said the father, "and his lips trembled and his cheek blanched as he uttered the words. The boy sprang into his arms, and kissed him wildly and passionately; and the two clung to each other in close embrace, and their mingled sobs echoed through the now silent court." But as Sir Roger is represented afterwards as reserved and self-controlled to excess, a roué with scarcely a trace of heart, such a scene is improbable to extravagance. Sir Roger, as we see him, had feelings too weak to get the better of the most impulsive girl, and, had they been a hundred times more intense, his iron self-control is represented as strong enough to keep them down.

If we can once persuade ourselves that this notoriously embarrassed man had unlimited credit, and that this old man of the world let himself be preyed upon habitually by adventurers whom he saw through and despised, the life in his mansion near Brussels, and the talk of the parasites that filled it, is very good. There is something dramatic in the way in which the boy, brought from his humble home in Ireland, where he had been reared in piety and poverty by his mother, is dropped into the Monte-Christo-like extravagance of his father's house, and the society of the set who profit by it. His worthy parent takes a vicious satisfaction in precipitating his son at this tender age into the path he has been following himself, and one of his hangers-on—who is in orders, and waiting in the hope of a living—is, under the title of tutor, charged with the boy's initiation. What would have become of him under such auspices and surrounded by such seductions, we know not, for luckily a chill of adversity comes to brace him. While travelling with his tutor as a young man of fortune, he hears from a stolid Swiss banker, who tells it unsympathisingly as a matter of business, that his father has formally renounced him, and that he has to begin the world on his own account with 40*l*. This Herr Heinfetter is persuaded to get rid of him by giving him an introduction to a correspondent at Fiume, and, thus tumbled to the very bottom of the social ladder, the youth is condemned to climb it painfully from the yard where he is set to count the staves brought there for shipment. The removal of his hero from the conventionalities of dissipated life to a sphere which is as new to us as to him gives Mr. Lever opportunities which he is not slow to use. Mr. Lever is not tempted, by finding himself in romantic and little visited countries, to fall into a fault which is often committed with far less excuse, and to overload his pages with panoramas of scenery. Yet he describes with so much of visible truth and evident feeling, that for once we could wish for more; and he might have claimed our gratitude had he multiplied the clever touches in which he reproduces the picturesque outlines and gorgeous tints of the Istrian and Croatian coasts. The studies of the various specimens of half-civilized life that young Norcott met there, if slight, are effective, and their treatment is vigorous, if hasty. We cannot but praise Hanserl, the simple, cheerful, good-humoured little dwarf who instructed our hero in the duties of the yard; the vulgar, over-dressed clerks, with their provincial airs; Herr Oppovich, the wealthy head of the house, who has a suburban palace and gardens, their natural beauty scarcely assisted by art, which a Prince has asked to buy in vain; who lives for 364 days of the year in the strictest parsimony, and indicates his wealth with a lavishly ostentatious fête on the 365th. One of the most amusing—and, we must add, one of the least probable—is Gustave de Marsac, soi-disant French aristocrat, a traveller to the firm. Expatiated to these desolate shores, he rattles on in the genuine tone of the flâneur of the Boulevards, the man who revolves among the cercles and coulisses, the Café Anglais and the Maison Doré. He talks and acts as if, instead of being a subordinate with modest emoluments, he had unlimited credit with the house he serves. We know that Norcott's salary was small enough, but he lives on it pretty comfortably, for when M. Marsac drops in on him to make his acquaintance, he gives him carte-blanche to order supper and champagne, produces genuine Cubas, and pleads guilty to drinking Bordeaux out of mousseline glasses. Young Norcott mounts rapidly in the confidence of the house. The fair Sara Oppovich, handsome, haughty, and overbearing, turns out to be the dea ex machinâ to whom he owes his rise. She is the guiding spirit of the establishment, directs its transactions, and, beautiful as she is, is a thorough girl of business. He admires from a respectful distance, and although of course he never makes a declaration, it subsequently turns out that the impression has been mutual. Among the best things in the book are the letters he writes to her when absent on the business of the house, in which, although he does not venture on love, he devotes much space to topics of general interest, the discussion of which touches on the borders of friendship. She answers, thanking him for his remarks on ethnology, but objecting to his silence on the affairs of the firm. Norcott had been despatched on commissions of importance by the Drave to the Danube, and into Hungary. There is a spirited account of his posting across the Hungarian plains from Pesth to Schloss Hunyadi:—"No more the wild stretching galop cutting the snow-drift; no more the clear bells ringing through the frosty air; no more the eager landlord bustling to the carriage side, with his flagon of heated wine; no more that burning delight imparted by speed, a sense of power that intoxicates." Count Hunyadi, with whom his business lay, wild, daring, and eccentric, is the very counterpart of his father; and, as it chances, the two were intimate friends. And it also chances, by one of those coincidences on which novelists venture at a pinch, that Sir Roger was actually there at the time with the lady who passed for his wife, although absent on a hunting-party when his son arrived. Then came news that a boar frantic with wounds had ripped up the Englishman, and that he was lying at the point of death. Young Norcott reaches the dying man in time to be acknowledged as his lawful son, and finds himself a wealthy man.

We confess we were astonished to find him so easily extricated from the wood, while we thought him still in its depths. He had an interview at the Schloss with Madame Cleremont, his father's chère amie, with whom he had used to be on the most affectionate terms, but who closed their conversation on this occasion by threatening implacable vengeance, and admitting that it was she who had thrown a duel on his hands a few days before. When she vanishes from the scene without doing him any hurt whatever, we grumble with the American landlord when Mark Tapley, in Martin Chuzzlewit, came back alive from Eden: "It ain't the thing we did expect; we've been took in, you can't deny." Moreover, although Sir Roger had lived a life of profuse extravagance, and we are led to understand through the story that he can leave nothing but debts and creditors behind, his son finds himself in possession of a clear rent-roll of 10,000*l*. Almost at the same moment the house of Oppovich comes to the ground. Our hero then learns that Sara had so interested herself in his family circumstances that it was to her his mother owed the pension she had received for some time back from an unknown source. In love and gratitude he offers his hand to his ruined benefactress, and the curtain falls on their happiness. As will be seen, there are plenty of extravagances and inconsistencies in the book that the critic cannot overlook, but the reader, carried away by the flow of the story or the sparkle of the style, will be inclined to forgive them. Only, if he wishes to avoid disappointment, he must carefully guard against counting on an intelligible plot or a rational dénouement.

WE have much pleasure in welcoming a second instalment of this important work, and we trust that, reversing the course usual in commercial windings-up, the literary dividends from Sir Henry Elliot's estate will increase in frequency, and not diminish in value. We should suppose that, to do any justice to the materials, at least eight more volumes will be required to complete the undertaking, which at the present rate of publication would make the last of them due in 1883, before which time the inevitable black horses will have carried no small proportion of the original readers to the Kensal Greens of England and India. Still, although we grumble just a little, we do not wonder at the slowness of the progress, for Professor Dowson is a conscientious workman, and his work is of a kind which admits of little assistance from others. He himself, it is true, makes mention with a stifled sigh of some one who possesses a "staff of Munshis," but we are not sure that he has any very great cause to regret their absence in his own case. They would, indeed, be of service in the collation of originals, but in the matter of translation his personal toil would be as great as ever; for if he did not in fact go over each line himself, he could never feel that he was safe against ludicrous distortions of meaning such as one he has mentioned in the present volume. In this instance, the historian, in describing an anxious crowd of councillors and courtiers awaiting the result of a momentous consultation between a Sultan and his Minister, tells us that, as the anxiety increased, "a muttering arose as of a drum beaten under a blanket." No words can be more admirably graphic; but had Mr. Dowson rested satisfied with "a translation made by a Munshi, and revised by an Englishman," the types of Mr. Stephen Austin would have been made to record the singular circumstance that in the midst of these councillors "there was a drum which was beat under a blanket, and a noise issued from it," which there is no denying would be a very natural result. Another instance of mistranslation quoted by Mr. Dowson is hardly less ridiculous.

The present volume commences with an account of the life and writings of Al Birúni, regarding whom we wrote at some length in our notice of its predecessor.† Next in time, and perhaps in importance, to him is Al Utbi, the author of the well-known Tarikh Yamini. Like every man of letters of any eminence in that time, Al Utbi was engaged in the service of Sultan Mahmúd of Ghuzni, who, in that strangely chosen capital in the midst of barren hills and stone-covered valleys, shut up with snow for six months of every year, had contrived to assemble round him all that Asia could boast of genius and of learning. But although one of the secretaries of the great conqueror, and, as such, commanding access to the best sources of information, it is evident, from the whole tenor of his work, that he had no personal acquaintance with India; and, whenever the course of his narrative takes him to that country, his geography becomes inaccurate, and his dates bewildering. But his style of writing is often vivid and picturesque, and the similes and illustrations, in which he of course indulges like all Orientals, are neither so trite nor so nonsensical as those we are accustomed to meet with. He has been the great authority and guide for the writers who have come after him, and has been abundantly sat upon by a crew of commentators, condensers, and remodellers, with the usual result of evaporating one half of the spirit, taste, and sense of their original. In his narratives of battles, even of those on the largest scale, it is curious to observe the leading part played by elephants, and the vast importance attached to their possession. Before the invention of fire-arms it was quite possible to protect the few vital points in this huge beast against the worst that arrows could do to him; and, bearing on his back a high-sided howdah filled with sheltered bowmen, he moved into action with nothing but his legs exposed. Sometimes, when the hostile armies met in a plain, the elephants of both parties would be thrown to the front, and the action would commence, and be for some time continued, by an exchange of archery from these living castles. It would be hard to imagine any sight more picturesque than would be presented by such a combat; and a battle-field of a somewhat similar sort, together with the village sports of a hamlet in Central Asia, are at once brought before our eyes by the words of Al Utbi, when he says "they shot their arrows at one another like boys escaped from school, who at eventime shoot at a target for a wager." This battle, which took place in the Peshawur valley on Nov. 27, A.D. 1001, is further described:—

Swords flashed like lightning, amid the blackness of clouds, and fountains of blood flowed like the fall of setting [? shooting] stars. The friends of God defeated their opposite opponents, and quickly put them to a complete rout. Noon had not arrived when the Musulmans had wreaked their vengeance on the infidel enemies of God, killing 15,000 of them, spreading them like a carpet over the ground, and making them food for beasts and birds of prey. Fifteen elephants fell on the field of battle, as their legs, being pierced with arrows, became as motionless as if they had been in a quagmire, and their trunks were cut with the swords of the valiant heroes.

After some of these great victories, Al Utbi would have us believe, and doubtless believed himself, that the kings of beasts as well as kings of men were impressed with the majesty of Mahmúd's presence, and came voluntarily to submit themselves to him:—

Therefore they were called God-brought (Khudá áward), in gratitude to the Almighty for sending elephants to the Sultan, which are only driven by iron goads, and are not usually captured without stratagem and deceit, whereas, in this instance, they came of their own accord, leaving idols, preferring the service of the religion of Islam.

As it is particularly stated that some elephants only, and not all, displayed this keen appreciation of Mahmúd's divine mission, there is no difficulty in believing that such beasts as had lost their mahouts in the fight mechanically followed their fellows, in utter indifference as to whose salt they ate. While on the subject of elephants it may be mentioned that, if there has been no corruption of the text, and if Al Utbi was right in singling out the breed of Ceylon (p. 40) as particularly adapted for military purposes, a great change must have taken place in eight hundred and fifty years. At the present day they are, as a rule, without tusks, and deficient in size, strength, and endurance, all of which qualities are conspicuous in the animals procured from the Burmese provinces. It is worthy of remark that the prince of Indian travellers, Bernier, has fallen into the same mistake in his affecting account of the unhappy Dara entering Delhi with his little grandchild by his side and the executioner behind him. We quote the old English translation:—"This was none of those brave elephants of Ceylon or Pegu, which he was wont to ride on, with gilt harness and embroidered covers, and seats with canopies very handsomely painted and gilt to defend themselves from the sun; it was an old caitiff animal, very dirty and nasty, with an old torn cover, and a pitiful seat all open." If space permitted it would be easy to multiply instances of Al Utbi's powers as a describer. Not seldom he reminds us of the Hebrew chronicler. The hardening of Pharaoh's heart is not so expressive of hopeless pertinacity in wrong doing as "God had set his seal on the heart of Jaipal"; and "Satan had laid an egg in Jaipal's heart and hatched it" indicates a turn of thought of kindred origin. In describing a great battle in a mountain-pass he says of Mahmúd's veterans:—

They penetrated the pass like gimlets into wood, ascending the hills like mountain goats, and descending them like torrents of water. The action lasted for several days without intermission, till at last some of the Hindus were drawn out into the plain to fight, like oil sucked up into the wick of a candle, or like iron attracted by a magnet, and there they were assaulted and killed by the cavalry, just as the knight on the chessboard demolishes pawns.

In another place he describes the Sultan's troops as "penetrating through the forest like a comb through a head of hair."

The next chronicler is an artist of a very different order, and, judging from the specimens here given, which are selected for their superior merit, we confess our inability at this moment to mention any historian who can be compared for dulness with Abul Fazl Al Baihaki. Professor Dowson likens him to Mr. Pepys, but he appears to us to be greatly more in the style of the worthy Mrs. Nickleby. To our thinking, Pepys is never so delightful as when he is laboriously minute, for his minuteness is all illustrative of character; but the minuteness of this Eastern is entirely of the nihil ad rem quality. There is a scene of a great and wise statesman suspected of heretical opinions, and condemned to be stoned to death. It was necessary that his head should be preserved uninjured, in order that the features might be recognised by the tyrant who had ordered his execution. With this object an iron helmet had been provided, but it turned out to be too small for the victim's head. Another had to be fetched from a distance, but in the meantime the "murdered man" (as Keats would have said) had been stripped, and was thus compelled to remain half-naked upon the scaffold for a considerable interval. He was not wanting to himself during the "supreme quarter of an hour." He stood serene and undisturbed, his hands clasped, his lips occasionally moving as if engaged in silent prayer. His dignified bearing and his sublime resignation had such an effect upon the multitude who had assembled for the purpose of stoning the heretic, that when the time came no one could be found to lift a finger against him, and special ruffians had to be sent for to carry out the brutal sentence. A scene like this is wanting in no element of the pathetic, but Baihaki was principally struck by the mode in which the victim took off his garments, and by the whiteness of the skin which was exposed. "He was ordered to put off his clothes. He fastened the string of his trowsers, and tied up his drawers. He took off his shirt and coat, and threw them away. His body was as white as silver." No two writers were ever more unlike than Gibbon and Carlyle, but what would not have been made of such a story in either of their hands? The Court of Mahmúd was full of poets and romance-writers saturated with the etherial spirit which found embodiment in the Arabian Nights, and we have little doubt that Baihaki was a favourite butt with this brilliant band. The following passage must have come from the bottom of his heart:—

Most people are so constituted that they love silly stories more than the truth, such as those about fairies, hills, and the demons of the deserts and seas, which fools make so much fuss about; as where a narrator says that in a certain sea I saw an island, on which five hundred people landed, and we baked our bread and boiled our pots, and when the fire began to burn briskly the heat descended into the earth, and it then moved away, when we saw that it was merely a fish. Also I saw such and such things moving on a certain hill. Also how an old woman turned a man into an ass by witchcraft; and how another old woman by the same means, after rubbing oil in his ear, turned him into a man again, and other fables like to those which bring sleep, when they are repeated at night-time to people who are ignorant.

But, dull as he is, and partly perhaps because he is so dull, the stamp of authenticity is on all the specimens that are given. Military men will be interested by learning that so early as A.D. 1037, at the siege of Hánsi, the walls were brought down in five places by the springing of mines. These of course must have been galleries driven from a distance, and supported by timbers which were set fire to at the required moment. The Afghans to this day are particularly skilful in driving galleries, and when Sale's Brigade was besieged in Jellalabad experienced officers, who feared nothing else, were apprehensive that mining operations were going on, and sallies were made with the express object of detecting them. Their Cauraizes, or subterranean water-channels, sometimes display the greatest skill, and have immense labour bestowed upon them. Elphinstone heard of one in Khorassán through which a horseman might ride with his lance over his shoulder.

Mahomed Ufi, the fourth on the list, is of yet another order. His work entitled Jamí' ul Hikayut is immensely popular in the East. Sir Henry Elliot calls it a "Romance of History," but we should rather characterize it as a collection of short pieces for young persons, particularly stupid when founded on fact, and particularly prosaic when it ought to be airy. He is much given also to reflections which, as Macaulay says, might have been novelties at the Court of Nimrod or Chedorlaomer; and on the whole we are inclined to recommend him as a fitting subject for manipulation by one or other of the rival monosyllablemongers.

Several other historians are treated of in this volume, but we think we have now said enough to enable our readers to judge of the importance of this joint labour of Sir Henry Elliot and Professor Dowson. It is not of a nature to be popular with the "general reader," and it is the more incumbent therefore on the Indian Government to see that it is neither abruptly closed nor unwisely abridged for want of the requisite support.

GILDAS.*

(Second Notice.)

THE biographies of Gildas are so late and so untrustworthy that we are thrown back for information respecting him to the meagre notes of his life which his Epistle has preserved for us. The most definite of these fixes the date of his birth in the year of the battle of Mount Badon, some seventy years later than the landing of the English in Kent. The year was a year memorable in the annals of Britain. Wherever the great battle took place—whether, as Dr. Guest prefers, in the south, or, as we think Mr.

Gildas und Nennius. Herausgegeben von San-Marte. Berlin: 1844.

Skene has made more probable, in the north of the island—i marks a distinct pause in the advance of the conquerors. London seems, after the first victories of Hengest, to have imprisoned the Jutes within the limits of Kent. The great Andredswold served as a screen between Britain and the burnt and harried coast where the South-Sexe were settling down quietly as farmers around the ruined fortresses of the Saxon shore. After a quarter of a century's advance the terrible Gewissi had halted before the gigantic ramparts of Old Sarum. The great belt of woodland curving round from Dorset to the valley of Thames seemed finally to mark the halt of the southern assailants of the island; while the victories of Arthur, as we dimly read them in the fragment so oddly embedded in Nennius, had, for the hour at least, arrested the dissolution of the North. From London to the Firth of Forth, from the fens of Lincoln to St. David's Head, the province still remained Britain. There was nothing in the long breathing space that followed Mount Badon to herald the second outburst of the English race, that terrible onslaught of forty years, from the victories of Ceaulin to the final overthrow of Chester, that really made Britain England. Between the two attacks stretched half a century of peace, and within this half century lies the life of Gildas. His very tone, indeed, is evidence how rudely the whole fabric of society had been shaken by the struggle which seemed at last at an end. It was not merely that the very tradition of the past had been swept from the mind of the provincial, that for the confused memories which reached him he was indebted to sources "oversea," to Brittany or to Ireland. It was that Britain had become isolated, that by the occupation of the coast the province was cut off from all but occasional contact with the general life of the West. Not a trace of the wider culture of the Pagan world, little more than a trace of Christian literature, appears in the pages of the Epistle. Still peace, and with peace some sort of order, seemed at last to have returned. The imminence of the external danger had for the moment hushed the civil feuds which, far more than the sword of the Saxon, had strewn the fields of Britain with desolate cities. Civil and ecclesiastical society settled down again in seeming harmony for a period which, if we trust the vague expressions of Gildas, lasted through the first thirty years of his life. Then came the change which in half a century more had brought about the final ruin of Britain. Though the ten years from 550 to 560 all peace and order disappeared. The memory of peril from the stranger died with the generation that fought at Crayford and conquered at Mount Badon. Even the presence of the invader, felt more and more along the Eastern coast, where it seems clear that the district beyond the fens was about this time becoming East-Anglia, and at least probable that the East Saxons were settling along the Colne and the Lea, passed almost unperceived by the provincials. Their whole mind, in fact, was bent on the renewal of their ancient strife:—

> Illis decedentibus cum successisset ætas tempestatis illius nescia, et præsentis tantum serenitatis et justitiæ experta, ita cuncta veritatis et justitiæ moderamina concussa et subversa sunt ut eorum non dicam vestigium sed ne dicam monimentum quidem in supradictis propemodum ordinibus appareat, exceptis paucis et valde paucis qui ob amissionem tantæ multitudinis quæ quotidie ruit ad Tartara tam brevis numeri habentur ut in eos quodammodo venerabilis mater ecclesia in sinu suo recumbentes non videat quos solos veros filios habeat.

It was in fact to this "venerable mother" that the disorder was above all attributable. The ecclesiastical aspect of Britain at this time finds its closest analogy in the later ecclesiastical history of Ireland. There, as Dr. Todd has ably pointed out in his monograph on St. Patrick, the Church organized itself on the basis of the clan; tribal quarrels and ecclesiastical controversies became inextricably confounded; no element of union was given as elsewhere by Christianity to the State, while a fatal hindrance to the exertion of all real spiritual influence was thrown in the way of the Church. In the confused strife which preceded the English invasion the clergy had played a great political part, crowning and slaying kings, till the strife itself seems to have taken something of a theological form. Whatever may be the exact import of the Pelagian controversies which are associated with the legend of St. David, or of the "Arian plague" of which Gildas speaks, there was a far more fatal danger in the "apostacy," the tendency to relapse into Paganism which seems to have prevailed in the North. The victories of Arthur and the subsequent successes of Maelgwn saved Christianity for the time, but in the civil strife which had preceded them the moral tone of the British clergy had been hopelessly destroyed. As Giraldus found the Irish priesthood in the twelfth century, so Gildas saw the British priesthood in the sixth. There was the same strange medley of drunkenness with asceticism, of bitterest strife with self-devotion and saintliness. But Gildas is less inclined to dwell fairly on both sides than the amusing prelate of later years:—

> Sed et ipse grex Domini ejusque pastores, qui exemplo esse omni plebi debuerant, ebrietate quam plurimi quasi vino madidi torpebant resoluti, et animositatum timore, jurgiorum contentione, invidiæ capacibus ungulis, indiscreto boni malique judicio carpebantur.

Such as they were, however, the English invasion set them inevitably in the forefront of their race. The struggle in Britain was not merely a struggle of the barbarian with the Roman, it remained to the close a struggle of Pagan against Christian, and the hostility of the invader had been especially directed against the churches and the clergy. But though the terrible attack had increased their power, it seems to have done little for their character. The fierce invective of Gildas attacks their [illegible], their indolence, their neglect of spiritual duties, their indifference to the sin around them, their contempt for sacred duty, their pride, their regard for the rich, their ambition of preferment. There is no reason for crediting this invective with exaggeration. The ecclesiastical aspect of Britain was that of a vast clerical body organized on a secular basis, and in the absence of those higher influences which intercommunion with a wider world could alone have given, dying down into mere strife for power and wealth with the secular princes around them. The result of such a process in Ireland we know from the tittle-tattle of Gerald and the reforms of Malachi; that Britain was saved from lay Coarbs and episcopi vagantes she owes to the sword which made Britain England.

The Teutonic Church which ultimately took its place can smile in its own steady instinct of order, in its regulated and decorous good sense, at the extravagances of the Church of the Celt. But it must be remembered that to the world at large the Celt has supplied an element of enthusiasm, of fire, of contagious sentiment which it could never have gained from the decorum of the Teuton. It is just this fire, this dash, which quickens the turgid pages of the one writer whom the Church of Britain has bequeathed to us. Ascetic, keenly religious in the whole tone of his mind and temper, clinging with a fierce contemptuous passion to the Roman tradition of the past, but vindicating as passionately the new moral truths with which Christianity fronted a world of licence, steeped to the lips in biblical lore, orthodox with the traditional orthodoxy of the Celt, patriotic with the Celtic unreasoning hatred of the stranger, the voice of Gildas rings out like the bitter cry of one of those Hebrew prophets whose words he borrows, rebuking in the same tones of merciless denunciation the invader, the tyrant, and the priest. It is with a sort of relief that we turn from the historical opening of his epistle to what some have called the "turgid rhetoric" of its close; the life of the provincial brightens for us, as we see how the new moral force and freedom given by Christianity jostles with the political serfdom bequeathed by Rome. One after another of the petty chieftains under whom Britain was breaking down into its old chaos of disorder and misrule are branded with the same prophet-like severity. In actual morality they had sunk to the level of the savage; "all," to use the words of their censor, "wallow in the same mire of parricide, fornication, robbery." Perjured, bloodstained, unjust, their crimes were less base than the superstitious cowardice with which they strove to atone for them by heaping wealth on the clergy and the Church. It needed no prophet to foresee a judgment of God gathering for a nation whose rulers were such as these. In the half-century that follows the cry of Gildas, the judgment had come. Already the east coast was lost. The English tribes which were destined to cluster around Mercia were soon winning midland Britain. Then came the irresistible advance of the West-Saxons, severing the West-Welsh from the main body of the British race, and rolling triumphantly along the north of Thames. Everywhere resistance seems to have been fragmentary and local—not national. So far as a national force existed, indeed, it was exhausting itself in the endless revolutions of the North. Among the princes whom Gildas has denounced, there is one whom he singles out as surpassing all in power, and in the variety and enormity of his crimes. Maelgwn had begun with the murder of a royal uncle; then in a fit of wild remorse he had quitted the throne for a monastery; from the monastery he had burst again on the world, had driven away his wife, had murdered his nephew, and lived in adultery with his victim's widow. But, vile as he was, Maelgwn seems to have been an able and a powerful leader. He had inherited the supremacy of those British princes of the Northern borders whose migration a hundred and fifty years before had wrested what we now call North-Wales from the Gael, and a struggle whose memory is preserved in a wild Welsh legend had set him as chief over his fellow-kings. In a great battle north of Carlisle he again re-established Christianity in the Lowlands of the North, and massed the Celtic kingdoms together in the realm of Strathclyde. It was the last great victory of his race. The exhaustion caused by this distant struggle may have been the cause of the crowning success of Wessex, four years after, at Deorham; the union of the Celtic power in the North seems only to have provoked the final effort of their English antagonists, and the establishment of the power of Northumbria on the field of Dægsestan. But with this closing phase of British history Gildas has nothing to do. For the later, as for the earlier, struggle, we are without a contemporary chronicler. What he does for us, and it is a service which has been hardly appreciated by later writers, is to paint fully and vividly the thought and feeling of Britain in the fifty years of peace which preceded her final overthrow.

CHERRIER'S HISTORY OF CHARLES THE EIGHTH.*

WE were going to say that there was no other instance in history of so small a man as Charles the Eighth doing such great things. But we were at once met by the doubt whether Charles the Eighth can be said to have done great things. He was personally concerned in several events which were of very great importance at the time, and which became of still greater importance in relation to the events which followed them. And he really was personally concerned in them; it is not merely that they happened in his reign. Whatever was done in Charles's reign after Charles came of age, Charles had a hand in himself. He was often careless and dilatory, and was often amusing himself when he ought to have been attending to business, but he was as little of a Roi fainéant as any man. His head was full of great schemes, and in a certain sense he accomplished those schemes. That is to say, he wished for a new kingdom and he won it. He won his new kingdom in an amazingly short time, and he lost it again in a time almost as short. To be sure that kingdom was Naples, a kingdom which in all ages has been used to be lost and won more easily than other kingdoms. His greater schemes, to which the conquest of Naples was to be but a mere introduction, he did not achieve; he did not even try to achieve them. Naples was to be a mere bridge to the lands beyond the Adriatic; the overthrow of the Aragonese usurper was to be a mere prelude to the overthrow of the Turk; a coronation or a triumphal entry at Naples was to be a mere rehearsal of the day when a new Frank Emperor should be crowned in Saint Sophia. Of all this nothing came to pass; all that Charles did was to go to Naples and to come back again, and to find the way back again by no means so easy as the way thither. The nearest approach that he made to making war upon the Turk was to have the Sultan's banished brother for a short time in his keeping. Yet he did something; he saw more of the world than most Kings; he gained a kingdom, if he afterwards lost it; if he gained it almost without striking a blow, he fought and won a stoutly contested battle on his way home. He had the further satisfaction of generally upsetting all Italy, one might almost say all Europe. And he had the further honour of doing what we suppose we ought to call "inaugurating an epoch." He began that long series of wars in which Italy was the fighting-ground of the contending Powers of Europe, and which led not only to the enslavement of Italy itself, but to a general change in the relations of all the European States and in the character of European history. That beginning of "modern history" which Baron Bunsen placed in the days of Abraham, which others place in the days of Theodoric, of Charles the Great, of Queen Elizabeth, or of the French Revolution, is placed by Hallam, with at least as good a right as any of the others, at the setting forth of Charles the Eighth for the conquest of Naples. A man who is thus at least chronologically memorable certainly has his place in history. We cannot say that he left his mark on his age, for no doubt the utmost that he did was somewhat to hasten the progress of events. We may be sure that, had Charles the Eighth never lived or had he stayed quietly at home, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Germans would before long have been fighting on Italian ground. Still, as a matter of fact, Charles the Eighth was the actual beginner in a series of great events, and his reign and name form one of the landmarks of history.

But it was one of the strangest freaks of fortune on record which made such a man even an instrument in any event worth recording at all. Charles the Eighth was in every way one of the smallest of men. Judged by the standard of his contemporaries, he was not a particularly bad man; indeed, considering all things, he must have had a very good natural disposition not to be much worse than he was. His education was wretched; his father's jealousy shut him up in his childhood and cut him off from all real knowledge of men and things, while his head was allowed to be stuffed with romances of chivalry which made him fancy it his calling to go about the world like another Alexander. Yet certainly no one was, either in mind or body, less cut out to be a hero. Personal courage he did not lack, but he was in person small, weak, and ugly, and of military capacity he never showed a glimpse. Totally incapable of any kind of intellectual exertion, he was as little able to be a general as to be a statesman. Morally he was certainly better than most contemporary kings. But practically he did just as much mischief as men who were morally much worse. In that most unprincipled age, the age of Ferdinand the Catholic, Alexander the Sixth, and Ludovic of Milan, Charles always carried about with him some general notions of his duty towards God and his neighbour. He does not seem ever to have been consciously cruel or intentionally perfidious. He no doubt sincerely meant to be, and honestly thought that he was, strictly a man of his word. That is, when he promised to do a thing, he at the time really meant to do it. But Charles's word was as little to be trusted as the word of Ferdinand or Ludovic. They made promises which they never meant to fulfil, and broke them in conscious perfidy. Charles made promises which he fully meant to fulfil, and broke them through sheer thoughtlessness and forgetfulness. He plunged into unjust wars, but not, like Ferdinand, out of mere selfish, scheming ambition. The head of a very weak young man was not likely to resist the temptation when he was told that he was not only going to win honour and glory, not only going to assert his own just rights, but also to figure before the world as the champion and liberator of Christendom. Had Charles been capable either of reasonable statesmanship or of enlightened patriotism, he would have stayed at home and looked after the affairs of his kingdom; least of all would he have sacrificed valuable provinces in the hope of securing the neutrality of his neighbours while he went on his mad expedition. But this shows all the more that it was in a fit of sincere enthusiasm that he set out. If he caused infinite misery both by his wars in themselves and by his way of carrying them on, it was all done in sheer stupidity and carelessness, certainly without any purpose or consciousness of being an oppressor. Personally Charles was thoroughly amiable and good-natured; he won the personal affection of all around him; but his thoughtlessness made him do just as much mischief as if he had been a conscious tyrant, and his very good-nature helped to do the mischief by leading him to lavish grants at the wrong time and to the wrong people. Like many other kings, he contrived to reconcile a profession of piety, which we have no right to say was hypocritical, with constant breach of the conjugal tie. But he seems to have somehow reconciled conjugal infidelity with conjugal affection, and towards the end of his life he seems to have really repented and begun to live cleanly. In short, there is something touching in his last days. He died young, he died unexpectedly, and yet, as if he knew what was coming, the last few months of his life appear to have been spent in an honest endeavour to do his duty as a man and as a king, even though his attempts at so doing were sometimes a little awkward. Altogether, as kings go, there is something about Charles the Eighth which attracts a certain personal liking; as the saying goes, we pity more than we condemn. Placed in a position for which he had no one qualification, he is hardly to be blamed if he played his part very badly. But it was a strange irony of fortune which put a man of a capacity far below the average—a man who, full of good intentions, was weighed down by every momentary temptation—in a position which gave him the absolute command of a great kingdom at one of the turning-points of the world's history.

The reign of Charles the Eighth has been the subject, or part of the subject, of several great writers from Philip of Comines onwards; but new information is always turning up, and there was quite room for the solid and thorough monograph of M. de Cherrier, who writes from the latest documentary sources. Moreover, he has the advantage of looking at matters from a French point of view, which is an advantage if only by way of variety, as we are so much more used to look at them from the Italian side. When we say that M. de Cherrier looks at matters from a French point of view, we do not mean to say anything disparaging. We mean only that to write the Italian expedition of Charles the Eighth as a piece of Italian history is a different thing from writing the reign of Charles the Eighth as a piece of French history, and that the latter task is that which M. de Cherrier has, naturally and appropriately, undertaken. In fact we have seldom come across a French author more thoroughly free from fashionable French nonsense. All is simple, solid, and sensible; there are no flourishes, no squibs and crackers, no tall talk of any kind. Perhaps there is an expression or two with regard to Provence and the other annexations of Louis the Eleventh at which a very rigid guardian of the Ten Burgundies might be disposed to cavil. But after all we cannot expect people in the latitude of Paris to look at these matters with proper Imperialist eyes. An Englishman might think it funny for Henry the Seventh, before he became such, to be described as "Richmond de Lancaster," and now that the Danubian Principalities are looking up in the world, a Dane might fairly ask to have his country described by some less ambiguous name than "Dacie." But these are all small matters. The book is a piece of history of the right sort. If M. de Cherrier is not specially brilliant in narration, he still keeps up the interest of his story to the end; he is always clear and straightforward, and quite free from extravagances or affectations of any sort. The French army to be sure is always "our" army, but there is not a trace of that spirit of contempt for the rights of other nations in which too much of French history has been written; M. de Cherrier distinctly condemns the aggressive wars alike of Charles the Eighth, Louis the Twelfth, and Francis the First. With the false glory of Francis, which has led away so many, he is not at all dazzled, and he regrets that a King whose home government was in many things so praiseworthy as that of Louis the Twelfth should have ever forsaken the true work of the Father of his own People to show himself as the oppressor of other nations, the ally of Cæsar Borgia, the sharer in the iniquitous League of Cambray. Altogether we are well pleased with M. de Cherrier's book, both from the thoroughness with which he goes into every branch of his subject, and from the sound principles on which the narrative is written.

The book, as we have said, is essentially a history of the reign of Charles the Eighth, and a piece of French history, not a mere history of Charles's Italian wars. M. de Cherrier begins with a slight sketch of the state of things under Louis the Eleventh, and begins his detailed narrative with the accession of his son. We are thus landed at once in the strange and confused minority of Charles the Eighth, the anomalous government of Anne of Beaujeu, practical ruler of the kingdom without being its acknowledged regent, the intrigues, disputes, and wars of Francis of Britanny, Louis of Orleans—the future King—and the younger Dunois. The most striking thing in this perplexing time is certainly the meeting of the States-General at Tours in 1484. No contrast is more curious than the contrast between these assemblies, infrequent as were their gatherings, and ephemeral as was their authority, and the slow, steady work of the contemporary English Parliaments. Our forefathers did their work in a very unscientific, bit-by-bit sort of way, but they generally did it effectually; by again and again making supplies depend on the redress of grievances they commonly got rid of the grievances in the end. But if elaborate expositions of principles of government are wanted, they must be sought for in France rather than in England. It is the same in the tenth century, in the fifteenth, and in the eighteenth. Never was the doctrine of elective kingship more plainly set forth than by Archbishop Adalbero at the moment when the crown became fixed for eight hundred years in the dynasty of Paris. Never were popular principles of all kinds more strongly insisted on than in the States-General of Tours, in a land which had just escaped from the rod of Louis the Eleventh. In whom did the sovereign authority rest during the minority of the King? Courtiers said in the princes of the blood, his guardians and representatives, who might act in his name and exercise his absolute authority. To this it was answered that the power was in the States-General, that they had a right to decree as well as to demand, and that if their cahiers still took the form of petitions, it was simply in conformity with usage, and because each member taken singly was the inferior of a prince. Then Philip Pot, a Burgundian noble, who had passed from the service of Charles the Bold to that of Louis, makes a speech about as democratic as a speech well can be. M. de Cherrier calls it "un discours qui rappelle moins le quinzième siècle que le tribune de 1789." But according to our notion it is the sort of speech which might have been made in France by fits and starts at any time. However, fifteenth century or eighteenth, the Grand Seneschal of Burgundy argues strongly that during the minority, the supreme power has lapsed to the States-General, and that it is for them only to determine who shall be called to the actual administration. Many of the expressions are very remarkable:—

> La royauté est une dignité et non un héritage. Dans l'origine, le peuple souverain créa des rois pour son utilité, et non pour qu'ils s'enrichissent à ses dépens. . . . N'avez-vous pas entendu répéter souvent que l'État est la chose du peuple? Or, puisque l'État est sa chose, pourquoi ne la soignerait-il pas? Comment des flatteurs osent-ils attribuer la souveraineté au prince qui n'existe que par le peuple? Ne voyons-nous pas enfin qu'aujourd'hui on élit encore les rois dans plusieurs pays? . . . Il faut donc que le pouvoir revienne au peuple, donateur de la chose, que le peuple reprenne à titre de maître l'administration du royaume, ainsi que la tutelle.

Lastly, he says expressly, "J'appelle peuple les hommes de chaque condition."

M. de Cherrier must have modernized the language a little, but we can fully believe that these were the real sentiments of a theoretic statesman of that day. The pity is that they aimed at so much and that so little came of it, while the humbler attempts of our own Parliament were commonly crowned with success. It should be distinctly remembered that so discreet a person as Philip of Comines expressly maintains that a King ought not to make war without the consent of the States.

There is so much suggestive matter in M. de Cherrier's book that we must reserve some notice of the Italian part of it for another article.

"IN this work," says Mr. Wood, "will be found a record of the marriage ceremonies, customs, superstitions, and folk lore of many countries; but not an exhaustive account of the origin and history of matrimony, nor an elaborate statement of the conditions under which it could or can be legally effected, nor a disquisition upon the relations and duties of a married life." Mr. Wood might have named various other topics which are not treated in his pages; such, for example, as the ethics of matrimony, the modifications which marriage is undergoing in various countries in the world, the laws of population as dependent upon the marriage rate, and an immense variety of other questions more or less remotely connected with his primary subject. The reason which he assigns for not plunging into this boundless sea of disquisition is the very obvious and satisfactory one that his book would then have exceeded all reasonable bounds; we may add, that it would have required an amount of learning and ability which very few people can boast of possessing. Without blaming Mr. Wood for not writing an exhaustive account of an almost boundless branch of inquiry—and to apologize for such an omission is as unnecessary as for the writer of a newspaper article to explain that he must stop short of a folio volume—we must yet complain that he did not do a little more. He has collected plenty of materials, though the books to which he chiefly refers—Smith's Dictionary of the Bible and Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, Brand's Popular Antiquities, and Notes and Queries—do not imply any very profound research, but then he has been content to make his book too exclusively with scissors and paste. He has not stopped to philosophize, or to discuss the accuracy of his information; and so far he has probably saved us from some useless and tedious disquisition. But, without affecting any unusual wisdom or learning, he might have taken the trouble to group his facts a little more artistically. Apparently he has been content to take clippings out of the books mentioned and a few others, and has simply arranged them in geographical order. We make a voyage, as it were, in his company, passing from the Jews to the Greeks and Romans, and then by way of the Scythians, Lydians, Parthians, Chaldees, Babylonians, Chinese, Hindoos, Burmese, Siamese, Africans, Moors, Mpongwes, and all manner of other barbarous and civilized nations, till at last we get to the British islands. In each case we are treated to an account of the marriage ceremony, and we confess that, after reading twenty or thirty such accounts, the task begins to be a little tiresome. The only variety is in an occasional rather naive remark, of which we are sometimes at a loss to guess whether it comes from Mr. Wood himself or has crept in accidentally from the authority whom he happens to be quoting. Thus, for example, we are informed that "seduction under promise of marriage, marriage for mere money, and the prejudice against mothers-in-law were common amongst the Romans." Mr. Wood speaks as if the prejudice against mothers-in-law, and the other customs mentioned, were some of the arbitrary ceremonial observances by which marriage was accompanied in Rome.

Mr. Wood has, in short, indulged in a bit of bookmaking of the simplest possible kind. He has served up his raw materials without the least attempt to cook them, or in any way to make them palatable. People with an appetite for simple gossip and a dislike to any admixture of reflection may read the book with amusement, and with the negative comfort that they will not be disgusted by any of the flippancy and affectation common amongst the more ambitious class of bookmakers. If their appetite for facts is not so strong but that they require a little sauce of speculation, they must supply it for themselves. Persons about to be married may derive the peculiar satisfaction, for their own meditation, that on the whole a wedding, unpleasant as it may be at the present day, is a much less uncomfortable ceremony than in any other known age or country. Thus, for example, the young lady of the present age may congratulate herself that we retain so little, if we retain anything, of the ancient and universal custom by which marriage recalled, more or less vividly, the primeval system of forcible capture. If she had lived in certain parts of Australia, her lover would have come behind her quietly with a nulla-nulla or war-club, stunned her with a well-directed blow, and carried her off in a state of insensibility. If a celebrated beauty, she would have been transferred by a similar process to a succession of husbands. Amongst the Kalmucks, she would have been put upon a horse, and her lover would have followed upon another, and tried to ride her down. In some parts of Arabia she would have had to run away to the mountains, and hide herself in a cave until the intended bridegroom managed to discover her place of refuge. It would be considered only proper for her to run away several times afterwards, before finally settling down in her husband's tent. Even in Ireland, so late as 1767, if Mr. Wood be right, the custom of carrying off wives by force used to be practised. In that year a lover besieged the house of the lady with a party of armed men, and, in the struggle which ensued, the intended father-in-law was shot dead, and several of the besiegers were mortally wounded. Making every allowance for the Irish love of a fight, we should fancy that this was a rather exceptional proceeding; and, as Mr. Brown informs us that the lady was not secured, we can hardly suppose that it was a recognised part of the marriage ceremony. We are told, however, in 1682, that "of old" it was the custom for the bridegroom's party to cast darts from a distance at that of the bride, and that, though a safe distance was generally kept, it is "not out of the memory of men that the Lord of Hoath on such an occasion lost an eye." The only relic of this custom which is alleged to be traceable in our modern customs is the practice of throwing a shoe for luck. This, it has been suggested, may be intended as a sham assault upon the person carrying off the woman. Shoes, however, have played so large a part in weddings that it is very possible that something else may be indicated. It may have been a sign of the renunciation of dominion over the bride by her father or guardian. Luther, at a wedding which he attended, took off the husband's shoe and put it on the head of the bed, as a sign that he assumed authority over her. Amongst the Nestorians the bridegroom gave the bride a kick, and ordered her to pull off his shoes, as a token of submission. Amongst the Anglo-Saxons, the bridegroom received one of the bride's shoes as a token of the transfer of authority, and gave her a blow on the head with it. Antiquaries may take their choice of these symbols, or may invent something else equally satisfactory. Mr. M'Lennan, in his book upon primitive marriages, has pointed out the curious way in which similar customs arise all over the world without any possibility of communication between the different peoples. The savage notion of marriage was everywhere that which still prevails in Australia, where the good old rule and simple plan of knocking your intended on the head, and carrying her off bodily, continues to flourish. Ceremonies, in this as in other cases, are not the product of some arbitrary convention, but are actions which were once essential parts of the transaction, and which persist after their meaning has been forgotten; just as a dog continues to turn himself three times round before lying down on a rug because he indulged in the same practice when he had to make his own couch in long grass. If Mr. Wood had traced out the same principle in other cases, there would have been an intelligible thread in his book, instead of its being, as now, a random collection of miscellaneous facts.

A large proportion, indeed, of the ceremonies noticed by Mr. Wood may be reduced under the simple head of feasting. In every part of the world, marriage, as well as other critical ceremonies in life, is felt to be an excellent excuse for intoxication. In the most primitive ages, indeed, when it was a bond fide act of violence, festivities would scarcely be in place. But all marriage ceremonies seem to belong to one class or the other. Amongst the least civilized peoples, they were an occasion for a fight; when the world was improved, they became an occasion for drinking; and at the intermediate stages the two modes of celebration were combined. The ceremony itself generally included drinking in some shape or other; and the festivities, which in our squeamish modern days have been narrowed down to the depressing ceremony of the wedding breakfast, were continued in most countries for days or weeks. Of another custom which has been engrafted upon it we find no mention in Mr. Wood's book, and we would hope that it may disappear along with others of more venerable origin. No race, so far as we can see, except our own, has been foolish enough to make speeches on the occasion of a marriage. It would be curious to discover at what period it first entered into the head of some misguided person that there was a natural connexion between oratory and matrimony. Other ceremonial observances have been gradually dying down. Many that were popular of old have been condemned as indelicate and troublesome. We have no longer struggles for the bride's garters; we do not throw the stocking, nor indulge in a mimic contest between the relations of the two persons concerned; but the practice of speech-making, having its origin, as we may suppose, in the comparatively harmless system of drinking toasts, has been developed to proportions of a real nuisance. The common sense of mankind, it is true, is revolting against this practice, and marriages are gradually conforming to the sound principle that, on serious occasions, things cannot be done too simply. In time we may hope that, when two people are pledging themselves to live together for life, they will be allowed to do it as soberly and seriously as possible, without those elaborate ceremonials which once had a meaning, but which have long ceased to have anything but a damping influence on the cheerfulness they were supposed to promote. Simplicity is the chief virtue in this as in all other occasions of real solemnity.

HAWKER'S CORNISH BALLADS.*

IT is somewhat strange that the legendary history of Cornwall should not have found more and mightier vates sacri than it has hitherto produced. The associations of every feature "all down the thundery shores of Bude and Boss," the inseparable connexion of Arthurian story with "old Dundagil by the Cornish sea"—to say nothing of the legacies of wandering droll-tellers, which, dutifully handled and arranged, might have been the making of Cornish Iliads and Odysseys—ought to have evoked a treasure of ballad-poetry even out of hearts of stone, especially as there is everything in the locality and its scenery to favour poetic feeling. Nature, in her most fanciful moods, clothing with turf and woodland one stretch of sea-shore, and here and there surmounting another with isolated cones of rock from which old circular keeps, "towery topped castles," answer one another on "the winding shore of Severne sea"; lavish too in her gifts of springs and caves, whereof superstition has availed itself for memorable shrines and holy wells—might have found more grateful voices to shape her poetry into words, and wed to verse the myths of a land's end severed from the rest of England by the Tamar. But of poets, filially set upon recording her marvels, Cornwall has been certainly sterile. There are prose traditions, and tours, from many pens—the most recent those of Halliwell, White, Wilkie Collins, and Robert Hunt; and of course there are scattered metrical legends of old and new manufacture. But there is little, so far as we know, worthy of the subject, nothing to bespeak the existence of poetry and imagination native in the scenes where one might have expected them—no lays of the spires and towers still visible to fancy's eye beneath the Lyonesse or Guavas Lake, none about "greenstone" rocks referable to the disobedience of giants' wives, and to apron-strings burst through the violence of their spouses in pre-police magistrate epochs. That expectation is not unreasonable in having counted upon more fruit from such a nursery of myth and legend might, we think, be easily shown; and a little note by the author of the pleasant volume before us illustrates—in the hoax played off by him unwittingly on two such legend lovers as Lord Macaulay and Sir Walter Scott—the general predisposition to fancy that of Cornish ballads there can be no end. Taking a hint from the three famous traditional lines which express Cornwall's interest in Sir Jonathan Trelawney, one of the bishops imprisoned by James II., Mr. Hawker, in 1825, composed a song which imposed itself on Mr. Davies Gilbert and the above-named critics as the original ballad. No doubt Mr. Hawker deserves the same measure of praise as the comparative anatomist who constructs a megatherium to order after a glimpse of its fossil tail; but the fact remains that the original ballad has been let to die out—an indication of little honour to the Muse in a region where she had many claims to reverence.

Happily, to this indifference there are exceptions, and Mr. Hawker's volume witnesses to a courtship of poetry from his youth up. Contemplation of nature, and an ear alive to legend and tradition, have apparently fitted him to be the balladist of Cornwall, and to fulfil in some measure the word of promise broken at an earlier date by another Cornish-Oxonian, Polwhele, the translator of Theocritus, in his Traditions and Recollections of Cornwall—a couple of octavos which enshrined no traditions except the myth that the author might have been Bampton Lecturer if he had but taken his M.A. degree, and no recollections except of contemporary characters not particularly Cornish, interspersed with milk-and-water verses about everything except Cornwall and her traditions. Mr. Hawker, too, has his Oxford recollections, and laurels actually borne away from the banks of Isis; but, except a casual allusion in his lines on the "Token Stream of Tidna Combe," the sole memorial of them in the present volume is a reprint of his poem on Pompeii, which gained the Newdigate in 1827, and which is so much better than the run of University prize-poems that it will bear comparison with Macaulay's Cambridge poem of 1819 on the same subject. A re-perusal of this early effort of the Vicar of Morwenstow will attest his youthful gift of a cultivated Muse; and in the refinement, grace, and rhythm of his occasional poems in the volume before us we see ripe fruit off the same tree. "Genovera"—a beautiful embodiment of a beautiful German legend—the legend of Saint Cecily, and St. Thecla, are poems in this collection which their author might have written had he never quitted the cloistered shade for the busier life of a Cornish parish. But we are inclined to think that his poetic gifts are more distinctly marked by the ballad-work and the essentially Cornish pieces of the book before us. It is in these that we get beyond conventionalism and verse-making to the realities of observation, and to a fancy bred amidst nature's haunts and phenomena. The author's mind is tinged by the genius loci. Had his name and all local data been wanting, it would have been easy, in great part, to identify them. We should have known the author for one who dwelt where rock and river, bosky combe, and rude, wild ocean, are not far apart, in a land full of ancient towers and shrines, cairns, holy wells and the like, the nurses of poetic fancy. For instance, here is a token, from a poem called "the Storm," of the writer's familiarity with the struggle between land and sea—the appeal from ocean met day after day by the ne plus ultra of a rock-bound coast:—

> They come—they mount—they charge in vain.
> Thus far, incalculable main!
> No more! Thine hosts have not o'erthrown
> The lichen on the barrier stone.
> Have the rocks faith that thus they stand,
> Unmoved, a grim and stately band,
> And look, like warriors tried and brave,
> Stern, silent, reckless, o'er the wave?

Observation and imagination have their joint work here; and an echo of this same lesson, brought within the ken of the poet-pastor in his daily work, forms the basis of his noble lines entitled "Morwenna Statio," familiar nearly a score of years ago to the readers of "Church Poetry," and equally deserving to be as household words to Churchmen of to-day, because they breathe a faith and hope peculiarly inspiriting to times of disquietude as to the future. The poem is suggested by the site of Mr. Hawker's "Saxon Shrine," and is noteworthy as interpreting in some of its stanzas the symbolic forms and shapes of church architecture. We extract, for spirit and force, as well as for their happy omen, the concluding stanzas:—

> How all things glow with life and thought,
>   Where'er our faithful fathers trod!
> The very ground with speech is fraught,
>   The air is eloquent of God.
> In vain would doubt or mockery hide
>   The buried echoes of the past,
> A voice of strength, a voice of pride,
>   Here dwell amid the storm and blast.
>
> Still points the tower, and pleads the bell.
>   The solemn arches breathe in stone;
> Window and wall have lips to tell
>   The mighty faith of days unknown.
> Yea, flood and breeze, and battle shock
>   Shall beat upon this church in vain;
> She stands, a daughter of the rock,
>   The changeless God's eternal fane.

These extracts must suffice to illustrate the influence of the author's position upon his poetry, though we might well point to the "dreamland" beauty of his true tale of the "Poor Man and his Parish Church" as meet to be reckoned alongside of what we have quoted. We turn to other pieces which owe their birth to the legends and customs of the coast-land. Among these, three or four (such as the "Croon on Hennacliff" and "Mawgan of Melhuach") relate to the evil deeds and ends of Cornish wreckers. On such a theme Mr. Hawker has done wisely rather to restrain himself than to expatiate—glancing at the painful subject rather than exhausting it, and preferring perhaps to expend his verse upon topics more congenial. Such are furnished without stint by the legends of his neighbourhood. "The Doom-well of St. Madron" is his cue for a spirited glimpse at King Arthur testing the fealty or falseness of his Knights' right hands by their ability to bear contact with the sensitive waters of that mystic fountain. The same company, Tristan, Percivale, Galahad, Launcelot, Guennivar, "the sunset tangled in her golden air" (query, "hair"), encounter us, later, in a poem of more pretension, the "Quest of the Sangraal"—a reprint which seems to urge a silent claim to be another "Idyl of the King." We are not sure that the blank verse "mystery," so called, pleases us so much as the briefer romance of the well. Hartland Tower and Cell suggest a vision of a monkish legend; and the "Sisters of Glen Nectan," in Tintagel parish, is a pathetic ballad of kindred source, but of different burden. The local legend of St. Nectan's Kieve (he was brother of Morwenna, and a colonist from Brecknockshire, where his father Braganus or Breachan ruled over the kindred Kymri) was improved by Mr. Hawker as long ago as 1830, for his Echoes of Old Cornwall, into the tale of the "Silent Sisters," which he tells us that Mr. Wilkie Collins and Mr. Walter White have accepted as a genuine legend. There is perhaps truer ballad metal in his "Silent Tower of Bottreau," based on the abortive effort of Forrabury Church to rival that of Tintagel in its peal of bells. As the pilot of the ship that was bearing home the expected peal neared Bottreau harbour, his thanks to God for a successful voyage were called forth by hearing the bells of Tintagel; but ere they were well uplifted, they experienced a rude check from the impious captain. But his judgment was at hand in one of those huge waves from the Atlantic which, on the north shores of Cornwall, over-power everything with their weight and force. The vessel was lost, with all its freight, save the pilot:—

* The Cornish Ballads and other Poems of the Rev. R. S. Hawker, Vicar of Morwenstow. Oxford and London: James Parker & Co. 1869.

> Still when the storm of Bottreau's waves
> Is wakening in his weedy caves,
> Those bells, that sullen surges hide,
> Peal their deep notes beneath the tide:
>   Come to thy God in time,
>   Thus saith the ocean chime.
>   Storm, billow, whirlwind past,
>   Come to thy God at last.

The refrain of this ballad, of which the four last lines are a sample, is very good. For such as like the lays of Cavaliers, Mr. Hawker provides the spirited ballad of "Sir Bevill," the gate-song of the neighbouring "Stowe" and of the loyal Granvilles. We have a tale of the Crusades in the local legend of "Bien-aimè"; and, for a Norman story, "The Death-race," in which it is told, in stirring numbers, how Fitz-Walter outwitted the Cornish knight and bore away his daughter over seas, alive in her shroud. Another very ballad-like piece is "Annot of Benallay" a version of the old story of a maiden in a trance carried to her grave, and left there by the mourners, but revisited by a greed-loving sexton, intent to get the ring from off her finger. In the prose legends which we have chanced upon, the sexton cuts the lady's finger in his efforts to secure his prize, so quickening to life again her stilled pulses. We fancy, too, that the printer must have known the same version, and not that of Mr. Hawker, which does not allude to the knife. At any rate he makes a curious misprint, excusable and intelligible from our view of the legend. The tenth verse is printed:—

> Joy! 'tis the miracle of gore,
>   Of the city called Nain;
> Lo! glad feet throng the sculptured floor,
>   To hail their dead again.

Clearly Mr Hawker wrote "yore," and not "gore," which, however, is as good and passable as many various readings.

Another very quaint and poetically-told legend—the "Legend of the Hive"—is too curious to be passed over unnoticed. It is new to us, as it will probably be to others. An old woman believes that by secretly abstracting a piece of the sacramental bread she may "tice" out the bees, which were mute and idle in her hives. For the marvel that ensued—the shrine that, at day-dawn, surmounted the bread, having been reared by the harmless race—

> They brought their walls from bud and flower,
> They built bright roof and beamy tower—

we refer our readers to the volume before us. The moral of "this parable of sacred things" is quite worth finding out.

Although the scenes and associations of his parish supply our author with the material for three parts of his legends and poems, he is entitled to the praise of entire absence of egotism. In only one poem, of brief dimensions, "the Tamar Spring," does he furnish even a fragment on which to base a biography of himself. But the sweet, musing elegiacs in which he compares his own course—out of sequestered tranquillity into busy life and worldly action, and his longing, when far away from his source, to shrink back to it again—with the various locales of "this storied river of the West," justify a comparison which is unobtrusively instructive:—

> Scenes fierce with men thy seaward current laves,
>   Harsh multitudes will throng thy gentle brink;
> Back with the grieving concourse of thy waves,
>   Home to the waters of thy childhood shrink.
>
> Thou heedest not! thy dream is of the shore,
>   Thy heart is quick with life, on! to the sea!
> How will the voice of thy far streams implore, >   Again amid these peaceful weeds to be!

And yet this touching comparison suggests to us the same reflection with which we prefaced our remarks—how little really has been done to embody in meet verse the ample legends of Cornwall. This very "Tamar" has its mythic story of exceeding beauty—how Tamara, the gnome's daughter, was wooed by Tavy and Tawrage, sons of the giant, how her sire metamorphosed her into a stream, and her lovers, having at length compassed a like change, strove to wed their courses with hers, with unequal success. The "Tamar Spring" of Mr. Hawker has no hint of all this, which still contains the making of an Ovidian verse-story. And there are many like legends yet to be gathered into a poetic garland, if some one will but wreath them before they fade out of men's memory. We all know that there comes a time of life when it goes hard with us to keep up our earlier court to the Muses, and when numbers flow less easily than when we "lisped" them in youth. But perhaps it is not too late to hope that Mr. Hawker may yet address himself to another series of "Ballads," and renew the obligation which he has conferred upon his own county, as well as upon all lovers of ballad-song, in so spirited and poetic a form as the volume for which we now have to thank him.

THE AUSTRIAN NARRATIVE OF BENEDEK'S CAMPAIGN.*

(Second Notice.)

THE movement of Benedek behind the Elbe which took place on the 29th of June was not accomplished without some serious losses. To the 4th Corps, hitherto unengaged, was assigned the duty of covering the retreat, a brigade being sent to the left to free the now broken troops of Gablenz from their pursuers of the day before, and the rest disposed across the roads to the north of Josephstadt along which must advance the victorious column of Prussians which had carried Nachod and Skalitz in the successive actions of the two preceding days. The corps commander, Count Festetics, had orders not to make any prolonged resistance to the advance of the Prussians, if it took place in force; for Benedek intended his movement of retreat and concentration to be carried out without further actions. But it is not of course always possible to carry off a rearguard safely from a superior force, and especially when that force is flushed by repeated recent successes. The Crown Prince's columns came on this day with a boldness and certainty which showed that his army was gaining that moral advantage over its enemy which tells more heavily in war than any other element; and the Prussians had occasion once more to thank the prescience which had armed them so much better than their adversaries. Festetics, unwilling, according to his own report, to demoralize his troops by an instant retreat, resolved to repulse the enemy's first advance before drawing off. As his skirmishers were driven in rapidly on Schweinschadel—a village which covered his rear—he ordered an infantry battalion to support them, and attack the pursuing body, a part of the Prussian 6th Regiment; but, the latter receiving the charge coolly on open ground, it failed utterly before the withering fire of the needle-gun, and the Austrian rear-guard was forced to retreat, leaving nearly the whole of another battalion shut up in the village. Great part of these were taken, and Festetics lost 1,400 men before he carried his troops over the Elbe; while on his left the Prussian guard followed up their victory of the day before by attacking the brigade which he had detached to cover Gablenz, and drove it over the bridge at Koniginhof so sharply as to cut off some hundreds more.

These skirmishes in front of Benedek's main army were thrown into insignificance by the battle of Gitschin, lost by his left wing that day. How much of the unfortunate stand made there by the Saxons and Clam Gallas was due to the faults of Benedek and his staff, we pointed out in a former article.† The Court-martial since held upon Clam Gallas has acquitted him of personal blame—a fact which seems to increase the weight of the charge against his chief, who at the moment sought, in his reports to Vienna, to throw the blame upon that general, and on the headquarter staff round his own person. It had been intended, in retreating to a defensive position behind the Elbe, that the two corps from Gitschin should come in and form the left, fronting eastward; but when news came early on the 30th June that they were falling back on the main body "disorganized and exhausted" from their defeat, a retreat on Koniggratz was at once resolved on. This was ordered for the morning of the 1st, the trains being moved on at once; and the movement was announced by telegram to the Emperor that afternoon, and ascribed simply to the debâcle (so free is the adoption of foreign words in the Austrian military vocabulary) of the 1st Corps and the Saxons. At Koniggratz Benedek was met by encouraging replies declaring that, in spite of his retreat, he still had his master's full confidence; but his telegraphic answer was but to urge the Emperor, in the message quoted in our former article, to "make peace at any price," and the same message was repeated through the Emperor's adjutant, Colonel Beck, with the charges against the staff officers previously accused by him of falling short of their duties.

Benedek had much excuse for his alarm. His losses had been inordinately large, amounting to just 30,000 of his army hors de combat. Of these more than one-half were missed from the 1st and 10th Corps, and the greater part of the remainder from the 6th and 8th. The 4th and the Saxons had suffered much less, and the two remaining corps, the 2nd and 3rd, had not been engaged. But the morale of the whole was shaken by the dreadful effect of the Prussian arms, whilst the disproportionate losses, five times at least that of the enemy, had seriously increased the original disparity of numbers. The consternation which both chief and army felt, and the course which the former intended to pursue after falling back on Königgratz, are fully revealed by a long despatch telegraphed to Vienna from that fortress at midnight on the 1st, twelve hours after Colonel Beck had left for Vienna, and containing the following passages—one apparently intended to explain away the previous threat of "a catastrophe being unavoidable," and another showing no defensive battle to be thought of:—

> Of eight corps there are, after merely partial combats, only two intact, and these and the reserves are much fatigued. All need rest and supplies, the 10th especially the means of cooking. Our great losses have arisen mainly from the murderous fire of the needle-gun, which has impressed all without exception who have been in action. All this, as well as the rout of the 1st and Saxon corps, before communicated, has compelled our falling back here. On my way I found the numerous trains of the army not far enough to the rear; and if under such circumstances an energetic attack of the enemy had occurred, a catastrophe would have been unavoidable. Happily up to this hour he has not pressed us. I shall let the army rest here to-morrow, and send the trains on. The day after I must continue to retreat on Pardubitz, as we still want both food and water. If I am not outflanked, can count still on the troops, and have the opportunity of an offensive stroke, I will make it; otherwise I shall carry on the army as quickly as possible on to Olmütz, and there wait your Majesty's orders.

Benedek telegraphed again at midday on the 2nd, to modify his first unfavourable reports; but the incriminated officers mentioned in them were already removed by telegraphic orders, and his subsequent request to employ Henikstein and Krismanic still with the army in other functions than their late charges on the staff, was peremptorily refused. These two generals were dismissed with himself to half-pay at the conclusion of the war, when Clam Gallas was publicly exculpated.

On the evening of the 1st Benedek must have in some degree recovered his lost confidence, for his published orders declared that the next day should be further devoted to resting the army and forwarding on the trains. The retreat from the new position in front of Koniggratz was in fact to be delayed for twenty-four hours longer. Meanwhile the Prussians, though slow and cautious considering their late repeated successes, had not been idle. The Crown Prince, after first designing to turn Benedek's former line behind the Elbe by detaching a corps round to the eastward of Josephstadt, had discovered the retreat of the Austrians from the river, and followed him across it. He had also got by his right into good communication with Prince Frederic Charles, now advanced beyond Gitschin, and within half a day's march of Benedek. The King had now arrived with Von Moltke, and taken personal command, thereby ensuring that unity of operation which it had been his adviser's design from the commencement to effect when the mountains were once well passed by the armies.

At noon on the 2nd Benedek summoned his whole staff of generals to his head-quarters for personal conference. All came, expecting to hear something of his plans, and were surprised to find that the meeting seemed to be merely for the purpose of exhorting them to restore discipline and confidence among their men, and to keep a good watch in front of their respective corps. At last the generalissimo inquired if water was found in sufficient abundance for all the camp, and, being assured on this head, declared that he should rest the army in its present position "for some days further." Baron Edelsheim, a comparatively young officer, whose personal conduct in previous wars had raised him to the charge of a light cavalry division, declared openly his belief that the enemy would attack that evening or on the morrow, but obtained no reply from his chief, who only gave orders to extend the patrols well out, and dismissed his council. He had passed apparently from the extreme of despondency into a dangerous confidence, for, when once more alone, he telegraphed to the Emperor that "the rest and supply of the troops had had an excellent effect, and that he hoped no further retreat would be necessary." Meanwhile the Engineers, by his orders, threw up some small works about Chlum and Nedelist, facing northward, to cover the right. All that afternoon, reports (many of which are quoted textually by the Austrian writer) told that the enemy was not far from the outposts on the north and west sides of the position. Benedek at last was forced to believe these, but attached more weight to those from the latter side as the more pressing; and at eleven P.M. he issued orders preparing his army for an attack in that direction, reserving two corps only of his eight to watch the north, one of which was in a certain case to be used to support the other six.

Meanwhile Prince Frederic Charles, believing the enemy before him near Sadowa to be only three corps at the most, resolved to attack at daylight, and communicated his intention to his cousin, with a view to the latter protecting his northern flank as he moved on from the west. Von Moltke, determining to make the action as decisive as possible, ordered the Crown Prince to co-operate with Frederic Charles's attack by advancing his whole army. And so the next morning the great battle was brought on—the greatest indeed, in point of size, of all the actions of modern wars, for at least 450,000 men were brought upon the ground; whereas at Leipsic—let slipshod historians who love large numbers say what they will—not over 400,000 at the outside were engaged. The course of the battle was of the simplest, and will be readily understood by those who observe Benedek's dispositions of the night before Prince Frederic Charles hotly engaged for some hours the six corps of Benedek which looked west. The seventh before midday was advanced to aid them on the right of his line, and a gap was thus left on the northern face of the position between them and the remaining corps, the 2nd. Into this gap about noon poured the leading divisions of the Crown Prince's army, the Prussian Guards, and the battle was won at a blow.

Our readers will probably admit that the Austrian Government have proved their thesis, the incompetence of Benedek for his high post. It would be harder for them to explain away the following incident, which has been openly published in Bavaria, Austria's ally of 1866, and never contradicted, and which furnishes an admirable moral for the student of the Austrian system, and of systems that closely follow it. Some time before the war broke out, a certain Austrian general who had served with distinction against Denmark made a voluntary report upon the needle-gun, in which he demonstrated its superiority to the muzzle-loader, and declared plainly, from his experience of its powers, that the latter could not be depended on to face it in action. His only reply was an official rebuke from the Austrian War Chancery, informing him that "the Emperor himself commanded his own army, and needed no advice from his generals on subjects on which they had not expressly been called upon to report!" Let Benedek then by all means bear his part of the blame of his failure, but let the shame be shared by the system under which Benedek served.

THE SESSION UP TO WHITSUNTIDE.

BOTH Houses of Parliament have been actively engaged since the middle of February in preparing for themselves employment which, if it were not for the most part destined to postponement, would occupy them long after the middle of August. It is not in consequence of indolence on the part either of the Government or of Parliament, that no important Bill has yet passed into a law. The House of Commons has never been so fully or constantly attended as during the discussion of the clauses of the Irish Church Bill in Committee. Both parties mustered night after night all their available force, to prove to the constituencies and to the Minister the perfect discipline of the majority, and, on the other side, for the purpose of recording an earnest and unavailing protest. Private members were accordingly compelled to abandon their favourite schemes of legislation; nor had the Government leisure to deal either with original measures or with Bills prepared by the House of Lords. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL found it expedient to postpone to a future stage the discussion on the principles of the Bankruptcy Bill; and Mr. FORSTER's Endowed Schools Bill has not yet emerged from the Select Committee, though it is understood that the Report will retain the principal elements of the original scheme. The Scotch Education Bill, which has been carried, though not without considerable alterations, through its most important stages in the House of Lords by the Duke of ARGYLL, will be still more readily adopted by the House of Commons, as it is understood that the majority of the Scotch members are favourable to the scheme. The House of Lords has also been occupied in passing the Habitual Criminals Bill, which would probably have been unavoidably thrust aside if it had been introduced by the HOME SECRETARY in pursuance of his first intention. Lord SALISBURY's Joint Committee which was to contrive a plan for rendering the legislation of the Upper House more effective is said to have ultimately confined itself to a questionable project of a change in the conduct of private business. If the plan is adopted, Private Bills will be submitted to Joint Committees formed of the members of both Houses, so that a second trial of the same issue will be in all cases avoided. The limited use which is at present made of the power of appeal to a second tribunal seems to show that there is little need of a change. As a general rule, Bills are opposed in the second House only when some grave interest is at stake; and the questions of expediency involved are sometimes so important that petitioners may fairly claim another hearing for their objections.

Mr. GOSCHEN's Bills for a new metropolitan assessment, and for reviving by a circuitous process the convenient system of compounding for rates, will meet with little opposition, and all parties seem inclined to support Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN's plan for establishing Financial Boards in counties. The House of Lords, and probably the county members, have little desire to see a transfer of power from the landowners, who ultimately bear the burden, to the actual ratepayers. No public funds are at present administered with so vigilant a frugality as county rates, nor will an infusion of elected guardians produce any practical advantage; but modern legislation, under the influence of constituencies in the background, pays peculiar and not unmerited attention to the redress of the grievances which are called sentimental. The magistrates who control the receipt and expenditure of the county funds are not elected by the ratepayers, who naturally demand the establishment, in this case also, of representation as the correlative of taxation. The only alternative of the institution of mixed Financial Boards would be the assumption by the landowners of the direct payment of the county rates. The burden would be trifling, but perhaps it is desirable to associate the tenant-farmers as much as possible with the gentry, in the hope that the social separation of classes may be partially corrected by political or municipal co-operation. An additional reason for the change consists in the expediency of rendering every institution theoretically defensible. An accidental and anomalous system which happens to work well may easily be tolerated until it is attacked, but the Select Committee which recently investigated the subject ascertained that general dissatisfaction had been produced by the exclusive financial powers of the justices. The members of the Government in the House of Commons, relieved from the immediate supervision of the Irish Church Bill, may well find sufficient energy to pass measures relating to local administration. It will be interesting to learn whether the remarkable unanimity which has prevailed since the beginning of the Session will extend to miscellaneous questions. Every Liberal member is pledged to support Mr. GLADSTONE, and to vote for the destruction of the Irish Establishment, and in some instances the electors may have intended to allow their members a certain liberty of action when their primary duty is discharged. Every prudent member will, even on secondary matters, abstain from offering any troublesome opposition to the Government; but a certain licence of private judgment may perhaps be allowed with respect to endowed schools, to cattle markets, to assessments, and even to county boards. A general who is confident in the devotion of his army can sometimes afford a partial relaxation of discipline when no enemy is in sight. In the next Session, when further Irish measures are introduced, stragglers will be peremptorily recalled to the ranks.

Some Bills which have passed wholly or partially through either House will be defeated in the attempt to carry them further. The House of Lords will probably reject the SOLICITOR-GENERAL's Bill for abolishing University tests, nor will it defer to the large majority of the Commons which sanctioned the principle of marriage with the sister of a deceased wife. It is probable, indeed, that the House of Lords will be more than usually jealous in minor matters of an independence which must be apparently compromised by the necessity of yielding on the Irish Church Bill. The reasons for ratifying a decision which is unpalatable to the great majority have overwhelming force. It is at all times necessary to avoid collisions on great political questions with the more powerful body which is supported and urged forward by the mass of the nation. A temporary check to a movement which will only derive additional force from the interposition of an obstacle merely prepares the way for a subsequent retreat. The House of Lords can by no possibility save the Irish Establishment; and by prolonging the contest it would not only impair its own power, but would inflict additional damage on the object of its care. The consummate ingenuity of Mr. GLADSTONE's complex Bill was displayed in the combination of a sweeping revolution with minute and elaborate provisions for the benefit of the religious body affected and of its actual members. The irritation which Mr. GLADSTONE has sometimes exhibited in return for the resentment which he has provoked, sufficiently intimates the probable modification of his plans if a defeat in the House of Lords should compel him to revise it for the purpose of introducing it again. Neither the Government nor the House of Commons will assent to any grave alteration in the measure which has been sanctioned in detail or in gross by overwhelming majorities. The property of the Church, and its political or corporate rank, are irrevocably doomed, and changes in the measure will practically affect only the surviving incumbents or the clergy and laity of the future Church. If the House of Lords attempts to secure the parsonage-houses to the clergy without payment, Mr. GLADSTONE will probably insist on selling them at their full value; and he will certainly make no concession with respect to the glebes. It would, in truth, have been a useless act of spoliation to deprive the Irish Church of less than all its property. A practical evil may be partially diminished; but a theoretical grievance remains in full force as long as any fraction of the whole is deliberately preserved. The Irish Church Bill cannot, however much some people may regret it, be made more lenient, except at the cost of the principle by which alone it can be justified. The details, with the exception of the provisions for the Presbyterians and for Maynooth, are for the benefit of the Church. It may be hoped that the House of Lords will have sufficient statesmanlike wisdom to abstain from a useless and mischievous interference with the Maynooth compensation. If the payment were withheld, the money would not be restored to the Protestant Church, nor can it be material to the expropriated body whether a portion of its funds is applied to a Roman Catholic college or to a lunatic asylum.

As the lioness in Æsop, discoursing with the mother of a numerous litter, boasted that her solitary whelp was a lion, the Session, notwithstanding the paucity of its products, will not have been barren if the House of Lords wisely acquiesces in the Irish Church Bill. The Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, which is expected to prepare the way to the adoption of the Ballot, will not report in time for immediate legislation. It is possible that one remarkable change in the Constitution may be adopted if the Government undertakes the conduct of Lord RUSSELL'S Life Peerage Bill in the House of Commons. There would be no formidable opposition to a measure which has in some respects a democratic appearance, and it would perhaps be thought a vexatious abuse of power to restrain the House of Lords in its newborn zeal for innovation. The postponement of the Bill would not involve any disastrous consequences, but further consideration would throw no additional light on the merits of the scheme. If Parliament creates life-peerages in the same year in which it suppresses the Irish Establishment, and if it passes the Duke of ARGYLL'S Bill for primary education in Scotland, and Mr. FORSTER'S Bill on secondary education, the popular appetite for novelty will be sufficiently appeased. Its function of controlling public policy has been usefully exercised in the debates on the state of Ireland and on English pauperism. A not less urgent question will be raised if Sir H. BULWER proceeds with his motion on the late negotiations with America. From the beginning of the civil war to the present time Parliament has displayed remarkable prudence in abstaining from all discussions which could furnish the United States with a pretext for taking offence; and there is no reason to doubt that if the actual relations between the two countries are brought before the House of Commons, the same delicacy and reserve will be maintained by all parties. The cause of peace will probably be advanced by a firm and temperate assertion of the policy which all classes and parties are fully determined to pursue. It is especially desirable that Mr. GLADSTONE should be as jealous of English dignity as he will undoubtedly be considerate to American susceptibility. The unwillingness of the House of Commons to interfere unnecessarily with foreign affairs is a guarantee for its capacity of representing the feelings of the country on grave occasions.

THE PROGRESS OF THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.

WHITSUNTIDE has come, and the avowed intention of the Government to carry the Irish Church Bill through Committee by this date has been fulfilled. We have grown so accustomed to the inevitable majority of a hundred, which has damped every energy and repelled every effort of the Opposition, that it seems now only a matter of course that the Bill has made this rapid progress. But if we turn back, and remember how matters stood at the beginning of the Session, we seem to see the success of the Bill in another light. There were many rocks ahead, on any of which it might have grounded for awhile. Some sort of Irish Church Bill was of course inevitable. So much had been decided by the elections. But who could foresee that a Bill would be introduced which would run a perfectly smooth course? There were many quarters from which difficulties might have come The English clergy are, on the whole, decidedly hostile to the Bill; and although they were not able to carry the elections, yet, if the Government had seemed embarrassed and the House wavering the opposition of the clergy might have done serious harm. The refusal of Sir ROUNDELL PALMER to accept the Chancellorship under a Government pledged to such a Bill might have brought many persons round to think that perhaps there was a mistake, and that at any rate there was no occasion to be in too great a hurry. The fear of Popery which pervades the classes who draw their strong but simple notions of the Papacy from the Pilgrim's Progress might have shown itself in a movement against giving the compensation to Maynooth which justice imperatively demanded. The Opposition has the singular advantage of being under two leaders. Mr. HARDY comforts it by the strange spectacle of an able man who in these days not only honestly believes in the Conservative creed, but is capable of calculating how far it must take him if he really believes in it; while Mr. DISRAELI is sufficiently aloof from both parties to take advantage of the enthusiasm of his friends and the blunders of his adversaries. How has it happened, then, that a string of amendments proposed by Mr. DISRAELI have been so utterly wiped out that no one can remember even what they were; that the furious enemies of Maynooth have desisted from their endeavours to prevent it from receiving compensation on the avowed ground that they find it utterly hopeless to go on; that there has not been the faintest whispering of doubt about the Bill in any Liberal constituency, and that the few Liberals who have occasionally differed from Mr. GLADSTONE in the House have done so with profuse apologies, and with affectionate hopes that he will look kindly on a little independence? All this is very remarkable, and strong causes must have been at work to produce it; for there has been no excitement, no burst of popular passion, such as carried Lord GREY'S Reform Bill. The Irish Church Bill has rolled on smoothly and swiftly, as if carried by its own weight and roundness to its aim.

The Bill has been pronounced on both sides of the House to be revolutionary, and it is certainly a great revolution that we should dissolve, in Ireland, that famous alliance of Church and State which was once thought to be the keystone of the British Empire. That the keystone should have been knocked away so quickly and quietly in three months is a surprising thing, and shows how powerful must be the new feelings that are operating on the English mind. For the most powerful of these feelings is one which is as yet vague and indefinite, which points towards a grand but unknown future, the positive side of which is very faintly sketched as yet, but the negative side of which appears in the conviction that differences in religion do not present a sufficient basis for the arrangements and constitution of societies and nations. The mere ties of self-interest are confessedly inadequate for the same purpose. No one now dreams of talking the language of pure arrogance and selfishness in politics. Europe—and we may limit ourselves to Europe, for the irritation produced by war and taxes has removed America for a time out of the sphere of cosmopolitan politics—is seeking some other basis than that of national antipathies and religious differences. The community of material interests is undoubtedly the most material agent of change, but no one seems to be satisfied with the mere increase of wealth. Something more is wanted, and this something more is found by one half of Europe in a sentimental direction—in the eulogies of brotherhood, in the pursuit of an ideal democracy, in the recasting of the whole relations of capital and labour; and by the other half of Europe in a practical direction, in the passionate desire to be just. England naturally drifts in the latter direction; she is naturally and properly afraid of great social changes, while her growing experience in the working of a most diversified government has impelled her to serious reflection on the principles by which vast and varied masses of men can be kept under the same sway. Amid the uncertainties of all things, and with a future lying before European society the form of which we cannot apprehend, but which we are certain must be very unlike our present, we can at least be rigidly and honourably just. This is the feeling that moves England at present, and it is the force of this feeling that has pushed the Irish Church Bill through the Commons before Whitsuntide. There is also always a poetry coupled with justice, and a genial enthusiasm attends a newborn desire to do right, and a strong vein of sentiment has run through the recent action of England towards Ireland. As Mr. BRIGHT truly says, the present Parliament is thoroughly well disposed on all Irish questions, and wishes that what is right should be done, not only kindly and generously, but speedily. Nor has the reception of the Bill in Ireland been among the least efficacious of the causes that have pushed it on. By the Irish Protestants it has been received with a fury which was in itself quite pardonable, but which became contemptible when it betrayed laymen into talk about Repeal which in the mouths of Protestant landlords is nonsensical, and betrayed bishops into bursts of coarse and intemperate language about garotters and BILLY GLADSTONE. By the mass of the Irish people the Bill has been received with gentle patronage and lukewarm approbation, as a mild instalment of what they deserve and hope to get. Far from frightening or irritating England, the attitude of the Irish has only made England more anxious to get the Irish Church Bill passed. We know perfectly well that the Irish ask many things which it is impossible to give them, which justice itself forbids that we should let them have. But we cannot discuss these darker and more doubtful questions with any inward comfort or satisfaction so long as such a manifestly unjust thing as the Irish Established Church is suffered to remain. Very difficult questions will arise as to what is just when we come to discuss Irish land and Irish education, and England naturally wishes to gain freedom for action on these points by having got the Irish Church out of the way.

This has been the base of Mr. GLADSTONE'S majorities, for the constituencies have been quite firm, and have been pleased to see their representatives take part in so effective a demonstration of political power. But there has been more than this. There has been an anxious wish on the part of the representatives themselves not to be left out of these majorities. The degree to which this obedience of the whole Liberal party in the Commons to its chief has been carried is astonishing. That they have voted like a machine for the Bill, and every clause of it, is only a portion of what they have done. They have actually held their tongues when bidden. They have not ventured to interrupt the progress of the measure by offering their useless opinions and ideas. Sometimes some very few of them have for a moment walked in the paths of the Opposition, but they have only done so after obtaining a sort of ticket of leave from Mr. GLADSTONE, and they have reported themselves to Mr. GLYN immediately after their little escapade. This is very unlike the days of Palmerstonian Parliaments. It is unquestionably the Reform Bill that has done this. Whatever may have been the good or the harm of the Bill, the belief that it would at least strengthen the Executive, and make government a little more possible, has been justified. Members are much more bound up with their constituencies than they were. It is difficult to get, and very difficult to keep, a seat; and the man who happens to be sitting has to think very carefully what his local friends will say of him. The Liberal constituencies do not like being left out in the cold, with their member voting and speaking and caballing and intriguing according to his own personal whims and fancies and interests. They want to see the Liberal party triumph, and they want their man to contribute to this triumph. They have a perfect horror of Caves, which, they conceive, owe their origin to the piques and passions of individuals, and to an inherent contempt felt by London gentlemen for humble country electors. Undoubtedly this increase of political power has been purchased at the cost of some degree of honourable independence on the part of the members. This is an evil, but the evil of trying to govern a great country through an assembly of six hundred people, each thinking and talking and acting in his own way, is greater. The want of all motive force in the unreformed Parliaments was fast bringing Parliamentary government into contempt. Everything attempted was laid aside, and put off to another Session. Now the Irish Church Bill has been got through before Whitsuntide, and if the remedy applied to produce such a change has been strong it has been very successful. And perhaps, of all the parts of the Reform Bill which have wrought this change, the disfranchising clauses have been the most operative. There were far too many seats which nominal Liberals could command, and which permitted them to show, not any real and sensible independence, but a complete indifference to the interests of their party. Any fancied slight on the part of Mr. GLADSTONE, any hint that his vote was counted on by the Ministry, was sufficient to send one of these very free and independent Liberals into the wrong lobby. It is a very good thing that this has come to an end. Session after Session spent in abortive attempts at legislation, under a succession of weak Governments, involve a most lamentable waste of time and strength. The present ardour of obsequiousness to the Government will probably soon pass away. There will be less certainty of opinion in the constituencies and in the House; but at any rate we may hope that we shall not have any Caves for some time to come, and that, if sections of the Liberal party differ from each other, they will do so on public grounds, with a real sympathy between members and electors, and not out of mere wantonness, or from a wish to take a petty vengeance or to gratify personal spite.

It is only fair, however, to add that very much of the success of the Bill is due to the Bill itself. It is perhaps the best-drawn Bill of modern times. Throughout its whole conception appears one leading principle clearly and consistently followed. Every detail has been most carefully considered with reference to this principle, and has been put in a shape admitting of scarcely any mistake. With all the good-will in the world, a majority, however overwhelming, could not have carried it through before Whitsuntide if conflicting principles had appeared in the composition of the Bill, or if the clauses had not been so shaped as to give practical effect to the wishes of the Ministry. Much of the credit of this skilful preparation of the measure is said to be due to the Irish ATTORNEY-GENERAL; and, if so, members have to thank him for letting them take their holidays with so much solid work already accomplished. It must be remembered that there were two divergent theories as to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, and it needed much statesmanlike capacity in those members of the Cabinet who framed the measure to choose one of these two principles and to adhere to it resolutely, more especially as the leaders of the party, Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT, were evidently not alive last year to the divergence of these theories, and to the necessity of adopting one or the other. Both theories took for granted that the Irish Church was, as it were, tainted by its political connexion with the State, and needed a wholesale purifying. But how was this purification to be made? The one theory was to the effect that some startling and striking fine or penalty would suffice—something that would show conclusively that England had done with Protestant ascendency; the other theory was to the effect that this would not suffice, that the whole property of the Irish Church was irremediably mixed up with this ascendency, and that nothing short of utter confiscation would serve to remove the injustice of having used the powers of conquest in aid of an alien religion. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER was the advocate of the first theory when he gave up office, not that he might protect the Irish Church from disestablishment and disendowment, but that he might ask why, if the Irish Church were subjected to a severe penalty by a partial confiscation, it might not be suffered to retain enough property to make it simply effective as a religious body. Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT were under the influence of this theory when last year they talked of dealing very generously with the Irish Church, and assumed that the glebes and glebe-houses would naturally remain with the disestablished Church. This theory was pushed to an absurdity by Mr. DISRAELI, the tenor of whose amendments was that all the property of the Church should be taken away from it, provided that all, and a little more than all, were given back to it. It was because this theory was floating in their minds that unreasoning people thought that the compensation to Maynooth was taken out of the funds of the Irish Church, as it would have been if this compensation had been in the nature of a fine levied on the Church, the remission of which would have secured it so much more money. What the Government deserve praise for is that, having made up their minds to the opposite theory that the work of justice could only be accomplished, and that the persuasion of justice having been done could only be inspired, by utter confiscation, they adopted this principle with entire frankness and consistency, and shaped every detail of the Bill so as to be in harmony with it. This enabled them to say of almost every amendment that it was against the principle of the Bill, so that on seemingly minute clauses they were really taking renewed divisions on the Second Reading. From the day when Mr. GLADSTONE made his speech explaining what the Government measure was to be, it became evident that the parts of the Bill would so fit into each other that it would be exceedingly difficult to take some of those parts and to reject the rest. This has gone far to secure the rapid passage of the Bill through the Commons, and it can scarcely fail to operate in the Lords. The Lords may reject the Bill altogether, which is in the last degree unlikely; but if they once accept it, they will find it very difficult to alter it much, unless they attempt to recast the whole basis on which it is framed, which would be equivalent to rejecting it, and would entail the same political consequences.

THE EMPEROR AT CHARTRES.

IF history never repeats itself, the Emperor of the FRENCH is evidently not disposed to submit to a similar restriction. His speech at Chartres on Sunday was a virtual announcement that his reliance on the methods of government which he has hitherto found to answer is still unshaken. The world has changed a good deal since 1848, but the Napoleonic policy remains just what it was. Twenty years ago he made his "first appeal to the spirit of conciliation," and called upon "all good citizens to sacrifice for the public good their regrets "and feelings of rancour"; and now, "after seventeen years "of peaceful prosperity," he speaks "in the same language, "but with greater authority and confidence." In this one sentence we have the essence of the Imperialist theory of French history. The pre-Napoleonic ages are but a storehouse of "regrets and feelings of rancour." In themselves these may be pardonable, or even praiseworthy, but a good citizen will be careful to give them no practical application. He may have his sentimental yearnings or dislikes, but his attitude towards the dethroned dynasties and the fallen institutions of his own country will be as purely intellectual as his admiration for the Athens of PERICLES or the Rome of CÆSAR. They belong to a state of things that has passed away for ever, and to recognise this truth is the first duty of a Frenchman who claims to understand his era. In so far as he does not recognise it, he subordinates the welfare of his country to his own passions. But the EMPEROR thinks too well of his subjects to have any fear of such a catastrophe. He counts upon the citizens of Chartres because they "are part of those eight millions of Frenchmen who have "thrice accorded" him their suffrage; and in the fact that these eight millions have successively made him President, President for life, and Emperor, he sees an indisputable proof of their patriotism, and, by consequence, an indisputable guarantee "for order, progress, and liberty." It is this survey of the past that encourages him to invite honest men of every party "to second the regular advance of the Government on "the path of liberal progress, and to oppose insuperable resist- "ance to those subversive passions which appear to revive only "to threaten the unshaken fabric of universal suffrage." This is the "mission of civilization" which NAPOLEON III. has to accomplish, and it is the glory of the French nation that it has been called to co-operate with him in the great work. In a few days "the people will meet in their Electoral Comitia," and will choose the instruments by which this co-operation is to be effected. The EMPEROR's confidence in France is unbounded; the deputies will be worthy of their trust.

It may be questioned whether this consistency of attitude adds any strength to the EMPEROR's position. In the outset there was a real meaning in this sort of language. As it became increasingly evident that the Imperial Government had an element of permanence which had for some time been absent from French institutions, moderate adherents of former systems might by degrees have come to doubt whether to give it a modified support was not the best course for Liberal Frenchmen to pursue. The position of his family, as well as his own personal antecedents, gave NAPOLEON III. considerable and various claims on more than one among French political parties. As the heir of the great Emperor he satisfied that military feeling which had been subjected to unnatural repression during the reign of LOUIS PHILIPPE. As the defender of universal suffrage he represented the initial idea of Continental democracy. As the unshrinking maintainer of public order he soothed that widely diffused dread of revolution which the events of June, 1848, had roused into new life. Prudent men might have been brought by degrees to include all these facts in their calculations, and to balance one of them against another. The Republic had been tried and had proved a failure, and an ardent Republican would probably see but little to choose between an elected President of the type of General CAVAIGNAC and an Emperor such as NAPOLEON III. Why should he not support a Government which accepted one at least of his favourite principles in preference to a Government which, if it called itself by the right name, would probably have little claim to the right nature? The Parliamentary institutions which flourished under the Monarchy of July might be looked back to with regretful admiration by the Orleanists, but experience had shown that no executive which did not rest on a wider basis of popular support could have any chance of maintaining itself against the combined hostility of Bonapartists, Legitimists, and Democrats. To no class of Frenchmen other than its professed adherents was the Empire anything more than the least disliked of two alternatives; but an institution which occupied this position in the midst of a divided nation might fairly hope to play off one section against another, and to live, so to speak, on the second votes of all.

It cannot be said, however, that NAPOLEON III. has pursued this end with much success. There has been, especially of late years, a want of elasticity in his policy which has been very fatal to the assumption of the necessary variety of characters. He has soothed the fears of the middle classes, but he has done nothing to conciliate their Parliamentary instincts, and he has pressed heavily on their pockets. He has relied on his relationship to NAPOLEON I. to secure the devotion of the peasantry, but he has forgotten that, though in rural districts traditions linger long, there has been time enough for the NAPOLEON worship which was so prevalent under the Restoration to give way to newer faiths. He has been forced to alienate the democratic populations of the great towns by his Roman policy and his calculated deference to the clergy, and he has in turn irritated the Catholic instincts of the country by that desire not to break hopelessly with the democrats which has prevented him from giving the POPE the thoroughgoing support which will alone satisfy Ultramontane demands. When, therefore, he now appeals to honest men of every party, he finds no believers in that "regular ad- "vance in the path of Liberal progress" which he claims on behalf of his Government. That Frenchmen should credit him with having gone far enough in any one direction was not to be expected; but they might, if his professions had been more sincere, and his practice more consonant with them, have admitted that he had done as much in this way as the circumstances of France would permit. The Republican would have recognised as large an infusion of his favourite doctrines as is compatible with monarchical institutions. The Orleanist would have seen as complete a development of Parliamentary government as can be combined with that executive vigour which a French public requires. As it is, the EMPEROR has contrived, with remarkable success, to alienate all these phases of political opinion at one and the same time. His Government has been at once strong and timid. It has put down every enemy, but it has never succeeded in allaying its own fears of them. Even where there has been some "advance on the path of Liberal progress," it has been made in spite of those who now point to what has been done as though it constituted some claim in them to the gratitude of Frenchmen. The policy of the Empire has been ingeniously adapted to multiply enemies and aggravate defeats. It allows of no open questions, it recognises no support except that of its own creatures, it treats every victory of the Opposition as the first step towards a revolution. Its description of the conduct of its adversaries has as little weight in the country as the account it gives of itself. Frenchmen must by this time have pretty well learned to measure the strong language which the Government applies to the Opposition. To vote against an official candidate is a subversive passion; to remonstrate against swamping a town constituency with a torrent of rural voters, or a whole regiment of soldiers who have been made civilians for the occasion, is to threaten the unshaken fabric of universal suffrage. There can be few greater mistakes for a Government than to exaggerate the hostility against which it has to contend. Men easily become habituated to the commission of offences which bring with them neither remorse nor punishment, and the politician who hears at every election that he is the slave of subversive passions and the enemy of universal suffrage, grows accustomed by degrees to the position, and ends perhaps by sympathizing with the treason which he has talked all his life without knowing it.

That the strong reassertion of the principle of personal government which the EMPEROR has thought fit to make is merely the prelude to some further modification of it, is by no means impossible. Looking back over the "seventeen years "of peaceful prosperity" which have elapsed since the coup d'état, it cannot be denied that France has regained to an appreciable extent the liberties of which she was then deprived. But it has been the fancy of the EMPEROR that every advance in this direction shall be traceable to the sole action of his personal will, and shall be given just at the time when the Opposition has lost all expectation of obtaining it by any efforts of its own. Perhaps the concession of a responsible Ministry is intended to follow upon a Government victory at the elections, and has only been delayed lest it should seem that the EMPEROR relies for his triumph on some other agency than the magic of his name and the majesty of his character.

THE MAYOR OF CORK.

THE unexpected resignation of the Mayor of CORK probably denotes a lingering sense of decency on his own part, or on that of his local advisers. It is surprising that he should have relieved Parliament from the performance of a thoroughly disagreeable duty. Notwithstanding Mr. DISRAELI's ill-timed criticism, there was but one opinion as to the necessity of silencing official sedition; yet it was felt that the machinery of punishment was wholly disproportioned to the character o the offender. A Bill of Pains and Penalties is an extrem remedy for misconduct which happens to lie beyond the reach of law; and although the proceedings at Cork satisfied the con ditions of penal legislation, it appeared probable that a vulga demagogue would be gratified by an opportunity of making himself additionally notorious. The Town Council and the mob of Cork have expressed their approval of the scandalous language of the Mayor, which had the questionable merit of being perfectly clear and intelligible; but a disavowal is equivalent to a retractation, and, notwithstanding the sympathy of his fellow-townsmen, Mr. O'SULLIVAN has at last thought fit to disclaim the only possible meaning of his words. It is possible that he may be sincere in the paradoxical assertion that he did not intend to praise O'FARRELL for attempting to murder the Duke of EDINBURGH. Knowing nothing of the assassin except that he had committed the crime, Mr. O'SULLIVAN expressed admiration for his character and conduct; nor can it be doubted that at the moment he remembered that another member of the Royal Family was travelling in Ireland; yet it is more likely that he was influenced by a morbid craving for applause than that he wantonly desired to encourage assassination. When self-respect has been destroyed by habits of seditious exaggeration, a political brawler loses all sense of responsibility for his words. Even now the man is apparently not ashamed of having described the Clerkenwell explosion and the attack on the Duke of EDINBURGH as noble and patriotic acts. A casuist might suspend his judgment on the question whether mischievous nonsense may not indicate as deep moral degradation as deliberate incitements to crime. The Cork rabble probably assume that Mr. O'SULLIVAN was guilty only of incontinence of speech, although he would not have forfeited their confidence if he had been in earnest in his sanction of murder. The delinquent himself is perhaps sufficiently educated to understand the difference, since it has been explained to him in the clearest terms, and it may be presumed that when he next celebrates the release of disaffected convicts, he will confine himself to political sedition instead of digressing into eulogies of ordinary crime. One of his friends in the House of Commons paid him a truly Irish compliment in stating that, from his knowledge of Mr. O'SULLIVAN's character, anything he said that he would do might be relied on. The best apology for the speech at the convict festival is that Mr. O'SULLIVAN may be relied on not to do whatever he recommends as laudable or expedient. Mr. MAGUIRE showed a keener perception of the true line of defence when he suggested, on the first discussion of the question, the amiable explanation that the Mayor had probably been drunk.

Mr. GLADSTONE was only too glad to avoid the necessity of proceeding with a measure which would have been at the same time anomalous and unpopular. His predecessors, soon after the first Reform Bill, found the inconvenience of attempting to combine conciliation with repression. All the advantages which might have been expected by Lord GREY and Mr. STANLEY to arise from the suppression of several Irish bishoprics, and from the prospect of tithe commutation, were for the time suspended by the prosecution of O'CONNELL. The Mayor of CORK is an agitator of a humbler order; but if his cause had been adopted by the extreme Irish Liberals, the Government might have been involved in a troublesome conflict with its most zealous supporters. In accepting Mr. MAGUIRE's overture, the PRIME MINISTER perhaps disclosed with too little reserve his natural satisfaction in the surrender of his humble antagonist. It is not desirable to encourage future offenders by confessing the annoyance which they have the power, with little inconvenience to themselves, of inflicting on their betters. The Government would only perform its duty by introducing, after due consideration, a Bill which might prevent the recurrence of similar scandals. It must be remembered that Mr. O'SULLIVAN's outrageous language, and his culpable presidency at a Fenian celebration, were not the only instances of misconduct in his official capacity. The magistrates of Cork unanimously requested that he might be dismissed from a post in which he habitually insulted his colleagues and impeded the administration of justice. His repeated denunciations of the police in a city which has lately been the scene of frequent disorders were directly calculated to encourage the populace to breaches of the peace. On the morning after the Fenian supper the Mayor visited the prison before the arrival of the other magistrates, for the purpose of discharging the persons who had been locked up for the comparatively venial offence which Mr. MAGUIRE, in his friendly zeal, afterwards imputed to Mr. O'SULLIVAN himself. There ought to be some simpler mode of dealing with a municipal functionary who uses his legal powers for the promotion of disorder. Mr. O'REILLY suggested that the Crown should be empowered to dismiss a Mayor on the Address of both Houses of Parliament; but it seems inexpedient to place an agitator of the rank of O'SULLIVAN on the same footing with a misdemeanant Judge. A sufficient remedy for the evil would be provided if the Lord-Lieutenant had the power of depriving a Mayor, at his discretion, of magisterial functions. It is not a little absurd that a person who had already been removed from the Commission of the Peace should be restored to the bench of magistrates by popular election. In ordinary cases it is unnecessary to curtail the ancient municipal privilege, and happily, even in Ireland, the O'SULLIVAN case is one of the first impression. Among the numerous eccentricities of the English Constitution, few are more remarkable than the absence of all prevention against the abuse of lawful powers to the detriment of the State. No other country guards so carefully against excesses of authority affecting private rights, but the respect of public functionaries for law and order is tacitly taken for granted. The assumption has proved tolerably correct in Great Britain, and Irishmen will only learn to appreciate the responsibilities of freedom by enjoying its benefits.

The House of Commons, in its unwilling preparation for an encounter with an ignoble adversary, rediscovered with a kind of surprise that its omnipotence is limited by incapacity to administer an oath. The ordinary and formal power which is entrusted to magistrates, to private arbitrators, to the House of Lords, and even to Select Committees of the House of Commons, is by ancient custom withheld from the sovereign Assembly of the realm. The disability could be removed at pleasure if it involved any practical inconvenience, but a constitutional anomaly is not to be lightly thrown away. A few years ago the power to examine witnesses on oath was conferred on Select Committees of the Commons, under an impression that evidence had sometimes been given with undue levity or indifference to facts. It is not understood that scientific witnesses have since unlearned their tendency to speak as advocates; nor, indeed, do they belong to a class which would draw any distinction between sworn and unsworn statements. The examinations which are on rare occasions conducted at the bar of the House of Commons are confined to facts, instead of extending to matters of opinion, and the special jurisdiction of the House would perhaps be as efficacious as the penalties of perjury. The practical argument against a change is that an ancient defect assumes the dignity of a privilege. A more valuable security for the exercise of the powers of the House in defence of law and order is to be found in the existence of a Liberal Government. The instincts of a leader of Opposition which betrayed Mr. DISRAELI into a casual blunder would not improbably have induced Mr. GLADSTONE, if he had occupied the same position, to offer strenuous resistance to a penal measure. It seems that there was no precedent for Bill founded on seditious words, and there are plausible objections to all exceptional legislation. It would have been easy to hint that patriotic Irishmen were driven to despair by the policy of a Conservative Government; and Mr. BRIGHT might have added that all acts of severity must henceforth be attended by some equivalent compensation. Mr. DISRAELI was only deterred from adopting the same line of argument by the murmurs of his followers, whose real feelings were, as usual, more accurately expounded by Mr. HARDY. Perhaps even the present Government could not have secured the support of Irish members but for the pledges which they have given by the Bill for destroying the Established Church. A message of peace to Ireland which is not rejected with noisy indignation has accomplished a part of its purpose. When the Mayor of CORK thought fit to profess confidence in Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT, he supplied the Opposition with a weapon against the Government; but it is something to have imposed on blatant demagogues the necessity of acknowledging that there are English statesmen entitled to the confidence of Ireland. Mr. GLADSTONE is not called upon to defend himself against the charge of sympathizing with Mr. O'SULLIVAN in his sentimental enthusiasm for incendiaries and assassins. The power of commonplace is not to be despised, especially in a rhetorical country. Multitudes who believe that they are oppressed because they have always been told so, may perhaps gradually accept the same authority for the contrary proposition. Treasonable declaimers will learn from the capitulation of Mr. O'SULLIVAN that it is, even in Ireland, possible to go too far. Some of them, when they talk of revolution and civil war, mean no more than the Mayor of CORK meant when, after listening to discharged convicts blustering about sabres, he extolled the virtues of the powder-barrel and the treacherous revolver. As they are not heads of municipal bodies, ordinary agitators are not exposed to bills of pains and penalties; but they will feel that it is not safe to venture a collision with the law. The most lenient of Governments may on occasion be forced to vindicate justice, and it is sufficiently plain that Parliament will support any measures that may be required for the protection of public decency.

ENGLISH POLICY IN CENTRAL ASIA.

WHILE Lord LAWRENCE'S speech in the House of Lords has reconciled public opinion in England to the cautious policy which he has bequeathed to his successor, Indian politicians, feeling a stronger interest in the affairs of Central Asia, are less fully satisfied with the results of the Umballa interview. In activity of mind, in political daring, and in patriotic impatience, the civil and military servants of the Crown in India resemble rather the statesmanlike adventurers of the age of ELIZABETH than the peaceable men of business who administer the Government at home. Thoroughly devoted to the duty of maintaining the safety and greatness of the Empire, they habitually suspect that deliberate inactivity is but a cover for indolence or timidity; and at present they regard with unconcealed dislike the approach towards the Indian frontier of another European Power. The prolonged inaction of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE during the late civil war in Afghanistan was not generally popular with his subordinates, nor has his final determination to confine his interference to the payment of a subsidy met with general approval. It is indeed far from improbable that SHERE ALI may be unable or unwilling to perform the services for which he accepts a large retaining fee. An Afghan King is liable to assassination, to dethronement, and to the acceptance of larger offers from a hostile quarter; but the actual ruler of Cabul, having defeated his enemies without English aid, will probably maintain his position with the advantage of a grant which is perhaps equal to his entire army estimates. It is a strong recommendation of the system adopted by the Indian Government, that it exactly reverses the policy of thirty years ago, which had its origin, not in the Indian Council, but in the English Cabinet. A weak Governor-General was then induced, in opposition to his own calmer judgment, to set up a pretender against SHERE ALI'S father, who would gladly have broken off his intrigues with Russia if he had been assured of English support. The terrible disasters which followed might have been avoided by prudent conduct and by military vigilance; but the occupation of Afghanistan necessarily involved needless risks and burdens. If SHERE ALI'S adherence to the English alliance can be secured by a liberal payment, the outposts of India will be most cheaply defended by a native auxiliary force.

Two general officers, of long experience in the affairs of North-Western India, have lately published directly opposite opinions on the best mode of securing the frontier. Sir SYDNEY COTTON, in a short pamphlet, insists on the immediate necessity of an onward movement; while Sir VINCENT EYRE maintains, in a lecture delivered before the East India Association, the expediency of rendering the present frontier impregnable. It would be presumptuous in civilians to decide between two competent soldiers who respectively assert and deny the defensive merits of the line of the Indus; but, if the arguments were equally balanced, there would be a presumption in favour of the frontier which is already our own. According to Sir SYDNEY COTTON, the position of Peshawur is so bad in all respects that it will be necessary to recede from it or to advance. It seems that the valley of Koorum, on the other side of the Khyber Pass, might be recommended by military considerations; but Sir SYDNEY COTTON prefers the alternative of establishing an auxiliary force at Cabul, or of placing agents, also with troops at their disposal, at Candahar and Herat. By no other method, it is urged, can the legitimate succession be secured to the family of SHERE ALI; but it is not seriously pretended that hereditary legitimacy in Afghanistan greatly concerns the Indian Government. There is no reason to suppose that the AMEER himself would accept the position of a feudatory prince for the purpose of securing himself against domestic rivals. An English Envoy at Cabul would occupy the position of the unfortunate Sir WILLIAM MACNAGHTEN, although proper precautions might undoubtedly be taken against the recurrence of the former catastrophe. It is possible that Sir SYDNEY COTTON'S military judgment is sound, and he states the curious fact that the word Peshawur means "advanced post," not of the rulers of India, but of the Afghans and of other Northern invaders. It would, in Sir SYDNEY COTTON'S opinion, be convenient to have the mountain tribes in the rear instead of in the front, for the purpose both of promoting among them civilization and industry, and of preventing them from engaging in intrigues with Central Asia. It is not impossible that some other strategist would attach greater importance to the inconvenience which might arise from the interposition of turbulent tribes between an advanced force at Cabul and the open country of India. The difficulty of holding Afghanistan as a protected dependency may be appreciated without technical knowledge. Although the new Russian possessions appear, on an ordinary map, dangerously near to the extreme north of India, many miles and some formidable mountain ranges are still interposed between Samarcand and Peshawur. It is doubtful whether it is desirable to curtail a space which at present diminishes the probability of unfriendly collision. If a necessity should arise through the defection of SHERE ALI or of his successors, there would always be time for an army from India to anticipate the Russians at Cabul. The great risk of the expedition of 1838 consisted in the possible defection of RUNJEET SING, who then held the Punjab with a formidable army. If the Sikhs had broken off from the English alliance, either during Sir JOHN KEANE'S advance upon Cabul, or after the destruction of the army in 1841, the whole of the North-West would have been exposed to imminent danger. At present an advance in force from Peshawur would encounter no formidable resistance; and it would be better that English troops should be regarded as allies, and not as conquerors. The warlike inhabitants of Afghanistan would be more likely to resist a Russian attack on their own independence than to repel an invader who could offer them liberation from English dominion.

Sir SYDNEY COTTON directly contradicts Lord LAWRENCE'S statement that an Afghan invasion was averted, during the Mutiny, by the payment of a stipend to DOST MAHOMMED. On the contrary, he asserts that it was to the resolute attitude of the officers in command at Peshawur that the safety of India was due. "The paltry expedient of bribing an avaricious Afghan" might, it is said, have secured the personal neutrality of the King; but "thirty thousand Afghans had shod their horses "ready to invade our territory, the very last act always of "such troops previous to a hostile movement." Sir SYDNEY COTTON adds that Sir JOHN LAWRENCE was prepared, at the beginning of the Mutiny, to surrender the valley and district of Peshawur to the Afghans, as the price of peace. There can at present be no question of a surrender of territory, and the paltry expedient of bribing an avaricious Afghan may be justified by success. Bribes are, in truth, effective in proportion to the avarice or to the wants of the recipients; and, in the case of the Afghan Ameer, avarice is nearly related to ambition. Sir SYDNEY COTTON says that the rebel soldiers who had been fighting against SHERE ALI flocked to his standard when they heard of the arrival of the English rupees. The attainment of the primary object of the subsidy seems not to form a conclusive argument against Lord LAWRENCE'S policy. A veteran officer, fully informed of the subject which he discusses, may be excused for attributing the dissent or coldness of home politicians to imperfect knowledge; but it is only possible for ordinary Englishmen to decide on a conflict of evidence, and on general principles; and there are respectable authorities on the side of peace, or of passive expectation.

Sir VINCENT EYRE, who was in his youth one of the prisoners of Cabul, recommends careful attention to the assailable points of the river Indus, and to the occupiers of the mountain passes immediately beyond, who are to be propitiated by political and pecuniary arrangements, or, in other words, by bribes bestowed on avaricious chiefs. He regards the Russian conquests in Central Asia not without complacency, and he holds that for some generations the military force of Russia in those regions will be utterly insufficient for purposes of invasion. It might be added that a Russian attack on India would in all probability be attempted by a road which was practically open long before the conquest of Turkestan. The weak point of Afghanistan is Herat, which in the hands of a Persian garrison would become a Russian outpost. The passes in the North, though they were formerly traversed by half-civilized conquerors, afford little facility for the passage of the stores and artillery of a modern army. On the whole, it seems that, until circumstances change, there is a preponderance of argument against an aggressive and heroic policy. If the AMEER desires the continuance of the subsidy, he will abstain from conduct which would produce an immediate forfeiture. Any intimation of a purpose of sacrificing a royal revenue would almost prove that he was in expectation of receiving an equivalent from Russia; nor could it be tolerated that an avaricious Afghan should accept a bribe from any hostile quarter. Except as incident to an internal rebellion, an invasion of India would have no chance of success. The reduction of Afghanistan to the state of a protected kingdom would be a costly precaution against a remote and manageable danger.

LORD RUSSELL evidently holds that his presence is an indispensable condition of anything that is worth calling a discussion. The Irish Land Question, and Mr. BRIGHT's position in relation to it, have been before the House of Lords as least three times this Session. On each occasion the programme has been the same. The Opposition has in effect said to the Government, Pray tell us your plans for next Session, that we may damage them as much as possible beforehand. As the Government has three times declined to comply with this agreeable invitation, it might have been thought that the little joke was pretty well played out. Even the unjust judge would probably have been firm against the importunate widow if he had known that she was going to use his decision against him the next moment. There is a sort of friend, however, who is quite ready to rush in where even an Opposition has grown tired of treading, and of this stamp is Lord RUSSELL. He ignores all that has been said on the subject already, since, as he was absent, nothing can have been said to the purpose. He is grieved, too, at the pettiness which has characterized the Liberal party since he retired from its leadership. He feels that, if he had only been in office, the legislation of the Session would have been thorough and comprehensive. Lord RUSSELL has never succumbed to the weakness of doing one thing at a time. He has often done nothing at all for several Sessions together, but his inaction has always been atoned for by his trying everything at once later on. To this cause perhaps may be attributed the fact that the record of his official career will be found rather in HANSARD than in the Statute-book. He feels that the Irish Church Bill would have furnished very insufficient employment for his restless energy if he had been in Mr. GLADSTONE's place. He would have had an Irish policy ready which should have embraced the land question as well, and the two Bills might have proceeded pari passu through both Houses. As Lord RUSSELL's proposals were usually wont to retire in July to the pigeonholes whence they had emerged in February, he would have been neither surprised nor annoyed if this fate had awaited one or both measures. Mr. GLADSTONE has not attained to this state of philosophical indifference, and consequently his arrangements for the Session have been dwarfed by the contemptible desire to pass something. What is worse, he has perhaps not yet made up his mind what he shall propose as to the Land question. A statesman who voluntarily remains in this state of uncertainty when he has Lord RUSSELL to apply to for suggestions must, it is to be feared, be the victim of a miserable vanity. He prefers to keep at a distance from the great fountain of political knowledge rather than own that another is wiser than himself. On this occasion he is doubly guilty. Political wisdom has still two tabernacles on earth, and they who will not seek her in Lord RUSSELL's conversation may do so in the reports of Sir GEORGE GREY's speeches. Two-and-twenty years ago the Irish land problem was stated and solved, and yet a Liberal Government can talk of wanting time to consider the subject. Let others prate of the Devon Commission, or pore over the reports of Parliamentary Committees. Sir GEORGE GREY set the question at rest in 1847, and Lord RUSSELL can hardly forgive Mr. GLADSTONE that the plan then indicated has not at once been made a Government proposal.

If, however, the Government, recognising its poverty of intellect and weakness of will, had declared that "while they "would take into consideration any steps which would secure "compensation to the tenants in Ireland, and at the same time "maintain the rights of property, it was not their intention "during the present Session to introduce a measure upon this "subject," Lord RUSSELL could have put up with the compromise. There is a great deal in this suggestion extremely appropriate to its author. It is exactly the form in which, supposing him to have wished to say he was going to do nothing, he would have liked to put the announcement. No wool will be ready this Session, but there will be as much cry as any one can desire. No plan will be adopted, but every sort of plan will be taken into consideration. Lord RUSSELL's theory of government is modelled on his recollections of the hustings. Commit yourself to nothing, but allow as many people as possible to think you have committed yourself to them. Considering that the Government will be forced to "take into con-"sideration" at least one "step" whenever Mr. BRIGHT chooses to lay it before them—at least we are not aware that to move the previous question is a permissible expedient at Cabinet Councils—we think they may be pardoned for not inviting any further suggestions, and the negative half of Lord RUSSELL's formula has rarely been out of their mouths since the Session began. Their candid critic goes on, however, to charge them with having adopted a third course. This was "to pro-"mote and to allow every kind of hope to be held out to the "people of Ireland, which would tend to shake that security "of property" which Sir GEORGE GREY said ought to be maintained. Lord RUSSELL seems to draw a distinction here which may escape a careless reader. The Government have not merely helped to shake security of property in the abstract; they have chosen for their attack a peculiarly sacred variety of it—that security of property which Sir GEORGE GREY said ought to be maintained! It is hard to conceive of hostility at once so malignant and so impotent—malignant because singling out something so unspeakably venerable, and impotent because that which Sir GEORGE GREY has declared must be maintained cannot possibly be subject to the influences of time and change. But those who are loth to give up the Government as hopeless may be cheered by finding that Lord RUSSELL was not very successful in bringing home the charge. The alleged holding out of every kind of hope to the people of Ireland that could shake the security of property as maintained by Sir GEORGE GREY, turned out to be only a poetical description of Mr. BRIGHT's plan for buying up the estates of absentee landlords with a view to selling them again to occupiers. Lord RUSSELL urged a good many pertinent objections to this scheme, but he wholly omitted to show how it shook the security of property. It seems a fatality about the Irish Land question which forces every member of the Opposition—for on Thursday night, at all events, Lord RUSSELL took brevet rank among them—to go off into generalities which only damage his own case. A proposal to buy land—at a price considerably above its estimated value, and only with the consent of the owners—and then to lend money to other people in order to enable them to buy it in turn is open to so much hostile criticism that it seems hardly necessary to mis-call it by a variety of epithets to which it has no just title. It may be as bad a scheme as Lord RUSSELL likes, but it contemplates no interference with the security of property, unless providing an absentee landlord with the opportunity of selling his estate whenever he likes, at a better price than he could get in the open market, can be fairly described by that name. All the theories which have been devised to establish a connexion between Mr. BRIGHT's plan and the agrarian murders now so frequent in certain parts of Ireland, labour under one common fault. They assume that the Irish peasant is absolutely destitute of sense or shrewdness. He is supposed to know that he has one or more friends in the Government, and thereupon to set about strengthening their hands by shooting the first landlord he meets. If this is a true version of the facts, idiot and Irishman must be simply convertible terms. Even if they can be credited with nothing better than the lowest form of cunning, they would at least be sharp enough to see that this is a time for putting on the meekest and most innocent aspect possible. Despair, rage, a desire to make themselves feared—these, and similar motives, will often enough drive men into crime; but the Conservative theory of agrarian outrages asks us to believe that, just when the tenantry are most sanguine of getting all they want without any further trouble, they murder a dozen landlords in pure lightness of heart. The true method to pursue in such an inquiry as this is to find out who gains by these apparently purposeless demonstrations. If Lord RUSSELL or Lord DERBY can produce an Irishman who genuinely believes that next year's Land Bill will be more favourable to the tenant because a landlord a week has been shot between now and then, they will have furnished the student of human nature with a subject worthy to be preserved in spirits.

CANADA.

THE Dominion authorities are beginning to feel the stimulus and the responsibilities of national existence. After some not insignificant difficulties, they are rapidly triumphing over domestic opposition and seeing their boundaries enlarge and their power consolidate; and at the same time they are growing sensible to the dignity of their position, and meeting the insolence of American ambition in a tone of calm but resolute rebuke.

At the commencement of the second year of the Dominion two serious obstacles to the complete establishment of the Union remained to be surmounted. The Hudson's Bay Company still survived to limit expansion to the West, while the animosity of Nova Scotia, and the reluctance of Newfoundland to make common cause with the other provinces, threatened to narrow and impair the authority of the Dominion over the small but important districts which bound it on the Atlantic coast. A few months have entirely dissipated these formidable clouds. After years of clever negotiation the Fur-trading Company has accepted reasonable terms for the cession of its vast though questionable rights, and for a moderate subsidy, supplemented by some prospective advantages, has consented to make over its huge domains to the Dominion Government. That the terms are fair to the Company follows almost as a matter of course from the fact of their acceptance; for the enormous power of resistance of a Corporation some centuries old, based on a charter which purported to give them the bulk of the North-American territory of the English Crown, would never have yielded to anything less than a liberal offer. If the indications of the market are to be trusted, it is equally clear that the Company has not secured much more than it was entitled to, and that the terms on which Canada has acquired the Red River Settlement and the outlying wilderness around it are not at all unfair to the colonists. The Hudson's Bay shares have not doubled in value, like those of the Telegraph Companies, in consequence of their Government purchase, and they are quoted now as nearly as may be at the price which they commanded when the territorial rights of the Company remained intact. Both parties may be congratulated on a satisfactory bargain, and we are glad to find that the delegates who conducted the treaty on behalf of Canada have been received on their return with strong demonstrations of satisfaction. There can be no doubt that the Ottawa Parliament will ratify the purchase, and that in a short time the whole of the Western Territory will form part of the United Dominion, and will be bound to it by the construction of the roads and telegraphs the want of which was rapidly drawing the Red River Settlement towards the United States, with which practicable communications have been long since established.

On the East the prospects of the Union have improved with unexpected rapidity. By a large majority in its Legislature, backed, according to the most trustworthy accounts, by a still more decided majority in the country, Newfoundland has declared her desire to be admitted as a member of the Confederation. With more prudence than was exhibited by the Parliament of Nova Scotia, it has been resolved not to take any definite step until the question has been submitted to the constituencies, but no doubts are entertained of the result, and it is not unlikely that from every hustings a unanimous call for Union will be heard at the ensuing general election. The change in the feeling of Nova Scotia is even more striking. The exertions of one of the ablest of modern demagogues induced the people of this sturdy little colony to resent the high-handed action of their representatives, and to return a Parliament unanimous in demanding a repeal of the Act of Union. Mr. HOWE and his associates struggled hard to induce the Imperial Parliament to repeal an Act which, after it had once been passed, it was impossible for England to meddle with without the grossest breach of faith towards the other colonies which were parties to it. The sagacity of the leader of the movement was probably sufficient to enable him to foresee this result from the first; but, whether he did so or not, the fruitless efforts of a year or two of agitation taught him and others that the only practical use to be made of their influence with the Nova Scotians and their power of annoyance to the Confederacy was to secure more favourable financial conditions than had been conceded to Nova Scotia in the original bargain. With much judgment the Dominion Ministers determined to meet the repentant Repealers half way, and terms were arranged which enabled Mr. HOWE to boast that he had added a very appreciable percentage to the revenues of the Province. Mr. HOWE, with an equal regard for his own interest and the welfare of his country, immediately accepted office in the Dominion Government, and of course exposed himself to the not unreasonable taunts of his colleagues in the Repeal crusade, who, as subsequent revelations have proved, were equally ready to throw up a hopeless cause, and only differed from their chief in showing less dexterity in effecting the transformation at the judicious moment. Mr. HOWE's acceptance of office vacated his seat, and it rested with the constituency of the county of Hants to show whether the Nova Scotians were prepared to go round with their leader, or were determined still to cherish the delusive idea of Repeal. The result was very surprising. In the county which had been foremost in sustaining the Repeal cause, the traitor HOWE, as he has been, not without plausibility, styled by his former friends and present opponents, has been returned by a large majority, and the existing Repeal Ministry of Nova Scotia has tendered its resignation, and will probably soon be replaced by a more judicious body, prepared to make the best of their new Constitution. This feat of the Nova Scotian agitator has perhaps never been surpassed in its way, and we doubt if even O'CONNELL could have carried the county of Cork if he had come back to his constituency after accepting office under the "base, bloody, and brutal" Whigs, whom he had not reviled more heartily than Mr. HOWE abused his present colleagues, the creators of the Dominion Government. It is, fortunately, not necessary to sympathize with Mr. HOWE before congratulating Canada on the close of a conflict which has been healed by the hand which commenced it. Nor need we much condole with the Canadians on the still continued recalcitrance of the tiny little colony known as Prince Edward Island. The 100,000 inhabitants of this secluded spot are, it seems, bent upon keeping aloof from their brethren on the continent, and negotiating separate treaties of commerce with the United States. That the Colonial Minister should quietly put his veto upon this presumptuous attempt was a matter of course, and though the islanders will never be compelled to join the Union, it is probable that before many years have passed they will have increased by about 2 per cent. the population of the Dominion of Canada. Nothing will remain to carry the United Territory across the continent except the adhesion of Columbia. It is not material that this should be given before the communications by way of the Red River Settlement shall have become decently practicable; but it is plain enough that Columbia (in spite of some opposition from American immigrants) will soon be clamouring for absorption into the Dominion.

With its home prospects thus encouraging, and with a highly satisfactory financial position, it is natural that the Ottawa Legislature should feel called upon to assume a tone towards its arrogant neighbours befitting its increase of power and importance, and this feeling of nascent dignity could not have been more appropriately expressed than in the recent speech of Mr. GALT on the relations between the British Provinces and the States. The habit of truculent newspaper writers in New York and Washington, sometimes to threaten Canada with conquest and at others to wheedle her into annexation, culminated in the absurd and insulting proposition of Mr. CHANDLER, that England should be asked to cede her American territory in satisfaction of the huge bill which Mr. SUMNER has made out for Alabama damages. It was time that Canada should give her answer to the threats and invitations which were so freely addressed to her, and Mr. GALT, in his manly declaration of the resolution of Canada to maintain her independence of the States and her loyalty to Great Britain, and in his firm but temperate demand for reparation for Fenian outrages, has expressed the unanimous sentiment of his country. Whether General GRANT's Government will be disposed to concede as much to the legitimate claims of Canada as we have done in the cognate case of the Alabama is of secondary importance. The real significance of Mr. GALT's speech, and of its cordial reception, is to be found in the conclusive evidence which it affords of the unshaken allegiance of the North American colonists, which had been doubted by many in England, though only by those who were least acquainted with colonial feeling.

LORD TOWNSHEND ON THE PUBLIC SAFETY.

MOST people are acquainted with the works, and some are familiar with the life, of ALEXANDER CRUDEN, the compiler of the Concordance to the Bible. That excellent person got the credit of being thought, if not absolutely insane, yet rather crackbrained. But, as his biographer shrewdly observes, "the only circumstances by which he was convicted "of lunacy in the popular opinion were those which might "have in former ages convicted many persons of higher "distinction. These were extraordinary attempts to do "good in ways not generally adopted by mankind." Mr. CRUDEN styled himself "ALEXANDER the Corrector," and he acted as a vagabond and peripatetic censor morum. He went about the streets of London denouncing and redressing all abuses, and gave out that he had a special commission to reform the manners of his age, "confident that an unprotected individual might succeed, where laws and societies, "strengthened by every possible authority, have failed." Among other peculiarities which he had was that of taking his walks abroad armed with a large sponge, with which he effaced all chalkings and inscriptions on the walls offensive to good morals. This employment, his biographer observes, must have rendered his walks through the city very tedious. His work in life—and who shall say that it was not a most creditable one?—was to get all ranks to mend their ways, and the eighteenth-century ways of London were certainly capable of amendment. His contemporaries, and we may say the same of those who have looked at his biography, hardly knew what to make, still less what to say, of him. A fanatic in benevolence and reforms ought to be an object of universal respect and admiration; but somehow, though the world owns that such a man is not a useless, yet it cannot but feel that he is a ridiculous, being. It requires the genius of a CERVANTES to draw a knight-errant whom we must respect while we are asked to laugh at him; and in DON QUIXOTE, the most refined and elegant conception of fiction, the gentleman the Christian, the sage, and the moralist prevent us from despising the enthusiast. The Marquis TOWNSHEND is certainly neither a DON QUIXOTE nor an ALEXANDER the Corrector, but it is worth a moment's thought to consider why, in the popular estimation, he should be so thoroughly ridiculous, and why, with the very best intentions, he should do more harm than good to a respectable cause. To own the truth, there is hardly one of his proposed reforms, and scarcely an instance of his unfortunate personal interferences with the breaches of minor social morals, which may not be defended. The end he seeks is the end which others have sought. The only difference, Lord TOWNSHEND would say, between him and such as ourselves and some of our contemporaries is, that while we are writing and protesting and appealing, he is up and doing. While we complain of sturdy beggars, he stalks about London, collars them, and drags them to the police office. Whilst we write essays, plaintive, indignant, or elegant, as the case may be, about baby-farming, he avails himself of his position as a peer, and brings in a Bill to prevent this sort of infanticide. It cannot be denied that Lord TOWNSHEND has the best of the situation. We are always screaming and groaning about the abominations of Anatomical Museums, and the defects of the Metropolitan Police Act. It is something much more to the purpose when the noble Marquis tables his Bill for suppressing this particular nuisance, and for increasing the number of offences recognisable and punishable at the police courts. And yet unextinguishable laughter from the public, and a serene and stately contempt from the House of LORDS, is all that the great Corrector of the age gets for his pains in elaborating the eleven Bills which he has lately brought into Parliament. Even the roughs and gamins, the extirpation or confinement of whom is the noble lord's special vocation, seem to treat him with a superb indifference, and so we hear from the Record, and we have no reason to doubt the Record's familiarity with the literature of the slums only write street ballads about their tormentor, and sing to some of FALSTAFF's filthy tunes the chorus of "The Marquis of "TOWNSHEND won't let us alone"

Lord TOWNSHEND's ideal of legislation, we should think, ought to commend itself to Mr. CARLYLE. The Marquis is much of the hero and prophet, and has no notion of justice going about with eyes bandaged, and twiddling and dawdling with scales and balance, but would have her keep her eyes open, and pounce down on all offenders with sharp and summary vengeance. He can't understand the nonsense talked and practised about the liberty of the subject. His legislation is decisive, terse, and summary. Most of his proposed Acts consist but of a single clause; but, as the boys say, that is a rattler. Here is a specimen in the Reformatory Schools Amendment Bill, No. 1 of the Laws of the Eleven Tables which he proposes:—"Every girl under "the age of sixteen years who in any public place shall be "found soliciting prostitution shall be sent to a Reformatory." We leave his lordship and Sir WILLIAM BODKIN to settle the nicely nasty point whether soliciting prostitution must not imply some "overt act," and what that "overt act" is; but we cannot forget that the law already deals with this especial offence, and that Lord TOWNSHEND fails to tell us for how long a schooling he intends to saddle ratepayers with the expenses of the board and education of these interesting young ladies. The same consideration applies to his second measure for improving young scamps off the streets "Every child apparently "under fourteen years, selling any articles, playing music or "singing or accompanying any musician, and not being able "to produce a certificate of a twelve hours' a week attendance "at school, also any child offering goods for sale without a "licence, shall be sent to an industrial school or workhouse, "there to be maintained at the expense of the Guardians." The notion of licensed vendors of cigar-lights and halfpenny newspapers and certificated schoolboys and schoolgirls does not, to the good Marquis, suggest anything grotesque or unpractical. What he sees, and with a single eye, is the street Arab; and by offering them board, lodging, and education at the public cost by way of reward for making themselves a public nuisance, he perhaps thinks that he will discourage the supply of young blackguards. But Lord TOWNSHEND's self-imposed duties of Waywarden-in-general of London Streets do not end with their moral purification. With equal and impartial eye his exuberant and minute philanthropy surveys the physical and personal dangers we run in our daily walk. He exclaims with GAY:—

> Consider, reader, what fatigues I've known,
> The toils, the perils of this wintry town;
> What riots seen, what bustling crowds I bore,
> How oft I crossed where carts and coaches roar:
> Yet shall I bless my labours, if mankind
> Their future safety from my dangers find.

Lord TOWNSHEND's daily familiarity with the office of a voluntary policeman has given him the amplest familiarity with the dangers and distresses of our London Trivia. He has seen our horses lamed with the granite lumps dear to the St. James's Vestry, and he will make steam-rollers compulsory. He proposes to prohibit, under penalty of a forty-shillings fine, the throwing, laying, placing, or dropping any fruit peel, or other vegetable production, on any footway—a summary and extensive enactment, which would fine us for dropping not only orange-peel, but cigar-ends, and faded flowers, apple-pips, nutshells, and the date-stones which so offended the jin in the Arabian Nights. He has reckoned how many London Christians are annually murdered by waggoners and cab-drivers. He asks Parliament to restrict the pace of all vehicles to six miles an hour, and visits with condign and summary justice the omission of the mystic sign of tipping the whip to all following drivers; and in one variorum Bill he legislates against the exhibition of pictures of disease, anatomical museums, servant maids cleaning windows (herein following the late Sir CHARLES BURRELL), also against all and several the abominations of flower-pots in windows and of barrel-organ players, all street singers, all those ingenious artists who chalk pictures of mackerel and soup-plates on the pavement though had such a severe law been enacted in the thirteenth century it would have checked in the bud the natural genius of GIOTTO, and his pastoral drawings on the smooth rock - all unlicensed crossing-sweepers, all unlicensed stall-keepers, all unlicensed soup-kitchens, all persons keeping what Mr. MANTALINI calls a demmed unpleasant corpse in a living room for more than forty-eight hours, and all hackney coachmen who carry persons suffering from infectious diseases.

Yes, no doubt all these things are nuisances. But let us for moment speculate upon London swept and garnished and cleansed from all that offends eye, nose, and ear, from female perils of life and limb, with all our ways mended, and all our carriages creeping gaily along at six miles an hour. Happy AUGUSTA! law-defended town! Yes, very nice; but such is the perversity of human nature that the very prospect of being relieved from our ancient tale of wrongs and sufferings and grievances suggests that we should be very dull without them. First, we should have cut off for ever the perennial flow of rabble and grumble which inspires grievance-mongers to write to the Times. Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant. No more jolly, insolent choruses of the shameless impostors who brandish their carrots, and complain of no work to do. No more whining from the picturesque gentility of shabby mendicancy; no street Arabs; no flower-girls to ply those callings which occasionally distress even suburban rectors; no street cries, no street chaff; nothing left to provoke our subdued curses but the women's trains and the perambulators, which, with a strange obduracy to human suffering in the streets, the good Lord TOWNSHEND does not feel to be a grievance. Somehow we should miss with regret our inveterate sorrows; we should look back with something like fond regret to those jolly insolent ruffians and impostors who teased us so long. Facing such a prospect of unpicturesque and unexciting monotony, such a dull dead flat as the London drilled, starched, and ironed by the TOWNSHEND Acts would present, we begin to suspect that we should look back with ungrateful regret to the picturesque and stimulating nuisances which we had lost. A city without its public nuisances may be, and of course very right and proper; but a whole population with nothing of public wrong to grumble at would in self-defence turn its ill-temper inwards, and with everything serene, decent, and orderly in the streets we must, from the necessities of human nature, relieve ourselves by making our homes very unpleasant. The total extirpation of public and social wrongs would encourage the cultivation of private and domestic wrongs. Which reminds us that the Marquis does not confine his energies to public nuisances. His administration is strictly paternal and domestic, and ranges over life indoors as well as out of doors, and his officiousness is as active in the nursery and the schoolroom as in the streets. Not content with prohibiting the schoolmaster from using taws or cane, he would, under a five pounds penalty, make it unlawful "for any "person to inflict any corporal punishment on scholars for "inattention to, or inaccuracy in, their studies"; and under the same penalty he would prohibit "any person from strik-"ing any child or young person under the age of sixteen "years upon the head or face." Now as this admirable and amiable clause would punish with the aforesaid fine—or, in default of payment, with two months' imprisonment—every little JACKY who in the nursery smacks his sister's face, and would also stop all playground fights, as well as deprive parents of the duty of boxing a mischievous or saucy brat's ears, we can only say that we hope Lord TOWNSHEND has tried, or will try, this pretty system in his own family. Or rather, as we suspect, Lord TOWNSHEND wants to enforce upon us all that domestic education of which he is himself so fine a result. It is quite certain that, if boxing the ears and good sound corporal punishment had been practised in the TOWNSHEND family, we should not have had the present Marquis such as he is. A few good smacks on the mouth in youth would have made another man of him; as it is, we see that he does not prohibit boxing the ears in mature age. And the very significant reception which these eleven Bills are meeting in the House of Lords shows that the Peers are not yet sufficiently trained in gentle ways to see that to administer at least a moral slap on the face to one of their own body may not have its value in repressing the exuberant zeal of a legislator addicted to meddlesomeness, or what the Greek grammar used to call polypragmosynousness.

THE COUNCIL OF TRENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE VATICAN.

THE Council of Trent, while it effected some moral reforms, introduced, or rather stereotyped, a new era of Ultramontane exclusiveness in the Church. For the previous two centuries the cry for a searching reformation had waxed louder and louder, and especially since the manœuvring of the Roman Court had frustrated the endeavours of the Council of Basle to satisfy it. Germany had all along been foremost in urging the demand for a free representative Council. And when, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, an age of yet deeper profligacy was startled by the trumpet-tongued challenge of a professed heretic and schismatic, who united the call to holiness with scathing denunciations of what was at once the centre of corruption and the central See of Christendom, even Rome could no longer affect to ignore the crisis. But she still adhered to her traditional policy of evasion, and dallied till the remedy came too late. Between 1530 and 1540 a bonâ fide Synod, not dominated by Papal legates, and fairly representing all the national Churches of Europe, might have availed to stem the tide, and secure reformation without precipitating a schism. When at length, in 1545, Paul III. reluctantly assented to the assembling of a Council at Trent, it was transferred after a few months, on the idlest pretexts, to the Papal city of Bologna, and soon afterwards separated for sixteen years. When it reassembled at Trent, in 1562, Protestantism had already made its position, and received the allegiance of half Europe. The Council met, not to satisfy or even seriously to consider the complaints of the reforming party, but to draw the reins yet tighter on the necks of those who could still be coerced into submission. "The Germans," to use the words of the Allgemeine Zeitung, "might have applied to their own treatment what, on a later occasion, the French diplomatists said to the Dutch, Nous traiterons chez vous, sur vous et sans vous." It had been foreseen at Rome that the German bishops, as a body, would be unable to attend, and a Brief of Paul III. provided, in defiance of all former precedents, that their proctors should have no votes. At the earlier sessions of this Council, sitting in Germany and claiming to be Œcumenical, there was present not a single German bishop, and only one proctor, who had no vote; in the later sessions, one voting bishop and five proctors without votes. There was a small sprinkling of French and Spanish bishops, and two hundred Italian bishops, who of course were practically supreme. Moreover, votes were taken, not by nations, as at Constance, but individually; and it was ruled, again in defiance of precedent, that the Papal legates should have the exclusive right of deciding what questions should be brought forward. Under these circumstances we cannot wonder at what ensued. The German ambassadors of Ferdinand had demanded reform in the Curia, the restoration of the chalice, the marriage of priests, the revision of the breviary —which is full of exploded fables—the use of the vernacular in public services, and the reform of convents. All these demands were seconded by the Cardinal of Lorraine and the French bishops, who also insisted on the superiority of Councils to Popes, and wanted the decrees of Constance and Basle in that sense to be confirmed. Every one of these demands was either evaded or refused. "For the first time," to quote the words of Ranke, "the Catholic Church owned the circumscription of its dominion. It (virtually) gave up all claim upon the East, and repudiated the Protestant half of Europe with countless anathemas."

Instinctive distrust of the Teutonic peoples had long, indeed, and increasingly shaped the policy of Rome, and had become matter of public observation. Spanish jurists, like Antonio Gomez, supposed it was ne secreta Ecclesiæ Imperatori revelentur. Hardly any Germans received the red hat, and none except Cusa and Schomberg were allowed any share in the Pontifical government. For the three centuries during which the Congregation of the Index has existed, though it has condemned German books by wholesale, only two Germans, and those monks in Roman convents, have ever sat upon it. Nay, more, it seems that the inequalities of earth are expected to be reproduced in Heaven. For six centuries, among multitudes of Italian, French, Spanish, and South American saints, only two Germans have been canonized—Bishop Benno, who was recommended by his extreme Ultramontanism, and Canisius, whose membership of the Jesuit Order condoned the stain of his birth. And who, asks the Allgemeine Zeitung, will dare to raise a warning voice at the Council now proclaimed, at least two-thirds of which will consist of Romanizers, on behalf of the twenty-five million German Catholics? Who will tell the assembled Fathers plainly that the Germans are no longer the much-enduring people who bore the yoke so patiently till at last, in 1517, it broke the camel's back; that the Catholics of Germany, who are closely intermingled with Protestants, who are versed in Protestant literature and enjoy freedom of the press, cannot for very shame accept the tenet of Papal infallibility "which throws contempt on Scripture, the ancient Church, history, and human reason"? Who will caution them against the fond illusion that a handful of Jesuits and their pupils, whose foreign education has denationalized all their feelings, are trustworthy interpreters of the national mind? and who will remind them that if a system of sheer terrorism compels German theologians for the moment to bend their backs under the Caudine yoke of a newly coined article of faith, it will never command their belief? To the last they will continue German in all their feelings and thoughts, and will say "E pur si muove! this Papal infallibility is an idle dream." When Leo X. had made his Synod of Italian prelates, pompously styled the Fifth of Lateran, decree the supremacy of the Pope over Councils, kings, and nations, thus reversing the decrees of Constance and Basle, he and his courtiers imagined that the Papacy had attained its zenith and that the world would be at its feet. A few months later a German professor posted his theses on the door of a church at Wittenberg; ten years later Rome was sacked by a German army; forty years later half Europe had finally revolted from her spiritual sway. This time no such outward convulsions are likely to follow an Ultramontane triumph. "There will be a great calm," as Dr. Manning says, and the Jesuits and their allies will sing Hosannah. The world will leave them to their Pyrrhic victory—and its results. From the Council of Trent onwards their policy has been one of repression and terrorism. The Inquisition and the Index have done their work, as Dr. Döllinger pointed out some years ago, in destroying not only all intellectual, but all theological, energy in the countries where they have had free course. No man can write what is worth reading under a censorship; "beneath its iron heel no grass can grow." Theology shrank into the dry husks of scholasticism and casuistry, biblical studies disappeared, history became perilous ground, and the very name of criticism excited suspicion and hatred. The learned Antonio Paleario was burnt at Rome, in 1570, for his critical tastes simply. Belgium and its University of Louvain was under Spanish control; in Austria, Bavaria, and the Ecclesiastical Principalities of Germany, the Jesuits were all-powerful and monopolized education; the rest of Northern Europe was Protestant, except France, which remained for awhile the one refuge of theological study, and of the ancient doctrine of the Church. In Spain or Italy any reference to the famous canon of Constance, or any denial of Papal infallibility, was visited with imprisonment and death. No one could safely meddle with theology who was not a member or a protégé of one of the great religious Orders, and these are governed by a General resident at Rome. No priest who breathed a whisper against the prevalent system could call his character or position worth a week's purchase, and no layman could impugn it who valued his head in lands where the Holy Office bore sway. And the dead silence produced by this reign of terror was named in solemn mockery "the consent of the Catholic Church," while all dissent was branded as Gallican heresy. They make a solitude and call it peace. Indeed, but for France and the Gallican Liberties, which modern Ultramontanes term "the Gallican servitudes," all historical or theological literature would have expired.

We have examined elsewhere the religious condition of the French Church since the Revolution, which is very different from what it was before. In the rest of Catholic Europe, with the exception of parts of Germany, much the same system of spiritual tyranny still prevails, though shorn, for the most part, of its secular terrors. No Roman Catholic priest of ordinary discretion would venture to profess Gallican opinions in England, and the recent treatment of Mr. Ffoulkes and Mr. Renouf shows what any Roman Catholic writer has to expect who dares to run out of the prescribed groove, though within the strict limits of Tridentine orthodoxy. It is not, therefore, without some reason that the Ultramontane whips reckon on securing an easy majority at the approaching Council. The Civiltà already indulges in a strain of exulting prophecy. The Univers and Monde have done their work in France, and most of the bishops are well primed to take the right side; the minority, it is hoped, will be overborne. No open opposition is expected from other quarters. "The English bishops will follow Manning; the Irish, Cullen—both nominees of Rome, and thoroughgoing Romanizers; the Belgians will swim with the stream; the elder German bishops will stay at home, the younger ones who have been trained by the Jesuits will come to a man; of the two hundred Italian prelates may be said what the Archbishop of Rouen said of his clergy, 'We give the word of command, and they march like a troop of soldiers'; the same applies to the Spanish and South American bishops, who have been indoctrinated in this article of Papal infallibility from their childhood." And it must be remembered further that the Ultramontane party is everywhere far better organized than its opponents, just as the Tories with ourselves are always better organized than the Liberals. We can hardly wonder if the Civiltà already raises its shout of insolent triumph, in anticipation of seeing the coping stone speedily placed on the edifice of Papal absolutism. For three centuries, by fair means and foul, by the combined machinery of the pulpit, the press, the lecture-room, and the confessional, by force where force was available, and by chicanery where it was not, the Jesuits have striven to enforce their darling doctrine, for the infallibility of the Pope practically means their own. There is always "the black Pope" standing at the elbow of the white. If they succeed, they will have accomplished, in that silence which they misconstrue into consent, the most momentous revolution in the whole history of the Church.

We may sum up the significance of the change in words condensed from the Allgemeine Zeitung:—"According to this theory Christ has made the reigning Pope the one vehicle of inspiration and exclusive organ of Divine truth. Without him the Church is a body without a soul; during a Papal interregnum she is deprived of sight and speech. Yet, strange to say, this fundamental verity was never even heard of in the Church for thirteen centuries. No creed, no catechism, no doctrinal instructions of the Fathers contains a word of the Pope, or a hint that on him depends all certainty of belief. Not a single doctrinal question for a thousand years was settled by Papal decree, but either by Synod or by the general rejection of a new doctrine by the whole Church. Three Councils have anathematized a dead Pope for heresy, and a long line of his successors has accepted and sworn to their anathemas. In the beginning of the sixth century, the principle that 'the first See is judged of no man,' was first introduced, on the strength of a tissue of forgeries, into the Western Church; and it was gradually inferred that, as he cannot be judged, he cannot fall into heresy. In the ninth century the Isidorian Decretals came in to aid the movement, and Gratian's Decretum embodied them. Thomas Aquinas, who was himself taken in, wrote in defence of the new system of Papal autocracy. The General Councils of Constance and Basle—the very names of which the Jesuits are striving to blot out of the memory of men—emphatically condemned it, and all the German and French, and nearly all the Spanish, theologians were on their side. Only the so-called Fifth Lateran Council, a mere assemblage of Italian prelates collected by Leo X. in 1517, reversed their decision and affirmed the superiority of the Pope to Councils. Finally, with the outbreak of the Protestant Reformation came the assertion of Papal infallibility, and the Cardinals Cajetan and Jacobazzi, who laboured to propagate the notion, were the most effective auxiliaries of Luther. From that day to this, the Order which arose in Spain, the chosen home of the Inquisition, has made the promotion of this dogma its grand mission. They failed in the attempt to get it defined at Trent, but they look to see their efforts crowned in the Council of the Vatican."

FINE FEELINGS.

THERE are people who pride themselves on the possession of what it pleases them to call fine feelings. Perhaps, if we were all diligent to call spades spades, these same fine feelings would come under a less euphemistic heading; but, as things are, we may as well adopt the softening gloze that is spread over the whole of our language, and call them by a pretty name with the rest. People who possess fine feelings are chiefly remarkable for the ease with which they take offence; it being indeed impossible, even for the most wary of their associates, to avoid giving umbrage in some shape, and generally when least intending it and most innocently minded. Nothing satisfies them. No amount of attention, short of absolute devotion and giving them the place of honour everywhere, sets them at ease with themselves or keeps them in good-humour. If you ask them to your house, you must not dream of mixing them up with the rest. Though you have done them an honour in asking them at all, you must give them a marked position, and bear them on your hands for the evening. They must be singled out from the herd and specially attended to, introduced to the nicest people, made a fuss with and taken care of, else they are offended, and feel they have been slighted; their sensitiveness or fine feelings being a kind of Chat Moss which will swallow up any quantity of petits soins that may be thrown in, and yet never be filled. If they are your intimate friends, you have to ask them on every occasion on which you receive. They make it a grievance if they hear that you have had even a dinner-party without inviting them, though your space is limited and you had them at your last gathering. Still, if it comes to their ears that you have had friends and did not include them, they will come down upon you to a dead certainty if they are of the franker kind, and ask you seriously, perhaps pathetically, how they have offended you? If they are of the sullen sort they will meet you coldly, or pass you by without seeing you; and will either drift into a permanent estrangement or come round after a time, according to the degree of acidity in their blood and the amount of tenacity in their character. They have lost their friends many times for no worse offence than this.

They are as punctilious, too, as they are exacting. They demand visit for visit, invitation for invitation, letter for letter. Though you may be overwhelmed with serious work, while they have no weightier burden strapped to their shoulders than their social duties and social fineries, yet you must render point for point with them, keeping an exact tally, with not a notch too many on their side, if you want to retain their acquaintance at all. And they must be always invited specially and individually even to your open days; else they will not come at all, and their fine feelings will be hurt. They suffer no liberties to be taken with them, and they take none with others; counting all frock-coat friendliness as taking liberties, and holding themselves refined and you coarse if you think that manners sans façon are pleasanter than those which put themselves eternally in stays and stiff buckram, and are never in more undress than a Court suit. They will not go into your house to wait for you, however intimate they may be; and they would resent it as an intrusion, perhaps an impertinence, if you went into theirs in their absence. If you are at luncheon when they call, they stiffly leave their cards and turn away; though you have the heartiest, jolliest manner of housekeeping going, and keep a kind of open house for luncheon casuals. They do not understand heartiness or a jolly manner of housekeeping; open houses are not in their line, and they will not be luncheon casuals; so they turn away grimly, and if you want to see them you have to send your servant panting down the street after them; when, their dignity being satisfied, their sensitiveness smoothed down, and their fine feelings reassured, they will graciously turn back and do what they might have done at first.

When people who possess fine feelings are poor, their sensitiveness is indeed a cross both for themselves and their friends to bear. If you try to show them a kindness or do them a service, they fly out at you for patronizing them, and say you humiliate them by treating them as paupers. You may do to your rich acquaintances a hundred things which you dare not attempt with your poor friends cursed with fine feelings; and little offices of kindness, which pass as current coin through society, are construed into insults with them. Difficult to deal with in every phase, they are in none more dangerous to meddle with than when poor. They are as bad if they have become successful after a period of struggle. Then your attention to them is time-serving, bowing to the rising sun, worshipping the golden calf, &c. Else why did you not seek them out when they were poor? Why were you not cap in hand when they went bare-headed? Why have you waited until they were successful before you recognised their value? It is funny to hear how bitter these sensitive folks are when they have come out into the sunlight of success after the dark passage of poverty, as if it had been possible to dig them out of their obscurity when their name was still to make—as if the world could recognise its prophets before they had spoken. But this recognition after success is a very delicate point with people of fine feelings, supposing always the previous struggle to have been hard, and even if there has been no struggle to speak of, then there are doubts and misgivings as to whether they are liked for themselves or not, and morbid speculations on the stability and absolute value of the position they hold and the attentions they receive, and endless surmises of what would be the result if they lost their fame or wealth or political power or social standing—or whatever may be the hook on which their success hangs, and their fine feelings are impaled. The act of wisdom most impossible to be performed by these self-torturers is the philosophic acceptance of life as it is and of things as they fall naturally to their share.

Women remarkable for fine feelings are also remarkable for that uneasy distrust, that insatiable craving, which continually requires reassuring and allaying. As wives or lovers they never take a man's love, once expressed and loyally acted on, as a certainty, unless constantly repeated; hence they are always pouting or bemoaning their loveless condition, getting up pathetic scenes of tender accusation or sorrowful acceptance of coolness and desertion, which at the first may have a certain charm to a man as flattering to his vanity, but which pall on him after a short time, and end by annoying and alienating him; thus bringing about the very catastrophe which they began by deprecating before it existed. Another characteristic with women of fine feelings is their inability to bear the gentlest remonstrance, the most shadowy fault-finding. A rebuke of any gravity throws them into hysterics on the spot; but even a request to do what they have not been in the habit of doing, or to abstain from doing that which they have used themselves to do, is more than they can endure with dry-eyed equanimity. You have to live with them in the fool's paradise of perfectness, or you are made to feel yourself an unmitigated brute. You have before you the two alternatives of suffering many things that are disagreeable and that might be easily remedied, or of having your wife sobbing in her own room, or going about the house with red eyes and an expression of exasperating patience under ill-treatment, far worse to bear than the most passionate retaliation. Indeed, women may be divided broadly into those who cry, and those who retort, when they are found fault with; which, with a side section of those wooden women who "don't care," leaves a very small percentage indeed of those who can accept a rebuke good-temperedly, and simply try to amend a failing or break off an unpleasant habit, without parade of submission and sweet Griseldadom unjustly chastised, but kissing the rod with aggravating meekness. For there are women who can make their meekness a more potent weapon of offence than any passion or violence could give. They do not cry, neither do they complain, but they exaggerate their submission till you are driven half mad under the slow torture they inflict. They look at you so humbly; they speak to you in so subdued a voice, when they speak to you at all, which is rarely, and never unless first addressed; they avoid you so pointedly, hurrying away if you are going to meet them about the house, on the pretext of being hateful to your sight and doing you a service by ridding you of their presence; they are so ostentatiously careful that the thing of which you mildly complained under some circumstances shall never happen again under any circumstances, that you are forced at last out of your entrenchments, and obliged to come to an explanation. You ask them what is amiss, or what do they mean by their absurd conduct; and they answer you "Nothing," with an injured air, or an affected surprise at your query. What have they done that you should speak to them so harshly? they are sure they have done all they could to please you, and they do not know what right you have to be vexed with them again. They have kept out of your way, and not said a word to annoy you; they have only tried to obey you, and to do as you ordered, and yet you are not satisfied! What can they do to please you? and why is it that they never can please you, whatever they do? You get no nearer your end by this kind of thing; and the only way to bring your Griselda to reason is by having a row; when she will cry bitterly, but finally end by kissing and making up. You have to go through the process. Nothing else, save a sudden disaster or an unexpected pleasure of large dimensions, will save you from it; but as we cannot always command cataclysms or godsends, and as the first are dangerous and the last costly, the short and easy method remaining is to have a decisive "understanding," which means a scene and a domestic tempest, with smooth sailing till the next time.

Sometimes the fine feelings are hurt by no greater barbarity than that which is contained in a joke. Women with fine feelings are seldom able to take a joke; and you will hear them relating, with an injured accent and as a serious accusation, the merest bit of nonsense you flung off at random, with no more intention of wounding them than had the merchant the intention of putting out the Efreet's eye when he flung his date-stones in the desert. As you cannot deny what you have said, they have the whip-hand of you for the moment; and all you can hope for is that the friend to whom they detail their grievance will see through them and it, and understand the joke if they cannot. Then there are fine feelings which express themselves in exceeding irritation at moral and intellectual differences of opinion—fine feelings bound up in questions of faith and soundness of doctrine, having taken certain moral and theological views under their especial patronage, and holding all diversity of judgment therefrom a personal offence. The people thus afflicted are exceedingly uncomfortable folks to deal with; and manage to make every one else uncomfortable too. You hurt their feelings so continually, and so unconsciously, that you might as well be living in a region of steel-traps and spring-guns, and set to walk blindfold among pitfalls and water-holes. You fling your date-stone here too, quite carelessly and thinking no evil, and up starts the Efreet who swears you have injured him intentionally; you express an opinion without attaching any particular importance to it, but you hurt the fine feelings which oppose it, and unless you wish to have a quarrel you must retract or apologize. As the worst temper always carries the day, and as fine feelings are only bad tempers under another name, you very probably do apologize; and so the matter ends. Other people show their fineness of feeling by their impatience of pain, and the tremendous grievance they think it that they should suffer as others—they say, so much more than others. These are the people who are great on the theory of nervous differences, and who maintain that their cowardice and impatience of pain means an organization like an Æolian harp for sensibility. The oddest part of the business is the sublime contempt these sensitives have for other persons' patience and endurance, and how much more refined and touching they think their own puerile sensibility. But this is a characteristic of humanity all through; the masquerading of evil under the name of good being one of the saddest facts of an imperfect nature and a confused system of morals. If all things showed their faces without disguise, and if spades were always called spades and not softened down to agricultural implements, we should have fine feelings placed in a different category from that in which they stand at this moment, and the world would be the richer by just so much addition of truth.

THE THREE SOUTHERN PENINSULAS.

IN reading the other day the famous speech of Señor Castelar before the Cortes—the speech in which he declared of Spain, "We are the nation who wear the sea as an emerald in our sandals, and the sun as a diamond in our crown"—several reflections occurred to us. The first was, how great an orator Señor Castelar was; how inspired with devotion to his cause, how splendid in the imagery through which he communicated his inspiration to the minds of his hearers; how few members of the British Parliament, at the very height of their eloquence, would have dared to say of England what he said of Spain, although it perhaps might more truly be said of England than of Spain. The second was, how wonderful a phenomenon was that democracy of which Señor Castelar had constituted himself the prophet; what a secret, blind, all-pervading force—it is a force without local habitation or name, dwelling in no nation specially, speaking no certain tongue, not bringing itself before the world by any definite proposals, or even by any definite wishes; but yet none the less certainly existent, none the less fatal to those who neglect or overlook it. Thirdly, it occurred to us what a pity it would be if a nation like Spain, animated with so intense a desire to become great, should not really become great. But lastly, we remembered an anecdote told to us by a traveller in Spain, which ran as follows:—On a certain line of railway in Spain, there was a bridge that was reckoned unsafe; and therefore it was ordered by the authorities which preside over railways that, until it could be made secure, no passenger train should pass over it without first setting down its passengers; the train and passengers would then proceed over the bridge separately, and the passengers be taken up on the other side. This arrangement continued for some considerable time, until the bridge was pretty well repaired; and all that was now needed was the direct official permission for trains to run over it in their ordinary manner. This, however, from the dilatory habits of Spanish officials, was long in coming. At last an engine-driver of more than ordinary courage thought he might as well take the bull by the horns, and run over the bridge without stopping—trusting that the official eye, which had slumbered so long, might slumber just so little longer as to be incognisant of his audacious act. Vain man! When he arrived at the next station, he found that the news of his exploit had preceded or accompanied him; and the officials, who had been so long incurious of the sufferings of passengers compelled in all weathers, in the hottest sun or the most pouring rain, to dismount and trudge over the bridge (not to speak of the inconvenience of the delay), were now all alive and filled with wrath at the contempt shown to their prerogative. The luckless passengers were forbidden to get out of their carriages; the train was driven backwards until it arrived again at the bridge, and (with the passengers still in it) was carried backwards over the bridge; then, to fulfil the requirements of law, the passengers were compelled to get out, train and passengers crossed over the bridge separately, the passengers got in again, and the train went on as if nothing had happened. Then was the official deity appeased for the contempt that had been shown to him.

This story has always appeared to us the ne plus ultra of officialism; glowing with the very reddest of red tape; a model of pedantry, a type of the action of a martinet. And though, doubtless, an exceptional instance, we believe it not to be a solitary one in Spain. Concurrently with the above, our traveller gave us some advice, of which the following was the purport:—"If," he said, "you should ever be travelling in Spain, and should be so unfortunate as to have been plundered by brigands, be sure to take very particular care that no hint of your loss ever reaches the ears of any magistrate or judge. Spanish justice is so stern towards the criminal that, for fear of losing a chance of evidence against him, they will keep you, the complainant, in prison till the brigand who has robbed you turns up." This, he added, had very nearly happened to himself; but luckily the brigand had been caught immediately after he had laid his complaint for the robbery, and our friend had been able to prove his case by identifying the man from among some ten or twelve others with whom he had been placed. Now, after reading the exalted language of the Republican deputy which we quoted at starting, the remembrance of these stories did, we must confess, afflict us with a certain sense of bathos and incongruity. Nor could we entirely dispel the feeling by considering the answer which, it is very conceivable, might be made by an enthusiastic Spaniard. "Such things were very natural under the Bourbon rule; but now we have changed all that; we do not need you to preach to us, whether your sermon be against the supposed licence of a democracy, or against pedantry and routine." Or, to quote Señor Castelar himself:—"We," i.e. the Cortes, "have sufficient energy to make the people understand their duties as well as their rights, and so we do not need any master to guard us, for the noble Spanish nation knows well how to take care of itself." Far is it from our intention to sneer at words like these, full as they are of courage and of confident hope. "The noble Spanish nation knows well how to take care of itself"; this, indeed, is the goal which every noble nation must set before its eyes—that it should not be cared for from without, and take passively good or evil as Providence may send them, but that it should act of itself from within, and that all its parts and all its members should cooperate as strongly as possible for the best result. Only, we must observe, no single person, Bourbon or other, can prevent a nation from attaining this end, if it has in itself the energy to accomplish it. The main cause of the evils which have hitherto afflicted Spain must be sought for in the disposition of the Spaniards themselves. And this disposition will not be suddenly changed by the expulsion of Queen Isabella, though that expulsion may have been an indispensable first step to a new and more prosperous career. For such a career, it may be that a Republic will prove more advantageous to Spain than a monarchy; but the difference is not such as Señor Castelar and his fellow-Republicans suppose; the centre of the question for the Spaniards lies in a different direction from this.

The Spaniard, the Italian, and the Greek have alike behind them, in the past ages of the world, a great and splendid history. It is impossible that this should ever be forgotten by the natives of those countries; the contrast of their present lower position tends to bring it even more prominently before their minds; and hence it is extraordinarily difficult for them to devote themselves to such measures as may bring them a sober ordinary prosperity of the kind that is amply sufficient for a native of Holland or Belgium. They have no strenuous employment in the present which might serve to turn their eyes away from the glare of their ancient glory. Hence comes that enthusiasm of patriotism which, when exhibited by such men as Garibaldi or Señor Castelar, excites no small sympathy and interest throughout the whole of Europe. Hence, too, come many single striking actions, brave, daring, and picturesque. But hence, also, come the failures of these nations; the impracticable nature of their designs, their loose and inaccurate grasp over particulars, their want of rigid attention to the matters which they have taken in hand. And that vexatious officialism of the Spaniard of which we have given instances is to be attributed to a like source. It is the officialism, not of stupidity, but of pride—that pride which will not endure that anybody should even appear to contravene its most technical and arbitrary commands. It is the officialism which measures the value of details, not by their utility, but by the fact that itself has issued them.

It is, then, a most inadequate analysis which would attribute the more or less unprosperous state of all the three southern peninsulas of Europe (not that we would dream of reducing Italy in this respect to the level of Greece) to mere bad government. The disease lies much deeper than this. It is the disease of inordinate ambition; the desire to leap suddenly into a place which has been occupied in bygone years, but from which there has been a gradual descent, and which can only again be reached by persevering efforts carried on, not for any ambitious end, but simply for the attainment of a solid and general well-being. The remedy for the disease is, in fact, a certain common sense—a common sense which does not exclude patriotism, nor regard it as a small thing that one's native country should be honoured among other nations; but which still places the reality above the opinion which others hold of the reality, and thinks that it ought to be the first effort of a country to be happy and well-ordered in itself. Looking at the matter from this point of view, is it not evident that the importance which the Italians attach to the acquirement of Rome, the importance which the Spaniards attach to the acquirement of Gibraltar, the importance which the Greeks attach to the liberation of Crete, is in each case enormously excessive, when compared with the importance which they respectively attach to the development of their internal welfare? We are not asking whether any or all of these objects may or may not be reasonably accounted desirable, and there is certainly one of them which very few Englishmen will regard as even a matter for serious discussion. But this is not our immediate point. We are not saying that the Italians ought not to wish to possess Rome, or that the Spaniards ought not to wish to possess Gibraltar, or that the Greeks ought not to wish Crete to be freed from the Ottoman dominion. What we do say is that these are at any rate—even from the point of view of any rational Italian, Spanish, or Greek patriot—not their chief and most pressing necessities; they have comparatively little influence on the real state of any of these countries; they touch their solid interests hardly at all; they do not even materially affect the esteem in which they are held by other nations; they are principally matters of self-esteem and self-gratulation.

It results from what we have said, that the chief endeavours of the Italians, the Spaniards, or the Greeks, ought for the present to be not political, but social. Most of all is this true of the Italians and of the Greeks; for these nations are in little danger from without, unless they invite danger by extraordinary weakness from within, while their internal political condition is as good as their present social state will allow. Spain, certainly, has at present a political problem before her which it is necessary for her to solve. The solution of it is not all-important, as we have endeavoured to show; but it would be absurd to deny that it may considerably affect the future prosperity of Spain. When, however, the problem is solved, then it may be trusted that Europe may hear less of the politics of Spain, and that Spaniards themselves may attribute to political action a value more nearly approaching that which really belongs to it. It is the mark of a strong nation not to pay exclusive attention to those who are engaged in the political government of a country, but rather to honour all forms of social action—manufacture, trade, commerce, literature, science. It is the mark of a weak nation when the eyes of all are fixed on the Government; when this is regarded as the sphere of all honourable action, the source of every advancement, the lever by which every beneficial change in the country is to be produced. There are, indeed, nations in which the political action of the Government is so distinctively disastrous, so far below what the social condition of the people would allow, that it compels attention to itself by its very badness. But there is no European country, unless it be France, of which this could with any plausibility be asserted at the present day. And, except in France, it can hardly be doubted that the efforts of thinkers at the present day ought rather to be in the direction of averting men's minds from the rough expedients of politics, and pointing them to the sphere of social action, in which greater accuracy and more certain good is attainable.

PAUPERISM.

THE English people has, in its wisdom, decided that nobody is to be allowed to starve in the streets. In case the official administrators of relief should be guilty of any shortcomings—for even Poor-law Guardians are human—it seconds their efforts by a vast outpouring of private charity. The result of these admirable intentions is that a million of the population is in a state of permanent pauperism, and that another and still larger fraction is only one or two removes above it. The fact is certainly distressing, even though familiarity tends to harden us to the contemplation of so much misery. Parliament can hardly be better employed than in investigating the causes of the startling disproportion between the means applied and the results obtained, and in considering proposed improvements upon our system. The evening which was this week devoted to a general discussion of the matter would certainly not have been thrown away if any new light had been cast upon these points. Unfortunately, the debate was one of that rambling and discursive nature which is too often characteristic of such occasions. Everybody had a theory of the causes and cure of pauperism, and was anxious to give his own hobby an airing without much consideration for the previous course of debate. Every hound in the pack opened on a different scent, and followed it with all the energy he possessed. One member had a leaning towards a national poor-rate; another was more inclined to return to the old parochial system; the opener of the debate wished to see subsidies voted to Friendly Societies; other members advocated a stricter economy at all hazards. There was a discussion as to whether schools for pauper children were practicable or desirable; another as to the advantages of the system of medical relief; another as to the right measures to be adopted against vagrancy; another as to the propriety of abolishing charities altogether, or placing them under the management of the Poor Law Board; and another as to the results likely to be obtained by emigration. The thread of controversy was further perplexed by a long dispute as to the statistics of pauperism, which afforded an admirable opportunity for the usual display of skilful manipulation of figures. Whether pauperism had increased absolutely; whether it had increased relatively to the population; whether the number of persons relieved had increased as fast as the expense of relieving them; whether the increase had been steady or interrupted—all these and various similar questions occupied more or less attention. As if that had not been enough, two or three members made bold excursions, in the gaiety of their hearts, into topics more or less remotely connected with the topic of the evening. Mr. Mundella introduced the Game-laws, and Mr. Samuda attacked the principle of limited liability, and suggested that there ought to be a good Bankruptcy law. The one remark which appears to have been perfectly original was contributed by Mr. R. Carter, who asserted that satisfaction was generally felt at the mode in which the Poor-law was administered.

The first result of studying this conflict of opinions is a sense of helpless bewilderment. The topics treated are so numerous, the views taken of them are so contradictory, and the absence of everything like established principles is so painfully conspicuous, that we feel half disposed to abandon the investigation in disgust. It is a very troublesome question, and it would be very pleasant to get rid of it. A summary mode of closing the dispute has accordingly been adopted by some writers. Pauperism, they say, is inevitable; in the modern condition of society, the weakest must go to the wall; there will always be commercial panics, and labourers will be thrown out of employ. The towns must grow with the growth of industry; the agricultural population will be attracted to them, and a certain sediment of pauperism will always be precipitated from the strange mixture of classes. We must make up our minds to an evil which cannot be cured. It is always easy to prove by a few figures that matters are not much worse than they used to be; and if we assume it to be certain that they will never be much better, we can bring our minds to a state of comfortable acquiescence. The only practical remedy is, that the officials concerned should be more active, energetic, and intelligent than they have hitherto been. If impertinent people ask how they are to be made more active and intelligent, we must put them off with commonplaces about the progress of society and the development of civilization. All this is, of course, very easy to say, and to some minds it may be consoling. But, to say the least, it involves a very humiliating confession. We may easily admit that pauperism is not to be extirpated in a year, nor in a generation, but the assumption that it is a fixed quantity which cannot be diminished by statesmanlike remedies is utterly unfounded. The very contrary is the truth. Few important laws are ever passed which do not in some degree affect the condition of the poor; the discussion of Bankruptcy laws and Game laws was rather irrelevant to the immediate purpose, but undoubtedly those laws have an influence, though probably a very subordinate influence, upon the material welfare of the population. Still more distinctly, the difference between a sensible and a foolish Poor-law is the difference between encouraging prudence and putting a direct premium upon recklessness. It is foolish to deny that such agencies produce a considerable effect, and it is immoral to encourage us to shirk our responsibilities. The inference to be drawn from the debate is not that the present state of things is part of an inevitable law of nature, but rather that it is the result of an exceedingly complex set of causes, whose operation requires to be carefully unravelled before we can act with any great confidence in the success of our operations. The evil to be remedied is no less than this, that the lowest classes of the country are in a state of semi-barbarism and total recklessness; and the greatest task which a statesman can undertake is to help them, by means within the proper sphere of legislation, to rise to a higher degree of civilization. The Poor-law difficulty is merely one branch, though a very important branch, of the subject, and the action of the law should be brought into harmony with that of other modes of improving the state of the population. As Mr. Goschen showed, we cannot satisfactorily provide schools for pauper children without affecting the whole system of primary education. In every other direction, the consideration of pauperism leads us into the discussion of all kinds of social reforms. That is a decisive proof of the great importance of the subject, and is an argument, not for letting it alone, but for treating it in an orderly and intelligent fashion.

The one principle which seems to be obvious and generally acknowledged is that no remedy is satisfactory which does not tend to encourage a spirit of independence. Many of the measures proposed and vehemently advocated are indeed condemned by this doctrine which every one acknowledges when stated in the abstract. Thus, for example, it was said that there could be no harm in relieving the sick poor, because no one would voluntarily qualify himself for relief by catching a disease. The argument shows how imperfectly a simple principle is sometimes understood. Undoubtedly no one would catch a fever in order to procure admission to a fever hospital. But if we declare that all patients with fevers shall be taken in and cured at the public expense, we say in so many words that it is worth while for nobody to make provision against a probable contingency. Every sensible man in a certain rank of life takes care that, in case of need, he will be able to pay his doctor's bills and support his family when he is disqualified from labour. If the principle of relieving sick people is to be admitted indiscriminately, it amounts to discouraging all kinds of Friendly Societies. It is a shame, as Mr. Goschen observed, that the first touch of frost drives into the streets a number of idle people, declaring in stentorian tones that they have got no work to do, as though frost in December were a mysterious and totally unprecedented visitation of Providence. But fevers are just as certain as frost, and a man has no more right to count upon constant immunity from them. If everybody were as prudent and self-reliant as he ought to be, relief would be unnecessary except in the case of sudden catastrophes, such as the cotton famine, where it could not be reasonably expected that the calamity would have been foreseen. Unluckily, the problem is a good deal more complicated, and we have to consider whether it is not possible to administer relief in such a way as to raise instead of depressing the existing standard of independence. There are, for example, many poor men who struggle, with a heroism which it is impossible not to respect, against appealing to charity. If they are driven by misfortunes, for which perhaps they are not accountable, into dependence upon other people, we cannot, in common humanity, allow them to starve, and a grudging and stinted liberality very often ends by demoralizing them and adding a few more units to the multitude who are scrambling for charity, to the complete annihilation of their self-respect. In such cases it might be desirable to give help on a liberal scale, and to save a poor man from breaking up his household until the approach of better times. On the other hand, we have the hereditary pauper, whose one object is to avoid honest labour; the lowest point in the scale of possible innocence being marked by the professional vagrant, whence we pass by easy degrees into the habitual criminal. Liberal relief to such persons is simply throwing away money to preserve a class which ought to be got rid of from society. The strictest possible regulations, and the removal of the children from the demoralizing influences of their homes, are the only feasible remedies. We ought to keep the existing generation under the closest regulations, and to bring up the rising generation under more hopeful circumstances. Without pursuing the same distinction further, it is evident that what we require above all things is the distribution of paupers into different classes, and the application of appropriate remedies to each. At present the public falls into one of two alternatives; either it insists upon indiscriminate liberality, and so demoralizes the reckless class, or upon indiscriminate economy, and so degrades those who would really be improved by a sensible expenditure. Meanwhile, any attempt to put things on a better footing is generally defeated by the promiscuous charity which it seems perfectly hopeless to denounce.

The first step, then, to a better order of things is to attempt a better classification of the poor; to deal with each class rigorously according to its merits; and to endeavour in some way to bring charitable institutions into harmony with the legal system of relief. There will always be abundant work for the exercise of individual intelligence by voluntary institutions, but there can be no reason why they should not co-operate with the Poor-law officials. If the Poor-law really possessed that public confidence which one enthusiast has ascribed to it, the attempt to put down the indiscriminate flow of gratuitous charity would be far more promising. We should be only too glad to have some better guarantee for the judicious application of our funds. The debate of Monday night has exhibited the chaotic state of opinion at present existing; but it is all the more incumbent upon the authorities to lay down a few definite principles which may serve as a nucleus for gradually working out an intelligent system.

MADAME RACHEL'S CASE.

THE English law delights in cumbrous and antiquated forms, and it is agreeable to the genius of that law to make suppositions which are at variance with facts. Every criminal trial appears by the record of it to have been held before two or more judges, whereas only one judge usually takes part in it; and the only difference between the case of Madame Rachel and many other cases is that at the Central Criminal Court a statute directs the sessions to be held before two or more judges, while at the Assizes a similar direction is embodied in the Commissions issued by the Crown authorizing them to be held. Reading the statute by the light afforded by the practice of centuries, lawyers need feel no difficulty in interpreting it; and laymen must be contented to be told that all the judges mentioned in a Commission, or at least as many of them as are in the building where it is executed, are "constructively" present in every Court in which a prisoner is tried. There are, according to the books, no less than five different Commissions, besides certain supplementary writs which are necessarily, or at any rate usually, issued for the holding of assizes. The principal Commission, or Commission of Oyer and Terminer, as it is called, is issued under the Great Seal, and directed to the Lord Chancellor, Lord President of the Council, Lord Privy Seal, several noblemen, two judges of the Superior Courts, Queen's counsel, serjeants, and associates; but the judges, serjeants-at-law, and Queen's counsel therein mentioned are to be of the quorum, so that the rest cannot act without the presence of one of them, and there must be two or more of the persons named in the Commission present. The only difference between such a Commission and that issued for the Central Criminal Court is that "several noblemen" are mentioned in the former, and the Lord Mayor and aldermen in the latter, and that is merely an ornamental or formal difference. The practice under these Commisions has long been for each of the two judges who go a particular circuit to sit in a separate Court, one trying civil causes, and the other prisoners. If the calendar is heavy, both judges will proceed with it, each in his own Court, after the civil business is disposed of. Or one of the Queen's counsel or serjeants named in the Commission will hold a third Court for the trial of prisoners. The practice at the Old Bailey has been similar, except that two of the judges sometimes sit together in the principal Court, while the Recorder, the Common Serjeant, and the Judge of the Sheriffs' Court—or City County Court, as it is now called—sit each in his separate Court, assisted by the "constructive" presence of all the other judges, and the actual presence of one or more aldermen.

It is satisfactory to be able to stop short of a positive conclusion that aldermen are wholly useless. The presence of two or more members of the Commission within the walls of the Old Bailey may be taken, according to authority and precedent, to be necessary to the legal trial of a prisoner. At the Assizes it sometimes happens that one judge remains to finish a criminal trial after the other judge and the majority of the Bar have departed. But the remaining judge is always accompanied by his associate, who, as his name implies, is joined with the judges in the Commission; and thus the requirement of the Commission, that the trials under it shall be held before two or more of the Commissioners, is considered to be complied with. Among the associates are usually comprised the gentlemen in wigs who sit below the judges and call upon the prisoners to plead, and perform other duties which may be called ministerial in the Court. These gentlemen do not perform judicial duties, although some of them are popularly supposed to know more about criminal law than the judges who sit above them. They do not interfere in the conduct of the trial unless by a whisper in the judge's ear when he is in danger of making a mistake. Yet if one of the judges and the Queen's counsel and serjeants have departed from an assize town, or even have gone away from the Court to dinner, the presence of an associate is indispensable to any efficient proceeding by the remaining judge. Indeed the relation of the associate to the judge may be aptly illustrated by that of the bellows-blower to the player on the organ. Now we believe that there are associates at the Old Bailey as well as at the Assizes, and probably all the gentlemen in wigs who sit beneath the judges in its various Courts have their names included in the Commission, along with those of the Lord Mayor and the Lord Chancellor. But suppose that all of them do not enjoy this honour, there might be a possibility of a judge finding himself without a qualified associate in his Court, and then the legality of his proceedings would depend upon the presence of an alderman on the Bench beside him, or at least within the building. Thus it appears that, in the absence of an associate, an alderman is necessary at a trial; and then comes the further question, whether it must be the same alderman throughout. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn has given his reasons for thinking that it must be the same alderman, but it may be remarked that the presence of another judge named in the Commission within the building would undoubtedly be sufficient to render the proceedings of a single judge legal, and we cannot see why, if a trial lasts two days, an alderman who was not present on the first day should not be as useful as a judge who is not present on the second day. We therefore infer that aldermen may possibly be useful in their seats in Court, and it is not to be forgotten that there are other seats at the Old Bailey which they occupy with indisputable efficiency. It may be true that they join in judicial proceedings only, as lawyers say, "for conformity"; but there are other proceedings in which they play a leading part. It is not, perhaps, generally known that there is very good eating and drinking at the Old Bailey. The judges and other dignitaries are suitably entertained at luncheon, and indications may sometimes be observed towards afternoon of an approaching dinner. An alderman who was only present "constructively" on the bench, would doubtless take good care to be present destructively at the dinner table. The practice formerly was to hold evening sittings of the Central Criminal Court, and many curious stories are told of what was done thereat. It may be said that a man who cannot carry his liquor well ought not to be a judge; but a prisoner would probably prefer to be tried by a judge who did not carry liquor at all at the time of trial. Besides the wretches who were hanged that jurymen might dine, there might perhaps be reckoned some wretches who were hanged because judges had dined. It may be supposed that, now that evening sittings have been discontinued, there are fewer dinners provided at the Old Bailey than in former years, and in that point of view the attendance of aldermen at the Court may have become less of a substantial reality, and more of an empty form, than it used to be.

The arguments of counsel and the judgment of the Court in this case exhibit the absurdity of the law, but it would be a mistake to suppose that the law is unsound because it is shown to be absurd. One of the judges admitted that he had always asked an alderman to be present when he passed sentence on a prisoner at the Old Bailey, but the same judge intimated that the interference of an alderman in a trial would ensure an alteration in the constitution of the Court. This judge, therefore, considered the presence of an alderman necessary at the sentence, but not at the trial, and he would have considered the interference of the alderman impertinent. The Lord Chief Justice thinks that, if the presence of an alderman is necessary, the same alderman ought to be present throughout the trial, but still the alderman would be expected to sit quiet, looking as wise as ever he pleased, but saying nothing, and occasionally beguiling the tedium of the day by looking into a newspaper, or dallying with the bouquet of choice flowers which is placed upon the desk before him. In fact, his position would closely resemble that of Mr. Mark Tapley when he became junior partner in the firm of Martin Chuzzlewit and Co., and had to remark to himself, whenever he ventured to open his mouth in the presence of his senior, "Co.'s a putting his foot in it, he is."

There seems to be a sort of moral justice in the fate of Madame Rachel, who, having dealt all her life in falsehood, is now tried and punished by a legal fiction. The constructive presence of all the members of the Commission in the Court is as much a work of the imagination as the existence of William, of whom we have heard so much. Madame Rachel or her friends may say that, if one of the superior judges, or the Recorder, or the Common Serjeant, had tried her case, the result might have been different. The answer is, that they did try it. We cannot help thinking that the law has been rather hard on Madame Rachel, whom it ought to have regarded with some tenderness as a practitioner in the same line as itself. The law delights in shams and subtle contrivances, and in saying, in the most solemn manner, the thing which is not. This was the ruling passion of our old lawyers, if we may judge from the formularies they have left behind them; and difficulties like this which we are considering arise from the conflict which is always going on between ancient fictions and modern regard for truth. If this difficulty had occurred to the Court of Queen's Bench two hundred years ago, it would have been got over immediately by mentioning in the record the names of all the aldermen who were present, and supposing the trial to have occupied only a single day and all the aldermen to have been present on that day. If a difficulty occurred, the men of old always endeavoured to dig under it or creep round it, and the last thing that suggested itself to their minds would be to ask Parliament to remove it. Of all the legal fictions that were invented to assist the administration of criminal justice, the most wonderful perhaps was that which allowed benefit of clergy in order to relieve the Courts from some of the drudgery of hanging. Anciently all felonies were capital, and the law which made them so being regarded as unalterable, the only resource was to evade it. A clerk, if brought into a criminal Court for trial, was entitled, on proving his orders, to be handed over to the Ordinary, who was supposed to punish him. This supposition of punishment was the first fiction. The next was to suppose that any one who could read was a clerk, and entitled to be discharged from civil custody. Then reading was dispensed with, and it became enough that the prisoner should fall on his knees in the dock and crave the benefit of the statute which regulated the allowance of clergy. But it was provided that this benefit should only be allowed once, and to prevent a second claim the prisoner was to be burned in the hand before discharge. Then the burning of the hand became a form of which the effect was as transient as that of one of Madame Rachel's cosmetics. After the lapse of centuries, and resorting to various shifts and subterfuges, the law finally arrived at the rational result of inflicting minor punishments for minor crimes. But it may deserve the attention of certain lady agitators of our day that a woman could not have the benefit of clergy, and therefore was liable to be hanged for the smallest felony. The law was capable of believing a good deal, but even Madame Rachel could not have persuaded it that a woman was a cleric. Indeed, if Miss Faithfull herself had been indicted for felony, we fear that the law would have conclusively presumed the prisoner to be incapable of clergy although she offered to read to the judges her own published works. The forms of the Commissions of Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol Delivery, still used for the Assizes, are probably coeval with the practice of granting benefit of clergy to all who claimed it. They originally directed trials to be had before two or more judges, and they continued to direct this after the practice had become firmly established of holding trials before a single judge. Our lawyers avoided discrepancy between the Commission and the proceedings under it by making up a record of the trials stating them to have been held according to the Commission. It did not occur to their minds to alter the form of the Commission, any more than it would occur to the mind of one of Madame Rachel's clients to abandon the use of costly washes and pigments, and try the effect of regular life, and soap and water. It must be remembered, however, to the credit of the ancient judges, that their subtlety was almost always exercised on the side of mercy, and they deserve the praise bestowed upon them in the lines—

> Where'er his bones are laid,
> Thrice honour'd be that lawyer's shade,
> Who truth with nonsense first combined
> And equity with fiction joined.

THE PERMISSIVE BILL.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON'S Bill, entitled, with an admirable and unconscious paradox sufficiently illustrating its contradictory and anomalous character, the "Permissive Prohibitory Liquor Bill," has been rejected, but in the teeth of a minority sufficiently respectable in numbers, and by a majority neither so overpowering in numbers nor in Parliamentary influence as to lead us to the conclusion that we have seen the last of this agitation. The first, but not the worst, vice of the proposed measure is that it is permissive, and not universally obligatory. These permissive and voluntary Acts have not only always turned out failures in working, but they are an opprobrium on modern legislation. Law, right, duty, public policy, are of universal incidence in a settled community, and should not vary and alternate in obedience to the accidental boundaries of parishes or the caprices of borough ratepayers. If it is right to prohibit the sale of gin and beer, the prohibition should be general and universal. If it is right in the interests of the public to supply people with books and reading-rooms, all towns should be compelled to establish libraries and reading-rooms. To leave it to the discretion of a fortuitous and fluctuating collection of ratepayers to say whether they will or will not adopt a law, while the very fact of making it shows that the supreme power pronounces it to be right and good, amounts to this—that duty and right is not a thing of perpetual and universal obligation, but depends upon A., B., or C.'s recognition of it. If permissive legislation is right in one matter of obligation, it is right in all matters. If every parish or town may say whether it will or will not have public-houses, then consistency would require that every parish should settle by voting-papers, and in its private comitia, whether the Queen's writ shall run, or larceny be deemed an offence, within its petty precinct. A law which is law in one parish and no law in the next is fatal to the fundamental and primary notions of Imperial government. Again, a law the voluntary imposition of which, according to this Bill, may be attempted to be renewed every year after it has been rejected, but which, when once adopted and enforced, cannot be got rid of for three years, must be a fruitful source of perpetual divisions, heartburnings, dissensions, and agitation. In almost all towns and parishes where a Permissive Act might be managed to be carried by a popular vote, a strong minority is sure to exist. The Act, perhaps, is adopted by the scantiest requisite majority, and three years of cursing, swearing, intimidation, and civil war must be the certain result. The thirsty souls—to take the defeated minority at its worst estimate—are not likely to find their tempers improved by being cut off from flagon and pot; and the victory of the virtuous is not likely to make the vicious—if vicious they are—very pleasant neighbours and associates.

These, however, are faults which are incidental rather to the permissive character of the measure than to the measure itself. Strong objections, such as those we have touched upon, attach to all permissive measures, and we may add that they are morally dishonest. They would be, if they dared to be, of general incidence. Their promoters are afraid of this honest and outspoken course; they only try it on; they are avowedly only getting in the thin edge of the wedge, and in national legislation this is mean and contemptible. Sir Wilfrid Lawson says we have already got this principle at work by making sanitary and educational provisions voluntary, with this result, that the public health and education is only considered right for those who think it right. It is the old wicked fallacy of Horne Tooke. Truth is what a man troweth; right is what a man consents to. But we must go further than this in the condemnation of the Prohibitory—or Permissive Prohibitory—Bill. Two-thirds of the ratepayers are to coerce one-third; the two-thirds being possibly, and we might say most probably, those who have every private appliance for supplying themselves with liquor, and the one-third being the aggregate of labourers and small artisans who have only the public-house or beer-shop from which to draw their daily rations of strong drink. Further than this, the strongest and most impregnable argument against the measure, it is idle to carry the discussion. Human nature ought not to submit to such a tyranny, and, in England at least, never will submit to it. The maxim of the public safety being the supreme law—which it must have cost something to a scholar like Mr. O. Morgan, the solitary defender of the Bill, to wrest from its original meaning, even if it did apply, which it does not, to the matter in hand—only begs the question at issue. It is assuming a great deal to say that the public safety is guaranteed by calling into existence an infuriated minority of a third of the population smarting under a sense of oppression, and possessed, rightly or wrongly, with the feeling that they are trampled on by their superiors in station. Admitting, which is admitting a great deal, that every social and moral evil grows out of the root of drunkenness, Sir Wilfrid and his friends have to show that under his Liquor Law drunkenness would be extirpated, and they have to show, moreover, that all customers of the public-house and beer-shop are drunkards. These points they quietly assume, and too many of the opponents of the Bill are disposed to let these assumptions pass unquestioned. The last point is one open to the easiest disproof. A man must be a fool as well as a fanatic to say that the foaming pots which are familiar to every neighbourhood as the dinner beer and the supper beer of a family are never consumed without one at least of the consumers getting intoxicated. And as to drunkenness being the origin of every social crime and evil, it is more easily said than proved. What crimes might be developed in a community where every stimulant was prohibited, it might be just as easy and just as fallacious to assume as it is to conjecture, on the other hand, what unknown virtues might be developed under the same circumstances. It is mere guessing in the dark either way. A whole nation of water-drinkers, disgraced by innumerable but hypothetical and unknown vices, is just as fair and just as foolish a subject to theorize upon as a nation of water-drinkers all holy, pious, and obedient to the laws. In either case there is no sufficient experience to guide us, and what experience we have is against prohibition.

It is a fact, and must be confronted by the Prohibitionists, that there is no nation or language in which some form of stimulant has not been used. Mounting up into the remotest regions of tradition, the benefactors of mankind have been the planters of the vine; and in the most savage communities—and, indeed, where there is no community at all—an instinct, which is only another name for a necessity of human nature, has compelled man to discover a stimulant. Of course, in urging this argument we are assuming that the English Prohibitionists, though they are rather shy of admitting so much, do hold all alcoholic and stimulant beverages to be ipso facto pernicious, and therefore to be prohibited. If they do not emphatically adopt Total Abstinence principles, they have no logical ground on which to stand. And the Total Abstinence theory is confronted by the general consent of mankind. This is simply a fact; that in some form or other—wine, spirituous liquors and fermented drinks, opium, haschisch, bhang, intoxicating or narcotic beans, coarse vegetable spirits, or what not—man in North and South, East and West, under every variety of climate and social condition, will take to intoxicants or stimulants. These things may be, and among us certainly are, grossly abused, but so is every natural and human instinct. There are other animal and sensual passions which are little, if at all, more natural or more universal—which are abused, and lead to horrible and disgraceful sins and immoralities. Let us be consistent, and repress or, if we can, try to prohibit them, and bring into Parliament some other Permissive Prohibitory enactments which shall deal with other tendencies of the flesh to evil and riotous living.

The result of the debate on Wednesday is not a matter for unmixed satisfaction. Sir Wilfrid's Bill was rejected, but only 280 members were found to attend the House on a very serious question, involving high constitutional and high moral considerations. And though we have no objection to accord to the promoters of the measure the possession of good intentions, there was over much compliment and politeness to gentlemen who, whatever they may mean, are very mischievous. Fanaticism may be genuine, and in many cases to talk nonsense may be unavoidable, but fanaticism and nonsense ought not to be received with so very much of urbanity and deference. There is a wholesome and righteous severity with which this sort of thing ought to be treated. Perhaps the House of Commons is at this moment so accustomed to a strong majority that it hardly sees with our eyes that there are limitations, especially in social matters, to the doctrine that all minorities must suffer the will of the majority without complaint or struggle. Under one, and only one, aspect are we disposed to be grateful for the discussion. We think the present licensing system is doomed. Next Session—oh what an era of earnest, practical, sound work that next Session is going to bring us!—the Government is going to do something. One thing it must do; nay, from two things it cannot escape. The beer-houses and excise-licenses must be reformed; and so must the brewers' monopoly. The magistrates' licenses Sir Wilfrid and his friends can scarcely object to, inasmuch as to some extent the present practice of licensing public-houses does give local authorities and local opinion some check against the blackguardism, and some guarantees for the orderly management, of public-houses. But the real vice of the present drinking trade in England is that it allows the great brewers a practical monopoly of most of the drinking houses, and encourages the immediate source of drunkenness, the sale of adulterated and poisonous beverages. The Legislature will be much better employed in seeing that the popular drinks are wholesome and unvitiated than in attempting to run counter to the natural instincts, and to coerce the natural liberty, of the subject. As to the beer-houses licensed by the Excise, and altogether unregulated in numbers, they are an unmitigated nuisance which nobody defends.

We are perfectly aware that in what we are saying there is no novelty. We have attempted none. Inveterate fallacies can only be met by threadbare refutations; and when we are confronted for the hundredth time with the same platitudes, we can only reply with the hundredth time repeated commonplace.

RELIEF TO THE TAX-PAYER.

CERTAIN items in Mr. Lowe's Budget bid fair to set us free from one of the lesser miseries of human life. He is not only going to make some of our taxes less, which is no small boon, but, what is a greater boon still, to sweeten not a little the manner of their collection. Hitherto the way in which taxes have been collected has been ingeniously contrived so as to give the largest possible amount of needless trouble. What with Assessed Taxes, Income Tax, Poor Rate, Highway Rate, Church Rate, to say nothing of rectorial and vicarial tithe, a man was always paying something or other, or, if he was not paying, he was filling up a paper about something that he had to pay. Tithe, no doubt, is private property; rates are a local burden; taxes are a national burden. Let all proper distinctions be drawn between the three; but when a man is always paying either one or the other, he may be apt to get careless as to the distinction of private, local, and national, and to wish that, if they cannot all be got rid of, they may at least be all rolled into one. It was a small crumb of comfort when, in those counties which adopted the Highway Act, highway rate and poor-rate were lumped together. The amount of relief which this gave to some classes can hardly be put into words. The world in general perhaps does not realize how many English parishes were divided into tithings, each tithing maintaining its own roads and levying its own rate. A man might easily be an occupier in several of these little commonwealths, and for each of them he had to pay a separate rate. The rector, for instance, or other tithe-owner, in such a parish, had to pay as many separate highway rates, perhaps six or seven, as there were tithings in his parish. To have these various fragments rolled into one was no slight gain; but our cup of joy was slightly dashed by the new law of dog-licences. Hitherto the dog found his place among the assessed taxes, but now, besides filling up the tax papers, we had to go to the post-office and take out a licence for him. Here was a further burden, but it is out of this burden that relief seems to have grown. The dog-tax is simplicity itself; no one could quarrel with it except because it was something over and above, beyond our other burdens. Substituted for them, instead of added to them, nothing could be better. You have simply to go to the post-office and take out your licence. If you fail to do so, you may be fined, and the excise officers are sharp enough in summoning those who are liable to be fined. The only wonder is that so many people are found, who, contrary to all rules of prudence, risk five pounds on the chance of saving five shillings.

Now to the beautiful simplicity of this process no contrast can be greater than the past process of collecting the Assessed Taxes. Be the amount great or small, the elaborate stupidity of the business is far more annoying than the amount to be paid. First of all, the duty of collection does not fall on any qualified officer who knows what he is about, but on some farmer or other illiterate person who can with a considerable effort just manage to write down the names of the sufferers and the amount to be paid by each. We have often pondered deeply on the principle on which successive assessors are appointed, and we have come to the conclusion that they must be appointed on the same principle on which the Mayor of Woodmancot was anciently chosen. We assume that the name of Woodmancot is not unknown to our readers, as we had some months back the pleasure of introducing to them that otherwise not renowned Gloucestershire manor as a new competitor for Shakspearian honours. Well, tradition says that in times past Woodmancot had a Mayor, and that—perhaps on the apostolic principle of setting them to judge who were least esteemed—the inhabitant of Woodmancot who had done the most foolish action during the past year was always chosen to the municipal dignity. In short, the local ambition of Woodmancot took somewhat of the form of a donkey-race. But the upshot was that the Mayoralty of Woodmancot was improved off the face of the earth, and that tradition alone vouches that such an office ever was. That the assessors are chosen on the same principle there can be no doubt. If there be a stupider man in the parish than the assessor he has at least enough of method in his madness to keep himself out of the way. That he can explain nothing, if anything needs explanation, may be taken for granted; it is a mercy if he can put the proper items in their proper columns. Oftentimes is the charge for the horse above thirteen hands put opposite to the place for hair-powder, or the tax on the coachman jumbled up with the tax on the carriage which he drives. Then, as we before said, the thing is going on always; now it is a paper to be filled up, now a paper telling you what you have to pay, now a paper announcing a meeting of Commissioners at which you may appeal, but to which you certainly never think of appealing. Last of all comes the actual payment, in itself the least troublesome process of all if it were not embittered by the thought that you are not paying for what you have at the moment, but for what you had at some remote time, the details of which cleave very faintly indeed to the memory. It calls for more than human prudence to remember that, if you want to lessen your number of horses, you must do it not later than April 4th, that if you want to increase them, you must do it not earlier than April 6th, or the consequences will be hanging about you in the shape of another year's taxation for two or three years to come. The whole thing is simply bewildering. And then alongside of it comes Income-tax; who can tell whether twice, thrice, or four times a year? Schedule A, Schedule B, Schedule C, Schedule D, here a payment to be deducted from the landlord, here a payment to be repaid to the tenant; the brain grows dizzy, and can give no further account of the whole business except that the process of filling up papers, appealing, not appealing, trying to spell out the assessor's figures, is simply endless. Then to all this is added that the assessor, with weeks and months before him to collect his money, always puts it off to the last moment, and, if by any chance you are not forthcoming at that last moment, he looks on you as a criminal, when it is simply his own lâches that you have not paid long before.

From all this Mr. Lowe promises us, if not absolute deliverance, at least a considerable alleviation. We are not sure that we have quite mastered the exact extent of our new privileges, but we gather that several payments are to be rolled into one, that one visit to the post-office will come instead of several visits on the part of the assessor. Well, all thanks for anything that we can get; it is a case in which we may be grateful for the smallest mercies. Even if Mr. Lowe did not save our pockets a penny, he would save us a considerable outlay of time and temper, which are still more valuable. If the whole thing can be done as simply as the dog-tax is now done, so much the better; if it cannot all be done, let as much be done as may be. Let us pay for what we have, not for what we had some years back, and let us have reasonable officials to deal with, who can explain a difficulty if there is one. We can see no objection on earth to substituting an intelligent Government officer, trained to his work, as the collector of national revenue, instead of a blundering farmer. Yet it is possible that the parochial lion may begin to put up his back, and to raise the roar of "centralization" We should be the last to seek to destroy any real piece of self-government, where real self-government exists. Where local authorities can really act, they ought to be allowed to act; when they have power to modify this or that if the circumstances of their neighbourhood may call for modification, by all means let them retain that power. But here is no self-government at all; there is no local discretion in the matter; the thing is to be paid anyhow; the question is whether it shall be paid in a convenient or an inconvenient way, to a competent or to an incompetent functionary. We assume that faults will have to be found in the Budget of a Liberal Government Here is a good opening for declamation about local agency, local liberties, Magna Charta, and King Alfred—all, for aught we know, impersonated in the dullest farmer in the parish. Self-government, by all means; but self-government is one thing, Kirchenthurmspolitik is another. But self-government is sometimes embodied in such odd shapes that we doubt not that some minds will cleave to the parish assessor as its representative. Mr. Lowe has found a new way to pay old debts, and if his novelty causes a little consternation here and there, he will probably not be the worse for it. Our own hopes on the other hand are so kindled that we begin to ask whether another great work may not be looked for from the same hands. It cannot be simply, as Mr. Hunt has enviously suggested, that Mr. Lowe will get good shipwreck in the form of legacy and succession duties. Mr. Lowe claims to have a gift for turning deficit into surplus, and paying for things one does not see how. May he not turn out to be the heaven-sent Rebecca for whom we have so long been looking, to kick down the turnpikes and to clear away the debts on the roads?

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION BILL IN COMMITTEE.

THE Scotch Education Bill has passed through Committee in the Lords. It has been mangled to some extent, as every one expected who had studied the temper of the House. But, considering the character of the opposition which it has encountered, the fact that it has passed at all must be regarded as a triumph to the Government. The hostility to the Bill arises from two sources—the jealousy of the clergy of the Established Church in Scotland, and the narrow prejudices and fears of their friends in England. The Bill, though in the hands of the Duke of Argyll, is, as is well known in Scotland, the work of the Lord Advocate Moncreiff, an influential member of the Free Church. This is now the fourth attempt within the last fifteen years which Mr. Moncreiff has made to carry a measure of vital importance to Scotland, and each time the same tactics have been adopted by the same section of the rival Church to defeat him, and to protract the unsatisfactory state of things which is admitted to exist in Scotland. Every engine of what is still a considerable ecclesiastical organization has been employed to retard the progress of each effort which has been made by a Liberal Government for the extension of education, and the clergy of the Established Church have pulled the wires. They have done this with their eyes open to the inadequacy of existing appliances for education. They are aware that 90,000 children in a population of three millions are not at school, and never can be, under the present system. They know that a vast proportion of those who are at school are indifferently taught in buildings that are flagrantly unsuitable. They are aware also that this Bill proposes to remedy those abuses, and that the people in Scotland are almost unanimously favourable to it. But in the face of all this they have left no stone unturned to defeat the measure and to perpetuate those evils, because it is the work of a Free Church Lord Advocate. They have petitioned against the Bill in their Synods and their Presbyteries, and in all the other ramifications of their organization. They have published and circulated a collection of statistics, founded on what the Duke of Argyll has shown to be an utterly fallacious basis, with a view to mislead the people of England and Scotland as to the financial effect of the Bill. They have persuaded some of the ironmasters in Scotland to petition against it on the ground that they—the ironmasters—are in terror lest the godly upbringing of the miners and puddlers of Lanarkshire should be imperilled by its operation. They have addressed a manifesto to the country gentlemen of Scotland, commanding them to use the machinery of the effete institution called "the county meetings" to destroy the Bill, and some two hundred of these Tory Lairds, with a placid docility worthy of their own sheep, have obeyed the clerical commands. Lastly, they have got at the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Denbigh, and these two sagacious noblemen—the one on political, the other on sectarian, grounds—have bowed to the dictation of Dr. Cook of the Scotch Establishment, and vainly endeavoured to defeat the Bill.

It has, however, passed the Committee, and is now in the fair way to become law. Too much credit cannot be given to the Duke of Argyll and Lord De Grey on the part of the Government, and to Lords Airlie, Minto, and Dalhousie, as independent members, for the staunchness with which they fought an uphill fight. They stuck to their guns like men, in face of the determined hostility of the Opposition, and it was no easy matter. Eight dukes, two archbishops, seven bishops, three marquises, eighteen earls, and all the Roman Catholic peers, were arrayed against them; and one noble lord, who sat on the Liberal side of the House, used all the plausibility of which he is a master to trip them up. The blunt antagonism of the Duke of Marlborough and the captious nagging of Lord Cairns were to be expected. They merely followed Dr. Cook's instructions, and so did Lord Colonsay, in a spirit of feebleness and conciliation. It was different with Lord Kinnaird. His professions of friendly support were unbounded. But when he urged the Duke of Argyll to throw over one of the vital principles of the Bill as a mere nothing, and on his refusal voted against him, the true worth of his professions was exhibited. These opponents, however, showed only half the hostile hand. It was left to the Archbishop of Canterbury to show the other half. It was for him to arouse the English fears and suspicions that were slumbering on the back benches, and he did it effectually. If the judgment of the Lords upon the Bill was not a foregone conclusion, the appeal of the Archbishop settled the question. The division took place immediately afterwards, and it is vain to disguise the fact that the effect of it upon the symmetry and thoroughness of the measure is serious. The object of the Bill was threefold—(1) to extend the rating system which has long existed in Scotland, and to make it uniform by providing that all schools supported by rates should be national, and that none but National Schools should enjoy the Privy Council grants; (2) to establish a central authority over education in Scotland, through which schools should be provided wherever they were required; (3) to establish universal undenominational inspection. The Bill as amended in Committee retains the second provision intact, but, as it now stands, the first and third are only partially retained. Two amendments were carried, which provide that denominational schools might still be established, and that Privy Council grants should still be given to both Denominational and National Schools. National education is thus only half established, and denominational inspection, a fruitful source of dishonesty and inefficiency in the conduct of schools, may be continued in the non-national schools. The Privy Council will have to support a staff of denominational and a staff of national inspectors, and an opening is still left for sectarian rivalry and discord throughout Scotland. In short, the Presbyterian people of Scotland have deliberately, and after the experience of twenty-five years of anarchy and confusion in matters educational, made up their minds that denominational education is unsuitable to their country, and have demanded a national system: and the English and Irish Peers, backed by the Bench of Bishops, have refused to listen to their demands. And why? Not because they think that national education is unsuitable for Scotland, but because they fear that, if undenominational education were established in Scotland, it would soon be demanded in England. It is wonderful that those who use this dangerous argument should not perceive its application to the case of Ireland.

The decision of the Lords in this matter will be received with indignation in Scotland, and it is only natural that it should be so. At the same time, when the first excitement is over, and the Scotch people come to count their gains, they will be shrewd enough to see that these are considerable. They have got a Board of Education whose duty it is to see that there are schools established in every district of the country, and in every part of the towns where such schools are required. Every child henceforth in Scotland will have full opportunity of being instructed. A principle of universal rating is established, so that Scotch parents will no longer be dependent on the caprice of voluntary benefactors, or on the jealous and spasmodic rivalry of contending sects. Most of their schools are released from clerical supervision, and are henceforth to be managed by committees elected by the people. The schoolmasters are for the future to be selected from a body of certified teachers approved by competent examiners. Every school in Scotland is to be under official inspection, and the buildings are to be under the supervision of the Board. And the money paid out of the Imperial purse towards primary education in Scotland will be raised from one hundred thousand to something like three hundred thousand pounds per annum. But this is not all. The moral gain remains to be calculated, and its practical effects are neither few nor insignificant. The present unsatisfactory state of things is broken up as soon as this Bill becomes law. All the old parochial schools at once become national, and as such are open to national inspection. Many of them will shortly be thrown on the rates, and so taken out of the hands of the established ministers. The Free Church will be only too glad to surrender their schools to the national system; so will the United Presbyterians; undenominational schools will at once be absorbed, and most of the private adventure schools will be virtually knocked on the head. The ministers of the establishment will of course use every effort to keep hold of their General Assembly and Christian Knowledge Society's schools—and they are welcome to them so long as Scotch parents care to use them. But it is not difficult to predict that the National Schools managed and supported by the State will speedily draw to themselves all the children within reach. The Episcopalian and Roman Catholic schools will probably remain outside the national system, and so long as they keep to their own people this may not be a serious matter. But if it be the case, as was stated in the debate, that out of 6,000 scholars attending Episcopalian schools, only 2,000 belonged to that communion, and, as the Duke of Argyll stated in one of his earlier speeches, that the children attending these schools are required to go through instruction in the Church Catechism, it is obvious that a stringent conscience clause is necessary to secure freedom of education in these schools so long as they receive Government aid. And that clause is left intact in the Bill.

The catalogue of gains is thus a tolerably long one, and the advantages in prospect weigh heavily in the scale. When the Bill goes down to the House of Commons, there may be an inclination on the part of the Scotch members to resent the action of the Lords, and to give up the measure, with the view of carrying a more sweeping one next Session. But this would be most unwise. Scotland is nearer to a complete system of national education than she has ever been before, or is likely to be soon again. There is, no doubt, a corner of denominationalism left, but it is only a corner. If the Scotch members can make up their minds to accept and improve the mutilated measure, they will do good service to Scotland. What is left of denominationalism is, we repeat, merely a corner, and an arrangement may be effected between the Commons and the Lords which will reduce this corner to very limited dimensions. It is too early in the day to suggest what that arrangement should be. It will unfold itself in time. Meanwhile the people of Scotland will best show their appreciation of the services of Government on their behalf by leaving the matter in the hands of their leaders. And the Government and the Liberal party generally—the Irish members in particular—will best show their appreciation of the faithful support which Scotland has given them in the great measure of the Session, by returning the Bill as speedily as possible to the Lords, amended to some extent, but only to such extent as will not give the Upper House an excuse for throwing it overboard altogether.

THE SCIENCE OF BILL-STICKING.

A GENERATION has passed away since the time-honoured nuisance of London street-cries was put down by an Act of Parliament. In the consulship of Plancus, when Reform Bills and Irish Church Bills were young, and Mr. Coningsby was as yet an interesting youth at Eton, the discovery had not been made that streets and highways and places of public resort belonged to any one who chose to take possession of them, to make any use of them which might come into his head independently of his neighbour's convenience or taste. The costermongers and chimney-sweeps, and the general crowds of the itinerant trading community, were accordingly routed ignominiously, and something approaching to quiet was restored to the streets, for the benefit of their inhabitants and their passengers. We are very much inclined to wish for the old street-cries back again, if only by restoring them we could get rid of a modern and pervading annoyance which is very much worse than they were.

> Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem

and the vocal advertisement of the hawker or costermonger was far less acutely irritating than the analogous process of torture which has been invented for the eyesight of the present generation by his fellow-tradesman who boasts a shop in place of a barrow, and who pays his rates for a suburban villa as well as in the City, and protects his questionably honest wares behind half an acre of insured plate-glass. There is literally no escape from this tormentor with his staring, vulgar, hideous advertisements. And he has contrived, in the position which he occupies in the demi-monde of trade, to achieve the same kind of success which has attended the same impudent self-assertion by the demi-monde of society. He has made himself the fashion. A higher class of tradesmen has learnt first to envy, and then to imitate, the arts by which he has forced himself into notice. His influence has extended into the region where the commercial and the intellectual elements of modern life meet on common ground, and the press and the drama have vied with each other for pre-eminence in puffing vulgarity and bad taste. We are sorry to think that the system should be found to be a pecuniary success; but its promoters openly boast of it on the ground that it pays, and pays handsomely. This being the case, there is nothing for it but to put up with things as we find them, and to anticipate that the nuisance will assume larger proportions than it has done already. Such at least is the prospect presented to us by a writer in a "Monthly Magazine of Literature, Science, and Art," of which, though we find by its title-page that it has just completed the third year of its existence, we must frankly confess that we never heard till the current number was found in our letter-box a few days since. The "art" of this periodical is represented by a drawing of a small village church in Lincolnshire, which, if any of the lines had been either perpendicular or parallel, might have slightly resembled the original; and by a more accurate elevation of Aldgate Pump, which extends over the whole page of the cover. Its "literature" appears to consist, so far as we are able to judge, of rejected contributions to the Family Herald; and "science" is represented by an elaborate article, from the pen of a "talented writer," on the science of wall advertising in all its branches. The padding is made of pages of puffing by an advertising tailor, who announces himself as the "publisher" of this miscellany, which, in distant imitation of his betters, he calls the Aldgate.

We are grateful to the "talented writer" who instructs us in the science of bill-sticking for one ray of hope which he has afforded us in the future. He "believes that the advertisements in railway carriages will prove a complete failure." We sincerely hope that he may prove a true prophet in this respect at least, and that the prediction may not need the qualification which he has attached to it, that "those of the Metropolitan Railway may be an exception, as their occupants are so constantly changing." The Metropolitan Railway has forced the annoyance on its passengers in a more aggravating form than any other line. Excursionists in second and third-class carriages on the long country lines of traffic were, some years ago, constantly invited to study, on the sides of the compartments, what they might be attracted to see or to buy in a visit to London; but this practice has been generally abandoned, and in first-class carriages it was never adopted at all. It has been reserved for the Metropolitan Railway to thrust into all its carriages, without distinction, reiterated and staring puffs of worthless penny weeklies, and to turn its compartments into hoardings for advertising any rubbish which the purveyors choose to pay for. The practice of railway station advertising is, unfortunately, supposed to be both popular and profitable. The "talented writer" becomes perfectly enthusiastic in its praise. "Some trade placards I could mention are perfect works of art." "I consider the advertisements on the walls of a railway station a positive blessing to the intelligent passenger; and I do not doubt but that this mode of advertising, when judiciously and artistically accomplished, is highly remunerative to the speculator." A late Head of a House at Oxford is reported to have wound up an exhortation in the University pulpit by urging, as the crowning motive to diligence in the classical and philosophical studies of the place, that the undergraduate would thus be enabled to look down with a sublime contempt on the rest of his fellow-creatures; and an "intelligent passenger" may in this sense derive "a positive blessing" from the walls of a railway station, by contemplating the enormous mass of credulity and folly which must exist among his fellow-creatures in order to make such a display "remunerative" at all. "The most enlightened may learn something." Possibly; but the additional enlightenment which may thus be obtained upon the habits and mental condition of one's neighbours will only reveal what none but a cynic of peculiarly bitter temper would care to see. The "something to be learnt" will only be that an enormous amount of annual expenditure can be risked by trading capitalists, with a moral or immoral certainty that "it will be found to pay," on the assumed existence of a multitude of solvent householders capable of "freely admitting," as the writer in the East-end magazine does, "that I have often thought that I should like to give so-and-so a turn, because of their artistic pictures at the railway stations." The "artistic pictures" are known to have involved, in the first place, a "tremendous printer's bill," and next an "exorbitant outlay" for the rent of wall-space; and as all this expense must in the end be paid for by the customer who "gives so-and-so a turn," the benefit to be derived must lie in some compensating advantage to the customer so taxed. We may presume that the first and most obvious form in which this advantage may present itself to what the customer "is pleased to call his mind" may be the hope that, in his personal appearance or in his social surroundings, he may be raised to the level of the humanity which his advertising art-teachers offer as a standard. He looks forward to the day when he and his sons may see themselves reflected in the glass of the cheap tailor's pictures of men and boys. He wishes to resemble the figure reclining in luxurious ease on some patented iron couch, or standing before a looking-glass in an impossible shirt. He would like his wife and daughters to rival the graceful creations which are staring through shop-windows at violent domestic interiors, representing "a drawing-room completely furnished," or "a bedroom, with every luxury, in this style." His ideas of family life in its festival hours of refined enjoyment are trying to reach the level of a wedding-breakfast gathering, portrayed on the walls which attract his reverential gaze, and he hopes at some distant day to be "admitted to an equal sky" with these favoured beings. All this may be quite in accordance with the facts of society, and it may be very desirable that we should know among what manner of men we are living; but still it is not pleasant to be assured that, at least in the judgment of advertisers, the great majority of our fellow-travellers look on these pictured Yahoos with feelings of distant admiration. Neither is it altogether pleasant to be told, as every railway traveller—and, for the matter of that, every man who ventures into the streets—is being told perpetually, that a considerable section of his neighbours and fellow-citizens consider him to be an absolute fool. He is supposed not to be able to retain an idea in his head for half a minute at a time. A tea-tray nailed on a wall has just urged him to seek political wisdom by the purchase of the Rattle, price one farthing; and he cannot stir a hundred yards without being importuned by more tea-trays in the very same words. It is assumed, moreover, that he is such an idiot that he will be more impressed by letters a yard in height than by characters of twelve inches; and that a statement of which one copy only catches his eye at a time will be much less credible or convincing than one which is repeated twenty or a hundred times together on the walls of the same building. The recent general election afforded a conspicuous illustration of the undisguised contempt with which the British public as a body was regarded, at least in the metropolitan boroughs, by men whom we must assume to have been capable of forming a sound judgment on the matter. On no previous occasion had the stupid and senseless practice of covering the walls with the mere names of candidates assumed the dimensions in which it appeared last autumn. The gentlemen who gave their names and their money to this ridiculous display must have counted the cost, and found their profit in the assumed capacity of the minds which they desired to influence; and, all political considerations apart, it must be regarded as matter for great satisfaction that the most daring of all these speculators on the folly of electors, who had gambled on the event in the most extravagant manner, met with the most ignominious and deserved failure

The professors of the science of bill-sticking are so enraptured with the result of its application in the case of railway stations that they see no limit to its future development. "Hoardings," twenty years hence, "will bring in improved and increased rents, instead of houses." It would be but the shallowest scepticism to object to this prophecy that the absence of houses might be unfavourable to the presence of customers. Already "the rude wooden hoarding just placed at a trifling cost in the Strand," enclosing the Carey Street site for the Law Courts, "is bringing in to its proprietors and renters a sum nearly equal to the ground-rent of the property which formerly stood there." We hope that some metropolitan member, happy in the result of his own bill-sticking experiences, will take care to impress this fact on Mr. Lowe, whose objection to give a Strand front to the new Law Courts will vanish at once when he realizes the fact that the front of a public building in a leading thoroughfare will already bring in a sum sufficient to pay the interest on the cost of the site, and "twenty years hence," probably, the interest on the whole outlay. Private persons may reap the immediate advantage of this discovery. It may be some years before the river front of the Houses of Parliament is let to Mr. Shepherd or to Messrs. Willing and Co., and meanwhile we may all make our harvest. A good placard, "costing from five to ten guineas in the first getting up, and a guinea or so for posting," is worth "an annual rental of four or five guineas" for its suitable display. "As a hint to the exploring house-hunter," our "talented writer" therefore "would say, never hesitate about the rent of a good corner-house, but take it on a long lease, and then go directly to some of the largest advertisers in London, and negotiate with them for its exterior to receive their announcements."

The next step of course will be, that owners of house property and their agents will learn the inestimable advantages of "going to some of the largest advertisers in London," and "negotiating" for a similar decoration of their domestic interiors. It is not given to every one to be the happy proprietor of a "corner-house." But every house has more or less of interior surface, and requires more or less of paint or of "wall-paper" to adorn it. The Metropolitan Railway has done its best to prepare the way for such an artistic treatment of our entrance-halls and drawing-rooms by setting the example with our first-class carriages, and we presume that, when the proper time arrives for its general adoption in the interests of trade, we must make up our minds to accept it. But as a panic among advertisers is not an altogether impossible phenomenon, and as two or three conspicuous failures would go far to bring it about, we may yet live in hope that some of the invaders of our railway-stations and wall-frontages, for whom the professors of advertising science express the most profound respect, may, even in our own time, to use the graphic expression of our "talented writer," "whatever their capital may have been, topple head over heels into the Bankruptcy Court." It is useless to appeal to public taste for the abatement of a growing nuisance; but even an advertising tradesman has in his organization one sensitive part—his pocket.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

THE success of the Exhibition proves to be fully as great as we anticipated. The public have, in numbers beyond precedent, shown approval of the handsome rooms, and appreciation of the Exhibition, which by common consent is considerably above the average. Such has been the concourse of visitors, that the new rooms, though of an area nearly double the old, are so crowded that favourite pictures can with difficulty be seen at all. In the first week the number of visitors amounted to over 31,000, an average of more than 5,000 per day; at which rate the total, by the end of the season, may reach 403,000. This indicates that the takings at the door will be in excess of 20,000*l.*, to which may probably be added 5,000*l.* on sale of catalogues, making a total of, say, 25,000*l.* as the year's receipts in the new building. How greatly the fortunes of the Academy are improved by the change may be judged from a return which states that "the average receipts from the Exhibition for seven years, from 1853 to 1859, was 7,801*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*" Again, when we reach 1864, we find the following entry:—"The receipts of the Royal Academy have this year been enormous, amounting to 12,384*l.*, which is upwards of 2,000*l.* more than has ever before been taken. The extraordinary number of 57,000 catalogues was sold at the door." Thus the preceding data would seem to indicate that this season the receipts may double the above maximum of 12,384*l*, which, as we have seen, was designated at the time "enormous." There appears, then, good reason to believe that the new Academy will prove financially a brilliant success, and, if successful financially, many other fine things may ensue. Thus at the dinner Sir Francis Grant spoke as follows:—

> It will now be no longer necessary for us to accumulate our funds. I hope, therefore, it will be in our power largely to increase our hitherto not inconsiderable charities to our poorer and less fortunate brethren, and that we shall be able in future, with open-handed generosity, to support every effort for the benefit and promotion of art in this country.

In the Great Room have been mustered the efficient forces of the Academy, with the addition of some few veteran members who might do well to retire from active service as hors de combat. This grand Gallery, in the presence of twenty-six Academicians, thirteen Associates, and forty-one outsiders, contains as it were a summary of the entire Exhibition. Last week we commenced with Sir Edwin Landseer's sensational "Swannery"; we will now turn to a picture holding a distinctive position on the opposite wall—"King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid"—an eminently characteristic work by Mr. Maclise, R.A. This English ballad is often referred to by our old dramatic writers. Shakspeare makes mention of the story in three of his plays. The poem is given at length in Percy's Reliques, and Mr. Tennyson penned a picture almost identical with the one before us, under the title of the "Beggar Maid":—

> Her arms across her breast she laid;
> She was more fair than words can say;
> Bare-footed came the beggar maid
> Before the King Cophetua.
> In robe and crown the King stept down,
> To meet and greet her on her way;
> "It is no wonder," said the lords,
> "She is more beautiful than day."

Mr. Maclise's picture is black and metallic; the flesh is not flesh, but leather; the drawing seeks power by the swelling of muscles; the composition is crowded, almost confused. Yet these are but the well-known characteristics of a painter grand in his mannerism. And this work is grand unquestionably; if the shadows are black, they are portentous of mystery; if the execution is hard, it gains as its end marvellous realism. The picture has undoubted power. Also it may be conceded that the "Beggar Maid" is a bright creation; "she is more beautiful than day."

This Great Gallery is not distinguished by greatness or largeness of manner. Historic pictures are at a discount; religious art scarcely exists; academic styles are extinct. Yet two artists—Mr. Poole, R.A., and Mr. Poynter, A.R.A.—have illustrated the story of the Prodigal Son. Mr. Poole's picture the French would designate as belonging to the genre of religious art. The point in the parable chosen is indicated by the text, "How many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger." The poor Prodigal lies prone upon the ground, and the flocks by his side are in a plight as pitiable as himself. The artist has drawn and painted so ill a herd of goats (by the way, should they not be swine?) that they too seem ready to perish with hunger; in fact, little more than hair and skin is left of them. Mr. Poole is proverbial for inattention to drawing; indeed he has not cared to paint the crescent moon truly; and yet the picture is fine as a conception, the landscape is painted with large suggestion, and, as usual with this painter, the work possesses rare quality in colour. Mr. Poynter's picture comes as a contrast; the landscape and surroundings are subordinate to the figures, and the style is less romantic or picturesque than academic and traditional. Mr. Poole has taken the time when the Prodigal was in the fields; Mr. Poynter when the outcast returned to his home and fell on his father's neck. A sketch for the picture appeared recently in the Dudley Gallery. This young painter of singular promise has not yet settled his style, and perhaps he will be wise to hold a tentative attitude for some little time longer. To contract a mannerism at an early age is the fatality of narrow minds; to be widely eclectic over the period of maturing powers gives best promise for the ultimate future. Mr. Poynter has seldom shown himself so directly academic, so closely allied to Italian schools; this picture indeed recalls the traditional types, draperies, and treatments of Mr. Dyce. Mr. Poynter has recently made a pilgrimage to Italy, and thus he may have gone to the originals whence Mr. Dyce derived his studious manner. In elucidation of these praiseworthy pictures by a venerable Academician and a youthful Associate, it may be interesting to refer to the abundant illustration of the parable which the history of art affords. Thus, among the painters who have selected this eminently popular theme are the following—Bassano, Annibale Carracci, Guercino, Murillo, Albert Durer, Salvator Rosa, Rubens, Teniers, Holbein, and Jan Steen. It was scarcely to be expected that our two English artists could add much that was new to the great storehouse of historic art, yet is it always instructive to observe how the same incidents are handled by different artists in distant epochs. Mrs. Jameson has a passage which may induce us to esteem all the more highly the effort here made to follow in the footsteps of the great masters:—

> We can [writes this discriminative critic] easily understand how the parable of the Prodigal Son became more popular as a subject in art than any of the others. As related in the simple words and with the divinely persuasive tenderness of the Redeemer, it touches every heart. Taken in its mystic sense, it is a lesson of faith and hope; in its more obvious sense, it is a lesson of hope and charity.

We shall not presume to do justice to this "Salon d'Honneur" within the compass of a single article. For the sake of picturesque grouping it may be convenient to take as a class several painters known under the designation of the St John's Wood school. Why St. John's Wood should have a school, and what may be the distinctive characteristics of that school, it might be difficult to understand or to define. But just as at Kensington and in the precincts of Holland Park there is one nucleus of painters, and in the districts about Notting Hill, Westbourne, and the Regent's Park there are other homesteads of art, so among the suburban villas on the way to the Swiss Cottage have nestled together a quiet social coterie of painters, who may be somewhat too wide for a clique and yet scarcely sufficiently indoctrinated with ideas to constitute a school. Among the number may be named Mr. Armitage, Mr. Calderon, Mr. Leslie, Mr. Yeames, Mr. Marks, Mr. Hodgson, Mr Storey, and Mr. Wynfield, all present in the Academy. The Mentor of this so-called school is Mr. Armitage, who brings traditions from the atelier of Delaroche. The academic style thus consolidated—a manner sufficiently defiant of English prejudices—may be judged by a life-size nude figure, "Hero Lighting the Beacon to guide Leander across the Hellespont." The figure holds its position in this large room with command, yet it is perhaps more distinguished for power than for grace, for form than for colour; and thus it tells of its antecedents in the foreign school which twenty years ago was studious of drawing, and somewhat indifferent to the harmony of colour. As a contrast, it may be instructive to call to mind M. Cabanel's voluptuous Venus, now in the French Gallery, Pall Mall. The "Hero" of Mr. Armitage has the advantage of purity of motive. Altogether this somewhat exceptional effort merits encouragement. If in St. John's Wood Mr. Armitage takes the department of high art, on Mr. Calderon devolves the more popular task of doing the romantic, as may be seen in that brilliant composition which bears the supremely sentimental title "Sighing his Soul into his Lady's Face." It is much to say that Mr. Calderon has got through this perilous subject and situation without committing himself to anything weak or mawkish. It may perhaps be objected that the young fellow painted in the act of sighing his soul away wears so much the mien of inferiority as to be actually mistaken by some for an over-presumptuous boatman. The picture is saved by the presence of the lady—a heroine worthy of romantic story; she glides in the boat gracefully along, as a swan floating on still waters, conscious of queen-like beauty. The colouring just escapes showiness; the effect is forced up, and yet kept down. We fancy that the deep shadow in the wood may be rather opaque and black, but the treatment is intentionally broad and decisive, and so much brilliance can scarcely be got except at the cost of strong contrast. This is Mr. Calderon's best picture; his figure in tempera among the water-colours some have deemed crude, even coarse. Mr. Leslie, like Mr. Calderon, though in somewhat different mood, surrenders himself—amid the sunshine of St. John's Wood, toned down by fog and smoke from the adjacent metropolis—to youthful romance, and a fine haze of reverie. "Celia's Arbour" must indeed be a delicious retreat in a sultry summer day. How prettily does the sunlight glance through the leaves, play among the roses and upon the grass, while Celia herself stands under shelter of half shade! The picture, indeed, is exquisite as a study of tender tones; light enters the shadow, and shade moderates the sunshine. The sentiment is that of dreaminess and half-awakening, an effect which the artist has tried before. The style seems necessarily circumscribed in range, and the artist may find it hard to resist the usual temptation to confirm a mannerism when loudly applauded; but, having done one sort of thing supremely well, there seems no reason why he should not prove equally fortunate when he may next vary his sphere. We turn to Mr. Yeames, a careful, thoughtful painter, who has for some years, with most honourable intentions, been paying his addresses to the Muse of History. The page in the annals of the past to which he now turns may perhaps scarcely possess the dignity to which history is supposed to incline; to hide away a "fugitive Jacobite" in a chimney evidently involves pictorial episodes which might claim favour less with the Muse of History than of Comedy. However, we must frankly admit that we have seldom met with more steady painting, more studious care in composition, more thought in the balance of colours, or in the blending of light with shade. The actors wear in their faces an alarm befitting so awkward a situation, the characters are well thought out, and the story, such as it is, has been told with circumstantial verisimilitude. The old house was evidently made on purpose for historic events of this import; the chimney must have been designed to receive a Jacobite. On the whole we admire the skill of the painter more than we can commend the choice of his subject.

Our remarks have been directed to the Great Gallery because here are the representative works by which our contemporary art may be judged. We reserve portraits, landscapes, and foreign schools, upon each of which we may possibly find space to speak. All who possess the catalogue will do well to consult the ground plan of the galleries, otherwise their ideas may run into confusion. Let us conclude by a digression into the two rooms which lead on left and right from the grand Salon wherein we have hitherto made our observations. A total of ten galleries appear on the plan, though more are present in the building. We will turn to Gallery No. II., which lies on the Piccadilly side. The room is weaker than some others, yet the hangers, with a proper desire to maintain equilibrium throughout, have here managed to comprise many capital works; among the masters represented are Mr. Orchardson, A.R.A., Mr. Lewis, R.A., Mr. Storey, Mr. Archer, Mr. Peter Graham, Mr. Leader, Mr. Crowe, Mr. Wynfield, and Mr. Marks. We may hope to speak of each in turn, but having already dealt with the so-called St. John's Wood school, we turn to "The Minstrels' Gallery," by Mr. Marks, an artist whom the Academy must soon add to its effective forces. Mr. Marks has made for himself, over a series of years, a position singular and almost without rival. He has shown himself as a wit, he has indulged in the grotesque, often under guise of mediævalism, and yet he has never touched the low buffoonery of cartoons which find place and notoriety in so-called comic periodicals. Within the sphere of the ridiculous Mr. Marks has moved with a dignity and decorum all but academic. We have sometimes deemed it singular that, with the amazing growth of comedy in a certain department of literature which relies less upon verbal than on visual or pictorial wit, the Academy contains so little, and that usually of second-rate order, which can provoke a laugh. Yet we need not say that the interval is great between the training needed merely to knock off a sketchy cartoon, and that required to carry out in oils a picture fitted for a place in the chief exhibition of the land. Hence Mr. Marks finds few competitors. His present work, "The Minstrels' Gallery," is less comic than heretofore; moreover the artist has now mitigated the harshness and dryness which he seems to have deemed conducive to that decorum which it is proper to maintain, at least within the Academy, amid the laughter that it has been his pleasure to provoke. Still Mr. Marks must take his fling somehow, and it is amusing to know how he has sought to reflect upon the musicians the characteristics of the instruments wherewith they are identified. Thus, he who bears the thundering drum has a pate empty as his instrument, while he who sports the organ's bellows grand, to "swell the soul to rage or kindle soft desire," shows a fine eye for frenzy. Fancy or conceit might, we believe, sport further at the expense of these musicians, from the feeble fiddler with shaky spider legs to the hack musician strong enough to take any part at a moment's notice. We may, in fine, observe that Mr. Marks has almost originated the art which he sustains from year to year without serious rivalry.

From Gallery No. II. we cross over to its vis-à-vis, Gallery No. IV., in order to illustrate how much "outsiders" have gained by the new building. At the private view we noted a quiet, earnest, pathetic picture by Mr. F. Holl—a young artist comparatively little known; the only title in the catalogue was the text, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." Crowds have since gathered before this home made desolate by death. The mother has been buried, and the orphan children for the first time assemble around the humble and scanty board. The son, a pastor, stands to say grace, a sister is bowed by sorrow, the old nurse is bereft of her charge; the household, worn by watching, sinks under the stroke of death; it is a scene for tears. The artist's treatment is as simple as the sentiment is unaffected; the colour is pitched in solemn grey, and the execution tells the tale literally without an effort to exaggerate a single fact. Mr. Holl, who has recently obtained the travelling studentship of the Academy, seems, in common with some other among our younger artists, to have taken a lesson from Continental schools. He may have marked how much of truth and of moving pathos lies in simple scenes, quiet in colour and shadowy in broken light, as painted by M. Frere, M. Breton, and M. Israels. Such reciprocities between English and foreign schools will henceforth extend. Our immediate purpose, however, is to point out that painters distinguished by talent may now almost for the first time make their merits patent to the world. On the other hand, it is a painful fact that, as we stated a week ago, upwards of three thousand works have been rejected under the plea of want of space. A measure thus almost without parallel has naturally provoked retaliation.

Accordingly the public are informed that out of these Rejected Addresses will be shortly constituted a "Select Supplementary Exhibition of Pictures." We will not prejudge the result, but it may be remembered that once upon a time the French Emperor in vengeance commanded the public exhibition of all the works excluded from the Salon. We incline to the opinion that our English Academy, like the great French Salon, is strong enough to bear up against the opposition which even its indiscretions may provoke.

REVIEWS.

NEWLY RECOVERED WRITINGS OF DEFOE.*

A RECENT discovery has been the means not only of adding a new chapter to the history of Defoe, but of bringing about little less than a revolution in the estimate in which his character has been popularly held. The thanks of the public are due to Mr. Lee for the pains with which he has followed the clue thus unexpectedly afforded. His own partiality or admiration makes him indeed scarcely sensible of the havoc which his revelations must inevitably play with the reputation of his idol. He would otherwise hardly have ceased from his labours with so complacent an impression that he had removed every stain and speck from the surface of the image. Nevertheless, whatever critical value we may attach to his judgment in this respect, there can be no two opinions as to the importance of the materials which his industry and zeal have placed at our disposal. It has generally been taken for granted, on the authority of the biographers of Defoe, that for seventeen years before his death he had altogether retired from the political world. Having stood for a whole generation in the foremost rank of polemics, he was supposed to have spent the remainder of his years in peaceful literary seclusion, absorbed in the composition of the works of fiction which have made his name famous throughout the world. An accidental discovery has done much to fill up this hiatus in the career of this most indefatigable of writers. Half a dozen letters unexpectedly came to light, in Defoe's handwriting, in the State Paper Office, four years ago. They were all seemingly addressed to Charles De la Fay, Esq., of the Secretary of State's Office. Of their genuineness there appears to be no doubt. Their dates range from the 12th of April to the 13th of June, 1718, and they demonstrate conclusively that the political life of Defoe had not closed at that period. These letters, on their discovery, appeared in the London Review, forming the text for some disparaging reflections on the character and conduct of Defoe. They were subsequently reprinted in Notes and Queries, at the instance of Mr. William Lee, by whom they were followed up in a series of articles, pointing out the historical and political bearing of these new facts in the writer's career, and vindicating the morality of his conduct. With these materials at his command, it is not surprising that, to the mind of so ardent an admirer of Defoe's genius, there should have appeared at once "the occasion for an entirely new chapter in the History of Defoe's Life and Times." Not only was a clear light thrown upon a point hitherto dimly apprehended, viz., the nature of Defoe's secret or official employment under the Government, but also upon the fact of his connexion with several political journals, and his authorship of many pamphlets not before suspected to be his. Mr. Lee's attention was immediately drawn to the serial publications upon which Defoe had thus avowedly engaged himself—namely, Mercurius Politicus, Dormer's News-Letter, and Mist's Weekly Journal. He was thence led to extend his investigations to others of Defoe's hitherto unknown journalistic writings. Travelling, with the aid of the clue thus attained, over the general field of newspaper and pamphlet literature spread over fifty years, he has succeeded in identifying and collecting a series of essays, letters, and articles from the fertile pen of this great writer, amounting, after much selection and omission, to upwards of three hundred and fifty. These he has now had printed in two octavo volumes of goodly size. He has omitted much of a transitory or personal character that might have illustrated the political history of the period, from a belief that "party contention would not necessarily be acceptable merely because it had been written by Defoe." His extracts are, consequently, more historical than political. Their contents are highly miscellaneous, both in style and subject—imaginative, humorous, amatory, ironical, religious, and moral. Writing, as Defoe did, on topics of popular interest as they daily arose, there is, as his editor fairly urges, a peculiar freshness in the author's relation of incidents, and his comments thereon. Articles and narratives are accumulated here in the most graphic and charming style—on the Rebellion of 1715 and the subsequent proceedings of the Pretender and his adherents, on commerce and trade, the South Sea scheme and the bursting of the bubble, with other epidemic economical and social delusions; on the plague in France, and on offences political and criminal, with their punishment. Interspersed throughout will be found a multitude of anecdotes, answers to correspondents, and scraps of current news, all eminently characteristic of the writer's mental fertility and sense of humour. The notices and advertisements of new books or pamphlets in these newspapers furnished a key to the exact dates when the greater part of his works, whether acknowledged or not, were written. Thus the catalogue of Defoe's writings had to be revised throughout. The new list included by Mr. Lee in his first volume may be pronounced by far the most exhaustive and trustworthy that has ever been compiled, both with respect to the authenticity of each piece and its place in order of chronology. From the list in Lowndes Mr. Lee seems to reject more than sixty; from that prefixed by Mr. Wilson to his Life of Defoe, thirty, including three duplicates with altered titles—a common habit with Defoe—entered by him as distinct works. From Mr. Hazlitt's series of works, believed by him to be genuine, twelve have been rejected, while seven which he had conceived to be spurious have been retained. The entire number finally included amounts to two hundred and fifty separate works. Other writings of Defoe may very possibly, his editor thinks, be yet discovered. But Mr. Lee is entitled by his diligent and critical researches to believe that his catalogue as now corrected and supplemented is, as far as it goes, correct. These additional facts in the history of Defoe, together with the correction of standing errors as regards much of his voluminous literary labour, could only find their proper cohesion and unity in a totally new and connected memoir of the author; and to this undertaking Mr. Lee has accordingly addressed himself, with praiseworthy fulness as respects each stage of his idol's private life or every feat of his intellectual power, but with irreparable, though involuntary, damage to his reputation for candour or simple honesty.

It is strange that Toland's charge against Defoe of writing the monthly journal, Mercurius Politicus, should never have been regarded as a clue to be followed up by the biographers of Defoe. That paper was not commenced till the year 1716. Yet so fixed was the idea that Defoe had ceased from political writing a year before, that even Mr. Lee had followed the habit of "summarily rejecting all pamphlets of later date offered him by booksellers as Defoe's." The second of the letters to Mr. De la Fay not only establishes the fact of his connexion with that and other periodicals, but also the exact circumstances under which Defoe engaged himself as a tool of the Government. As early as 1707 Defoe, it is well known, had taken secret service under Harley, to whom he had been introduced after his Western tour and his telling defence of the Queen and the Ministry. A couple of letters now first printed from the original MSS. in the British Museum throw further light upon this point. Defoe here thanks his benefactor for the "exceeding bounty" he has recently received. Frankly acknowledging that he does not see the merit which his "unknown rewarders are pleased to value in his mean performances," he professes that the most he wishes, and which he hopes to answer for, is that he shall always preserve the "homely, despicable title of an honest man." These words seem almost ironical when read in the light of the contract which we find him entering into with Lord Townshend's government seven years later. It requires partiality or partisanship as strong as Mr. Lee's to state calmly, and even to defend from the faintest censure, the terms of this engagement. Acting secretly in the capacity, if not under the title, of Censor of the Public Journals, Defoe was yet to maintain, as heretofore, his relations with publishers and political organs, though "the world was not to be informed of this fact, but still consider him under displeasure, and separated from the Whigs." Defoe had, our readers will not need to be reminded, just been discharged by Chief Justice Parker from further proceedings in reference to his trial before the Court of King's Bench for a paper in the Flying Post. His biographer is unable to discover, either in the letters now brought to light or elsewhere, "any condition or stipulation, direct or indirect, that he should ever write a single word contrary to his conscience or to the principles which had directed his whole life," nor has he "found that he ever did so." His labours under such engagement will, it is thought, "by the present publication be made more capable of appreciation, and entitle him, irrespective of his many other claims, to the gratitude and admiration of posterity." Yet what was the nature of this pure and meritorious service? It was thought, his panegyrist mildly puts it, that he would be "better able to counteract the designs of disaffected journalists, and be more serviceable, than by appearing openly in support of the Government. The object was to prevent treasonable publications, by intercepting them before they reached the press, and by deleting that which was contrary to law, rather than (after the poison had been diffused throughout the nation) punishing the miserable printers and publishers, without being able to take hold of the writers." But an extract from the second of Defoe's own letters will best explain the nature of the work he had set himself to do:—

> In considering, after this, which Way I might be rendered most useful to the Government; it was proposed by my Lord Townshend that I should still appear as if I were, as before, under the displeasure of the Government, and separated from the Whigs, and that I might be more serviceable in a kind of Disguise, than if I appeared openly; and upon this Foot a weekly Paper, which I was at first directed to write, in opposition to a scandalous Paper called the Shift Shifted, was laid aside, and the first Thing I engaged in, was a monthly Book called Mercurius Politicus, of which presently. In the interval of this, Dyer, the News-Letter-writer, having been dead, and Dormer his successor, being unable by his Troubles to carry on that Work; I had an offer of a Share in the Property, as well as in the Management of that Work.
> I immediately acquainted my Lord Townshend of it, who, by Mr. Buckley, let me know it would be a very acceptable Piece of Service; for that Letter was really very prejudicial to the Public, and the most difficult to come at in a judicial Way in Case of Offence given. My Lord was pleased to add, by Mr. Buckley, that he would consider my Service in that Case, as he afterwards did.

* Daniel Defoe: his Life and Recently Discovered Writings, extending from 1716 to 1729. By William Lee. 3 vols. London: J. C. Hotten. 1869.

Upon this I engaged in it; and that so far, that though the Property was not wholly my own, yet the Conduct and Government of the Style and News was so entirely in me, that I ventured to assure his Lordship the Sting of that mischievous Paper should be entirely taken out, though it was granted that the Style should continue Tory, as it was, that the Party might be amused, and not set up another, which would have destroyed the Design: And this Part I therefore take entirely on myself still.

This went on for a Year, before my Lord Townshend went out of the Office; and his Lordship, in Consideration of this Service, made me the Appointment which Mr. Buckley knows of, with promise of a further Allowance as Service presented.

My Lord Sunderland, to whose Goodness I had many Years ago been obliged, when I was in a secret Commission sent to Scotland, was pleased to approve and continue this Service, and the Appointment annexed; and, with his Lordship's Approbation, I introduced myself, in the Disguise of a Translator of the Foreign News, to be so far concerned in this weekly Paper of Mist's, as to be able to keep it within the Circle of a secret Management, also prevent the mischievous Part of it; and yet neither Mist, or any of those concerned with him, have the least Guess or Suspicion by whose Direction I do it.

But here it becomes necessary to acquaint my Lord (as I hinted to you, Sir), that this Paper, called the Journal, is not in myself in Property, as the other, only in Management; with this express difference, that if anything happens to be put in without my Knowledge, which may give Offence, or if anything slips my Observation which may be ill taken, his Lordship shall be sure always to know whether he has a Servant to reprove, or a Stranger to correct.

Upon the whole, however, this is the Consequence, that by this Management, the Weekly Journal, and Dormer's Letter, as also the Mercurius Politicus, which is in the same Nature of Management as the Journal, will be always kept (Mistakes excepted) to pass as Tory Papers, and yet be disabled and enervated, so as to do no Mischief, or give any Offence to the Government.

It must be said that Defoe found himself by no means easy in mind under the burden of this dirty work. He more than once speaks of it as "bowing in the House of Rimmon." "I am, Sir," he complains, "posted among Papists, Jacobites, and enraged High Tories, a generation who [sic] I profess my very soul abhors. I am obliged to hear traitorous expressions and outrageous words against His Majesty's person and his most faithful servants, and smile at it all as if I approved it." He is often "obliged to let things pass which are not a little shocking, that he may not render himself suspected," and he is possessed with a fear lest he may be "undone the sooner the more faithfully he executes the commands he is under." He sends at the same time "one of the letters stopped at the press." Of the MS. of "Sultan Galza, another villanous paper," he had sent a copy to Lord Sunderland, and offers the original if it can be of any service. In the third letter he is "much concerned that the Journal has copied from the Post Boy that ridiculous paragraph of the Pretender's being in the list of the Queen Dowager's legitimate children." "It is my duty to assure you, my Lord," he protests, "that I have no part in this slip, but that Mr. Mist did it, after I had looked over what he had gathered together, which it seems was not sufficient." And though he would, "if he may presume so far, intercede for him," yet he dwells upon the pains he is at "that if any mistake happened, my Lord should always know whether he had a servant to reprove or a stranger to punish." For seven years the unfortunate Mist remained in the dark as to the secret service carried on by his colleague and seeming friend, during which time we cannot doubt the Government was kept posted up with the most minute particulars which Defoe's connexion with the press placed at his command. It is true that we find Defoe making a great show of his care to screen his publisher from consequences, or to restrain him from rushing into snares or perils. In Applebee's Journal he even inserts, December 12, 1724, the precursor of a series of letters on Friendship, in which he expatiates, all but by name, upon the kindness Mist had received at his hands, and his ingratitude in return. "Save a thief from the gallows," he bitterly exclaims, "and he will cut your throat." It may not have been Defoe's official delation that brought the luckless Mist to prison in November, 1718, but at least no good offices of his friends availed to save him. The only result was the secession of Defoe for a while from the Journal, to be followed by a re-engagement in January, 1719, Mist being kept as before in ignorance of the Government contract. The poor wretch was brought in 1720 to the pillory, and four years later fined 100*l.*, and sent to prison for a year. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was the discovery of the secret, while under the stress of prosecution, which prompted the revengeful attack by Mist upon Defoe. Mr. Lee seems to us to have clearly made out this fact. He is at the same time strangely blind to any default on the side of his hero, and solely alive to the baseness and ingratitude of Mist. It certainly shows generosity and forbearance on the part of Defoe that he spared the life of his assailant, whom he had disarmed and wounded, and was the first to run for a surgeon to attend him. This first attack of Mist's was followed up by a blow of a different kind, all the journals being leagued together through his instrumentality to close their columns against communications from Defoe. Such a step was in some respects analogous to what we understand to have been a recent resolution of the Parisian Société des Hommes de Lettres, excluding from their body any gentleman connected with the censorship of the press. Mr. Lee is probably right in tracing to the same vindictive hand the blow which finally shattered Defoe's peace of mind, and hastened his death. The "wicked, perjured, and contemptible enemy" who drove him into concealment, and to whom he attributes his ruin, was, in all likelihood, no other than Mist, who had fled abroad, and who is known to have consorted with the Duke of Wharton and other heads of the Jacobite clique. The possession of documents written by Defoe, or the knowledge of facts in his career, might be skilfully used to compromise him with the Government, and threaten his fortune and safety. His letter to Mr. Baker, his son-in-law, is shown to bear out this surmise, while affording much reason for his biographer's suggestion that Defoe's intellect had given way under the ensuing anxiety and fright. There seems to have been no real cause for the gloomy picture therein drawn of the ruin of his family and himself. Defoe, we are glad to find from Mr. Lee's praiseworthy researches, died in fair circumstances. We could wish that his political morality or private honour came out as favourably from the imputations cast on it through this lifting of the veil from the closing scenes of his career. What his genius may hereby gain from the admiring voices of posterity will be more than compensated by the verdict of condemnation that must needs be passed upon the mean and underhand use made of such powers. Another melancholy instance is afforded of the possible degradation of the mightiest and most varied gifts of intellect to ends and means the most ignoble.

PARIS IN 1794 AND 1795.*

IT is difficult to write a satisfactory notice of a book that is, what this professes to be, mainly a compilation. To do justice to its contents one ought to quote a full half of them. M. Dauban has devoted himself to the illustration of the times of the Revolution, and his present volume reproduces the Paris of 1794, "photographed"—to use his own expression—from contemporary documents. The main sources of his extracts are in the formal reports submitted to the revolutionary authorities by the "observateurs de l'esprit public." Those spies of the State played an important part under the Government of the Terror. It was their function to follow the fluctuations of public feeling in passing events, and reproduce them faithfully for the guidance of the demagogues who were governed by the sovereign populace they affected to rule. It is curious to mark the different styles in which these reports are couched. Now you have the laboured production of a man who carefully elaborates his phrases, and delights to moralize in lofty language over sordid details. Now you come on another, which in vile orthography and vulgar idioms reproduces in its original coarseness the slang of the halles and the faubourgs. And all reflect the Paris of the period with a force and fidelity that makes fiction of the most eloquent pages of recognised historians. But M. Dauban does not confine himself to these, and we have what we might almost call autobiographies of the clubs and committees—of the presiding spirits of the Mountain, of the orators of the Jacobins and Cordeliers. In fact, the men of the Revolution tell its story, and M. Dauban merely gives continuity to his extracts, with some occasional pages of his own. The judgment with which he has made his selections is vindicated by their sustained interest. The harshest criticism to which the book lays itself open is that the author keeps himself too systematically in the background. That is doubtless a fault on the right side; but when M. Dauban writes at all, he writes so much to the purpose, catches points so clearly, and indicates character so fairly, that one wishes he had cast the book in a different shape, and prepared and commented a voluminous appendix, with a continuous original narrative. His prologue distinguishes between democracy and demagogism. In the pages of Aristophanes he reads the history of Athens under the rule of the Athenian demagogues, and finds it repeat itself in the Paris of 1794–95. Selfishness and self-seeking are the invariable guiding principle in the one as in the other, utterly fatal to statesmanship or stable government. The first aim of the demagogue is to distract the people, at any cost, from seriously dwelling on their sufferings; to divert their minds from real causes to fanciful ones. He panders to the popular passions, and devises the system of appeasing them with human sacrifices—a system sure sooner or later to react on himself. In Paris, for example, the demagogues affected to ignore the physical causes of the famine altogether. They converted it into a weapon of faction warfare, being too short-sighted to see that accusation begets recrimination, and that in striking others they might kill themselves. M. Dauban believes in a well-regulated democracy, as the most perfect of human governments. But the moral of his narrative is that, under the Convention, republican institutions never had a fair trial; that, with public men of such character and with such objects, anything but execrable administration was an impossibility; while their execrable administration made the counter-revolution and the coup d'état of Brumaire inevitable. The original title of the book was La Rue, le Club et la Prison, but M. Dauban found that to dwell on the history of the last would have swelled his volume so much that he decided to reserve it for a separate one. The famine, which not merely aggravated, but did so much to create the miseries of those unhappy times, forced its way to the front in all his researches; while it is needless to say that, although he does not introduce us personally into the prisons, at each step as we follow him we may hear the clash of the irons and catch glimpses of their wearers through the bars.

The observers of the state of public feeling were omnipresent. They glided among the crowds that mobbed the doors of butchers and bakers. They sat eavesdropping in the wine-shops. They attended the popular gatherings, they reported the proceedings of the clubs; and if their reports show one thing more clearly than another, it is that the hardening, demoralizing influence of the famine on the people, the share it had in the course of events, has received anything but sufficient attention. The mob was hungry and savage. Always on the verge of death by starvation themselves, they became naturally reckless of human life. Persuaded that all their sufferings were owing to the aristocrats or the foreigners, that they were surrounded with traitors to the Republic and emissaries of Pitt, as they saw tumbril-loads of victims pass on to the guillotine, they glutted their vengeance with scarcely a lingering emotion of pity, with barely a shadow of remorse. Their primitive notions of the inalienable rights of man, their rude ideas of political economy, the practical suggestions of some of the thinking observers, would excite a smile if the ignorance of the people was not so melancholy and their misery so real. But it is inexpressibly shocking to see them fooled by their responsible directors to the top of their bent, by men who studied the fancies of the dregs of Paris solely to humour them. One man is consigned summarily to prison because thirty-six eggs are found in his house. One of the observers gravely recommends, "qu'on empêche les aristocrats d'avoir plusieurs plats de gras par repas." Another records the honest indignation of a citizen that a restaurateur should be suffered to keep half an ox in his larder while fathers of families have nothing in the pot au feu. These were hard times for property. "Les aristocrats, dit le peuple, ressemblent à une multitude de pigeons qui dévastent un champs; il leur faut un épouvantailles (sic), et cette (sic) épouvantail est la guillotine." Kellerman, remonstrating from his dungeon in the Abbaye against his confinement there, begins, "Je conviens, citoyens représentants, que la première vertu républicaine est la défiance;" and that is the key to the situation. In the abnormal state of feelings and passions, the wildest rumours tended steadily to verify themselves, and each day the universal distrust became better founded. One after another, the leaders most deeply compromised by the crimes of the Revolution fell, and were crushed under its wheels. Charges the most absurdly improbable were trumped up to catch the ears of the mob, and answered their purpose. Hebert perished, not for his atrocities, not even on the belief of the extravagant conspiracy with which he was taxed, not on the strength of the impassioned denunciations of St.-Just, so much as because the popular fancy was persuaded that he had stopped the supplies of the people. Immediately after his execution, a group of bystanders, seeing some waggons loaded with food passing into the city, connected them with his happy despatch as effect and cause. Robespierre had surely given proof enough of devotion to the new régime by putting a river of blood between him and the aristocrats, yet when he perished the rumour found ready credence that he had lived in the pay of the émigrés, and died a traitor to the Republic.

* Paris en 1794 et en 1795. Histoire de la Rue, du Club, de la Famine. Par C. A. Dauban. Paris: Plon. 1869.

It is interesting to read the remarks of a democratic envoy on the proceedings and prospects of infant democracy in France. Morris, the American Minister, is quoted as writing to Washington:—

> Il m'a semblé que c'est Paris qui décide du sort de toute la France, et que les sans-culottes (lisez la populace) décident de Paris. Qu'en conséquence des factions qui surgissaient continuellement, se faisant une guerre impitoyable l'une à l'autre, et leur influence n'étant fondée seulement que sur la crainte momentanée que chacune d'elles inspirait, ne pouvaient prendre aucune forme de gouvernement stable et n'auraient qu'une existence éphémère, enfin que chaque nouveau coup de la guillotine refoulait le sentiment national et éloignait l'espoir d'un régime fondé sur la liberté.

Public spirit and ordinary humanity seem to have taken refuge with the generals in charge of the armies—the Klebers and Pichegrus. They stand more in fear of slander in their rear, arbitrary recalls and peremptory sentences from Paris, than of the enemies they see in their front. Kleber was brought back from La Vendée for shrinking from the pitiless chastisement which he was required to inflict in cold blood on an enemy that he despised in the field. He writes his friend Delaborde:—

> Je n'ai pas voulu quitter l'armée des côtes de Brest sans prendre congé de toi, mon camarade, de toi que j'aime et que j'estime infiniment, avec qui j'aurais voulu combattre, vaincre et mourir. Je pars pour l'armée du Nord demain; tu ferais bien de t'y rendre aussi. La guerre des chouans est la chose du monde la plus ridicule. Les braves les battent à coups de pied et de manche à balai, les lâches en sont battus, les faibles égorgés, assassinés. C'est un ennemi qui a la timidité et la légèreté du chevreuil et la férocité du tigre; c'est un serpent qui se traîne d'un repaire à l'autre et qui s'échappe au moment où on croit le tenir.
> Je t'embrasse bien fraternellement.

M. Dauban reproduces a copy of the autograph letter, with these lines across it in the handwriting of Delaborde:—

> L'amitié d'un grand homme tel que Kleber était pour moi d'un prix inestimable. Sa lettre doit être conservée très-précieusement par ma famille.

What a contrast between soldiers like these, and a Henriot with his stilted orders of the day, where mock heroics alternate with sickly sentimentality!

The history of 1794 embraces of course the events of 9 Thermidor and the downfall of Robespierre. M. Dauban seeks the materials for his hasty sketch at the hands of contemporary historians, chiefly Lacretelle and Beaulieu.—

> Si pour les vues d'ensemble ils sont inférieurs à ceux qui sont venus après eux, si dans leurs récits on peut reprendre quelques inexactitudes de détails et de dates, il n'y a pourtant que là qu'on peut trouver la physionomie vraie de l'époque, la vraie émotion de leur temps.

Robespierre had never seemed stronger than when his end was at hand. He had taken his precautions. He had packed the revolutionary tribunals the communes of Paris, with his friends. They swarmed at the Jacobins. He disposed through Henriot of the armed populace. "On assure qu'il avait inspiré le plus sincère fanatisme à un corps nombreux de jeunes gens qu'on appelait l'École de Mars." Perhaps it was his fancied strength that precipitated his fall. For he was less absolutely the master in the Committees of Public Safety, and he rashly proclaimed his determination to purge them, in sweeping denunciations levelled at men whose natures and interests were the counterpart of his own. The threatened men felt that, strong as he seemed to stand, it was possible to upset him, while in his ruin lay their sole chance of safety. The terror he inspired welded his enemies in unnatural alliance. On the 8 Thermidor he made a speech announcing important revelations. "Chose absurde de la part d'un homme dévoré et poursuivi par tant de haines, il engageait le combat sans vouloir le terminer dans un jour; il ne proposait aucune mesure." Even Billaud and Vadier rose to clamour against him. To show how blindly his enemies caught at any weapon, Vadier actually denounced him for his tenderness to the enemies of the Revolution. The very wildness of the attack had nearly saved him, when the cooler Freron came to the rescue, seeking to assert by resolution the Convention's independence of the Committees of Public Safety. Tallien dexterously drew Billaud on to the declarations which convinced the members of the Convention how fatally they were compromised with the dominant faction. The incidents that followed are matters of familiar history, and it is well known how the irony of circumstances forced Fouquier-Tinville to pass sentence of death on his friends. M. Dauban has some interesting speculations on what might have been the history of the Revolution had Robespierre persuaded the Convention to hear him speak; or, failing eloquence, had a more vigorous military chief than Henriot gained him a triumph by force. From the documents which he prints, M. Dauban pronounces that "il est impossible d'y trouver des vues d'avenir, une théorie, un idéal quelconque de gouvernement." Although interesting as containing Robespierre's private opinions on some of the best-known of his colleagues and opponents, they are excessively meagre. But they dwell strongly on the need for a volonté nationale to regulate both internal affairs and foreign relations. Doubtless the volonté of the nation was intended to be embodied in the will of Maximilian Robespierre, but we find nothing to guide us as to how far he had looked to a time when he might afford to govern more mercifully on the strength of the terror of his past proscriptions. The extracts afford thrilling proofs of the shadowy tenure in which men held their lives and liberties. A denunciation comes from Rousseville:—"Blot, marchand épicier, s'est mal conduit"—nothing more; "Michel, ci-devant cocher l'Antoinette, est toujours directeur en chef des charrois"—no crime alleged. Robespierre's curt answer is, "Arrest them." He arrests the National Agent at Romainville, with all his lodgers, because he had taken into his house some ci-devant nobles under pretence of having them under his surveillance. The sole offence of the nobles is their ancestry. He even arrests wholesale on anonymous denunciations. The book is enriched with strange engravings of revolutionary scenes from contemporary pictures. There is a horrible allegory by Prudhon, hitherto unpublished, facing the title-page, which gives a vivid idea of the situation on the 9 Thermidor. The genius of revolution sits throned in the Place Louis XV. Her hand is wreathed in the hair of Robespierre as he stands upright on a heap of victims. The portrait is admirable; the eyes are starting in horror from his head; his right hand grasps a dagger and a scroll; his left clutches at the prostrate body of a youth, Convention National, as it writhes in its agonies on the knees of the revolutionary demon, still retaining in its contortions its hold on the hair of the corpse of the murdered king. In the background Buonaparte is starting for Egypt, shielded by the buckler of Minerva.

We have taken our notices of the book almost at random. Were we to stop to pick and choose, we should find ourselves hopelessly embarrassed among the riches it contains. In particular, we should have liked to dwell on the end of le Père Duchesne, which we have merely alluded to, and on some of the touching death-scenes—that of the Duchess d'Ayen and the ladies of her family, for example. But we can find no space for them; and the only way to appreciate the value of M. Dauban's book is to look it over from the first page to the last.

BALL'S GUIDE TO THE EASTERN ALPS.*

THIS third and concluding volume of the Alpine Guide fully sustains the reputation of its two predecessors. Equally thorough and careful with them, it is a work of considerably greater difficulty, and one which must have cost its author much more time and pains. In dealing with the Western and Central Alps, Mr. Ball had to cover a field which was not only comparatively narrow, but which had been in almost every part explored and described in print, and respecting which details could readily be procured from the many living mountaineers—English, Swiss, and Italian—who have spent half the summers of their lives in climbing new peaks, and discovering new routes over glaciers and snow-fields. To work up these materials needed so much skill and accuracy that their abundance does not at all detract from the credit Mr. Ball deserves for having produced from them books so trustworthy and agreeable as his Guides to the Western and

* The Alpine Guide. Part III.—A Guide to the Eastern Alps. By John Ball, M.R.I.A., F.L.S., &c. London: Longmans & Co. 1868.

Central Alps are. But in treating of the Eastern Alps, where the extent of ground is vastly greater, this want of accumulated information must have been seriously felt; and we doubt whether the task could have been adequately completed by any one who had not, like Mr. Ball, acquired a more or less minute personal knowledge of nearly every part of the wide region which he undertakes to lead us through.

This region includes all the ranges of the Alps east of Switzerland; that is to say, the mountains of Tyrol, of Bavaria, Salzburg, Upper Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Illyria, Carniola, and North-Eastern Italy. One or two parts of it—such as, for instance, the Salzkammergut—lie within the beaten track of travellers, and for considerable districts, especially in Tyrol and Styria, a good deal has been done, not only by the surveys of the Austrian Government, but by the researches of the members of the Viennese Alpenverein, duly recorded in their Jahrbuch. But, comparing the region as a whole with the Swiss Alps, it may fairly be called virgin soil. A great number of peaks of respectable height and difficulty remain unscaled; and the frequent requests which Mr. Ball makes for information respecting routes said to exist from one valley to another will show the mountaineer who is ambitious of connecting his name with that of a "new pass" how easily he may gratify his desire. This holds good not only in Styria and Carinthia, where the ranges are for the most part scarcely high enough to be stimulating, but also in the main chain of the Rhaetic and Noric Alps, running from the source of the Adige to the Radstadter Tauern, where there are glaciers and snow-fields not unworthy to be placed beside those of the Bernese Oberland or the Upper Engadin. It is not, indeed, to be expected that these districts, even when better known and easier of access than they are now, will ever supplant Switzerland in the eyes of the ordinary tourist. Their scenery is less gigantesque; it seldom offers those striking contrasts of vast wildernesses of ice and snow above with rich and almost tropical valleys below, which one meets with on the south side of the Pennine Alps; it brings out no single peak or group of peaks with that overpowering majesty which the Eiger Monch and Jungfrau have as seen from the Wengern Alp, or the Weisshorn seen from Randa, or Mont Blanc from Courmayeur. The valleys are not so deep; the torrents are not so full and strong; the lakes are, with one or two exceptions, and notably that of the Garda, smaller and less imposing. But what the Eastern Alps may be thought to want in sublimity, they make up for in variety and delicate beauty. Speaking broadly, they may be thrown into three great divisions, each with a characteristic type of scenery. First, there is the region of comparatively recent sedimentary rocks on the north or German side of the main axis—the limestone ridges of Vorarlberg, Southern Bavaria, and the country south and east of Salzburg. Here the mountains, though never exceeding and rarely approaching 10,000 feet in height, are mostly bold and fantastic in outline, their pastures are of a richer green than one commonly finds in Switzerland, and here and there they are interspersed by the most charming little lakes. The most famous of these—the Konig See at Berchtesgaden—combines more perfectly than any sheet of water in Switzerland, or indeed in Europe, all the elements of picturesque beauty; and although none of the group of lakes round Ischl can singly claim to stand in the first rank, still, taken all together, what with the vivid blue of their waters, the vivid green of the streams that connect them, and the endlessly varied character of their shores—stern grey precipices alternating with woods and tender pastures—they make this Salzkammergut district wonderfully attractive. For the purposes of touring, as distinguished from travelling or mountain climbing, it is as near perfection as any place can be. The walks are not too long, the mountains are high enough to be fine, and not so high as to make it necessary to surmount minor ranges and penetrate into wild recesses in order to see them properly; one finds everywhere good roads and clean inns; the comforts of civilization are not unknown; yet the cockney, German or English, is still unfrequent. Further south, along the main snowy chain which stretches east and north-east, between the valleys drained by the Inn and Salza on the north and those whose waters descend into the Adige or the Drave, we enter a very different region with a very distinct type of scenery. A great number of peaks, especially between the Brenner and the pass of the Mallnitzer Tauern, rise far above the line of perpetual snow; and some of the glaciers are scarcely inferior, in size and in the perfection with which their peculiar structure is displayed, to the great ice streams of the Pennine Alps. These crystalline ranges show in general exceedingly bold and grand forms; less abrupt and fantastic than the limestone mountains on the flanks of the chain, they are far more massive; it is their air of strength and solidity, not less than their superior height, which make peaks like the Glockner and the Oberwiesbachhorn so much more impressive than the Watzmann or the Dachstein. On the southern side of the axis, beyond the valleys of the Adige, Eisack, and Drave, we come again upon more recent rocks and a district whose scenery is altogether peculiar, almost as unlike that of the limestone mountains of similar age in Bavaria and Upper Austria as it is to the schists of the central chain. This is the so-called dolomite country of Southern Tyrol and Northern Venetia, which has become pretty well known to English readers since the publication of Messrs. Gilbert and Churchill's very agreeable book of travels; a country full of rare and exquisite beauties, but rather difficult of access, and poorly supplied with inns, guides, mules, and all those other appliances of touring to which Switzerland has accustomed us. There is but little ice and snow in this region, and there are no lakes; but the mountain forms are not less imposing than those of the loftier Alps of Switzerland, while the mountain colours are far richer and more varied. The precipices, instead of the prevailing black and grey of the Central and Western Alps, are usually blue or red; the streams are not glacier torrents, turbidly white, but of an intensely clear and lustrous green; the sky, when the sky can be seen, has an Italian serenity and warmth of tone. For it is fair to add that no region in the Alps suffers more from uncertain and tempestuous weather. Separated as they are from the Adriatic by a comparatively narrow strip of plain, the south wind is constantly bringing up against these highlands masses of heated vapour, which, even when they do not dissolve in rain, hang round the summits in heavy clouds, and wear out at last the patience of the mountaineer.

The distinctive characters of each of these regions, as well as of the equally curious though scarcely so stimulating mountain districts further east, the Styrian and Illyrian Alps—the Terglou group, the Karawankas, the singular chalk plateaux of the Karst—is excellently brought out by Mr. Ball, whose book is much more than a mere compendium of walking directions. One of its most considerable merits, though a merit which perhaps only a few of those who use it will know how to value, is the clearness and accuracy with which the geography of the country is described and the true connexion of the ranges with one another explained. Reading the short introductory chapters on these matters which he has prefixed to each division of the work, we cannot but regret the narrow limits of space within which he has been obliged to confine himself. Mr. Ball is an accomplished naturalist, and his occasional remarks on the geology, mineralogy, and botany of the regions through which he leads us are so full of interest, and will be so valuable to the traveller, who can seldom extract from the rustic population on the spot any information regarding the curiosities of their own valley, that we could wish they had been more copious, and given more frequently. It is true that the book is already big enough for the pocket, but as this bulk will necessarily be increased in future editions, we believe that the best course would be to divide the treatise into two parts, and let one volume treat of the North-Eastern, the other of the South-Eastern, Alps.

As regards the more strictly practical merits of the Guide, we have nothing but praise to bestow. Taking those parts of the Eastern Alps with which we happen to be best acquainted, we have tested its statements respecting the goodness or badness of the inns, the descriptions of passes and of routes generally, the judgment expressed on the character of the scenery, the advice given as to the points that best deserve to be visited, and we have found Mr. Ball almost invariably accurate in matters of fact, and in matters of opinion not less conspicuously judicious and practical. Throughout the book there is, moreover, a fine glow of mountain ardour. It is superfluous to say that Mr. Ball has nothing, mentally at least, in common with that tribe of vulgar climbers who have done so much to make climbing ridiculous in Continental eyes—men who undergo toil and plunge into danger for the sake of the mere brag; men who, when they reach the top of Monte Rosa on a cloudless day, and see the whole marvellous panorama spread before them from Monte Viso in the extreme west to the glittering peaks of the Ortler and the Adamello on the opposite horizon, take out their watches and cry "Five hours and three-quarters only from the Riffel; let us be off now, and see if we can't polish the whole thing off under the nine hours." But that passion for mountain scenery which is a thing by itself, distinct from the love of nature in general—a passion which has not only its artistic and scientific, but what one may almost call its mystical, side—animates Mr. Ball's pages, and gives us a pleasure in reading them even where the descriptions are couched in the most plain and business-like language. There is no attempt to be eloquent after the fashion of the word-painters, but we feel the snowy keenness of the Alpine air.

It is scarcely necessary to say that a guide-book like this, whatever its excellences, cannot pretend to exhaust the subject, and must be susceptible of additions and improvements in future editions. Mr. Ball tells us the things it most concerns the traveller to be told, and tells them clearly, agreeably, accurately. But now and then he leaves us in the dark as to much that we should desire to know, sometimes probably from want of data, sometimes from want of room. The former difficulty will diminish every year as these eastern regions are more and more thoroughly explored; the latter may be partially met by omitting some of those rather too long extracts from the journals of travellers which Mr. Ball inserts. Here and there he perplexes us by not indicating whether a statement is made on his own authority or on that of another explorer; in the account, for instance, of the Cristallo group above Cortina d'Ampezzo, we scarcely know whether we are reading Dr. Grohmann throughout, or, if not, how much Mr. Ball vouches for. The difference is sometimes of consequence, for when Mr. Ball says that an ascent is easy or dangerous, we know what we are to think about it; but the German standard of mountain difficulty is different, and Dr. Grohmann, though himself a bold and successful climber, uses terms which are meant for his countrymen.

Mr. Ball acknowledges frequently the assistance he has derived from the Austrian topographers, and speaks with especial praise of the labours of Von Sonklar. Giving all credit to the Germans for the patient assiduity with which they have laboured in this field, we cannot help feeling proud of what our own countrymen have done in elucidating Alpine geography and the scientific problems which it presents. Since the late Principal Forbes published his volume of travels some five-and-twenty years ago—a book still unequalled in its line—Englishmen have led the way, not only in mountain-climbing, but in the investigation of all the physical phenomena of the Alps; and the three volumes of Mr. Ball's Guide contain in almost every page an honourable record of the labours they have undertaken, and the difficulties they have vanquished. It is matter for great satisfaction that the making of this record should have fallen into the hands of one who has himself done so much as Mr. Ball, who states so fairly what has been done by others, and who is so perfect a master not only of practical mountaineering, but of the art, possessed by few practical mountaineers, of clear and interesting exposition.

SALA'S ROME AND VENICE.*

MR. SALA'S book commences with a very singular apology for its appearance. It can, he says, be no secret to such readers as he possesses, that he is a Vulgarian, and that he has "never swerved from vulgarity of thought and coarseness of style" during the twenty years in which he has been writing for a livelihood. But it has often struck him "that one of the lowest animals —say a dog or a pig—coarse as may be its appetites, gross its manners, and unintellectual its organization, may have more and better opportunities of judging the qualities of things which are of the earth earthy, than the Colossus, stalking along sublimely," nose in air. And the persuasion that such is the case has been, according to his own account, the chief cause of his being induced to republish the letters which form the present work.

Whatever may be thought of his other statements, there is one of Mr. Sala's assertions which no one is likely to dispute. "You might swear," he says, "finding me anywhere, that I was born in the gross atmosphere of Cockaigne." At all events it is impossible to read Mr. Sala's letters without being constantly reminded of the fact that he is a Londoner. Wherever he goes he seems to be haunted by reminiscences of the great metropolis; the smoke of the city in which he habitually dwells appears to be always going up to heaven before his eyes. When he wishes to convey an idea of the utter dreariness of provincial existence in Italy, he tells us that "it is duller than a literary and scientific conversazione at Wimbledon, or the first reading of a new domestic drama in the green-room of the Theatre Royal, Cumberland Market; the influenza being rife at the time, the popular dramatic author having an impediment in his speech, the stage-manager being asleep, and the walking gentleman not on speaking terms with the leading lady." And, when he is in want of a comparison of a sufficiently odious nature to be bestowed upon the Roman barrel-organs, he bethinks himself of "a series of screeches such as those once given by the macaws in the Pantheon conservatory, when they smelt the sandwiches eaten for lunch underneath the counter by the young-lady attendants in the wax-flower department."

Nor is it only of his wonted dwelling-place that Mr. Sala is given to talk somewhat out of season. His eye is a good deal on himself even when he is surrounded by the strangest of people amid the most unfamiliar of scenes, and he can never refrain for any great length of time from favouring his readers with revelations, sometimes of the most confidential nature, respecting his own condition and private history. Thus the dearness of everything at Trieste leads him to state that he and the armed rhinoceros "have by this time become brothers as regards toughness of epidermis," that his skin might be tanned like old John Ziska's and the "Wedding March" beaten upon it, and that the ordinary extortions of landlords run off him like water off a duck's back. This may be interesting to some of Mr. Sala's readers, but as much can scarcely be said for the statement, though doubtless authentic, that he once had a godmother, and that he believes she is still alive, and that he hopes "she does not suffer much anguish through the knowledge of the mess her godson has made of things generally, and of the fine market to which he has brought his pigs." Nor will persons curious about Rome and Venice be likely to thank him much for the information that "it was by means of a private undertaking that my grandmother's cousin-german obtained the privilege of supplying the Crown and Anchor Tavern with anchovy-sauce, and made that fortune which he so unkindly bequeathed to quite a different branch of the family." In dwelling on these matters Mr. Sala scarcely does justice to himself. A very slight expenditure of time and ink would have sufficed to strike out from his book many passages which, though they may have been eminently qualified to adorn the pages of the journal in which his letters originally appeared, seem out of place in such a work as that which is now before us. But all revision and excision and such-like "double trouble" are evidently as distasteful to Mr. Sala as was the repaying of borrowed money to Falstaff—a fact which is rendered sufficiently patent by the appearance of such misprints as the "Mula Sudans" and the "bird of love"— the fowl in question being the eagle. A busy journalist, it is true, has very little time at his disposal for the revisal of any but the current day's amount of "copy," but surely the help of a friendly though alien pruning-knife might easily have been secured.

The existence, in most of his books, of such ponderous jokes or passages of dubious taste as those which we have quoted has done much to prevent Mr. Sala from obtaining that meed of appreciation and of praise to which he is fairly entitled. Too often writing in that unpleasant position, "on the spur of the moment," he is extremely unequal, often falling far below his usual level; and as he is apt to reprint at his leisure what he has said in his haste, he is constantly exposed to the risk of being judged according to his demerits and weaknesses. And this is the more unfortunate inasmuch as few of the records of his ramblings are devoid of passages deserving of really high praise, whether for the picturesqueness of their language or the raciness of their humour. The present volume is scarcely so rich in passages of this kind as some of its predecessors were. There is no landscape in it to be compared with the weird and ghastly picture of a stony desert contained in one of the letters from the North of Spain; there is no grotesque extravagance to equal that absurd story of the Englishman whose foot-tub became the centre and the prime cause of a popular festival in some out-of-the-way village, electrified by the sight of the foreigner's extraordinary ablutions; and there is no descriptive passage to equal in picturesqueness, in humour, or in pathos that admirable scene in which, some years ago, Mr. Sala represented an Imperial visit to Marseilles. But still there is no lack, in his Roman and Venetian letters, of descriptions that are pleasant to read, of landscapes that are fair to see, and of happy sallies that delicately tickle the reader's humorous cuticle, provoking the gentle chuckle of approciation, without exciting the coarse laugh of vulgar jocularity.

A good specimen of Mr. Sala's productions when in his absurd vein will be found in the opening of his letter from Ferrara, in which he describes the city, not as it actually exists, but as the opera of Lucrezia Borgia makes it out to have been. It is a capital piece of fantastic extravagance, of excellent fooling. And the continuation of the letter is also very good, in which he paints the look of horror which the city wore for him, in spite of the fact that the day was so bright and hot that

> The dogs flatly refused to venture out in the sun. The very cats were chary of basking in it, and, peering from beneath archways, put one paw forward into the blaze, and then drew it back again, broiled—the very converse of boys who test with one foot the temperature of the stream in which they yearn to bathe. Shadows of deepest blue did the barred projections of the casements cast on the walls, whose laminæ of lime had been cracking and scaling off for centuries beneath those pitiless rays. There was scarcely a soul abroad. Now and then you saw something living glide along close to the wall, pelted by the sun's darts, and disappear. If it was green, it was a lizard; if it was grey, it was a rat; if it was black, and wore a cassock and shovel hat, it was a priest.

Another good picture is that which Mr. Sala draws of the interior of a small Roman tavern, in which he saw seven waggoners, in Spanish mantles, brigand hats, and goatskin overalls, sitting round a table, upon the bare boards of which "a kitchen-wench, unwashed, but comely, and with a fine Roman nose, and eyes like sloes," who had thrown her white petticoat over her head, where it formed a most artistic coiffure, emptied a prodigious mountain of smoking maccaroni, probably dressed with cheese, "for it smelt so strongly that one of the buffaloes in the wains outside coughed," and doubtless "accommodated with oil," for one of the waggoners' dogs was seen to lick his lips and wag his tail approvingly. All the little details of this and other similar pictures are very artistically executed, the spirit of each scene, as well as its varied colours and its effects of light and shade, being rendered with admirable effect.

Many changes have taken place in Italy since Mr. Sala wrote the letters of which his present book is composed, so that the political opinions he then expressed, and has now a second time put upon record, are a little antiquated. The historical parts of the work also have lost a good deal of the interest which they commanded when they first appeared, but still there are several passages which are well worthy of being read over again, such as that which describes the weary-looking Emperor of Austria driving up to his palace, or the account of how the "ragged and rough multitude" cheered the popular Austrian ex-governor when he took final leave of Venice, and how "the valiant and loyal little old gentleman had at first only raised his cocked-hat in military punctilio, but when he heard that sounding shout of 'Good-bye and God be with you!' he took out his white handkerchief and waved it cheerily in acknowledgment of the salute." But we prefer the social sketches, such as the description of the Italian caffé, which Mr. Sala not unjustly looks upon as "a kind of curse, and one of the chief causes of the backwardness, the laziness, and the general impracticability of the Italian people," who spend half their existence there, "ruining their digestion with black coffee and blacker cigars taken on fasting stomachs, neglecting their business, wasting their time, and mag, mag, mag, endlessly magging, on one invariable theme—politics." Another good picture is that of the "liberated foreigner" mounting guard, and there is some sense in the philosophical remarks which follow it, to the effect that

> The reason why mounting guard is so popular abroad is because, under the pretext of doing something, it affords such a capital opportunity of doing nothing. Saunter up and down with a stick over your shoulder for two hours, or sit on a bench for two hours more, twiddling your thumbs, gossiping, dozing, or ogling the milliners' girls, and you will run some risk of being called a lazy fellow. But put a forage-cap on your head, shoulder a gun, and saunter in a measured manner, and you are on guard; you are serving your country; you are a patriot and a soldier. Standing sentry is in fact the dolce far niente put into uniform.

As good a specimen of the merits and the demerits of Mr. Sala's style as can well be found is that afforded by his description of a funeral procession which he happened to witness one day in Rome. The coffin was "a great painted ark" borne on poles

* Rome and Venice, with other Wanderings in Italy in 1866-7. By George Augustus Sala, Author of "America in the Midst of War," &c. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1869.

"apparently distrained from barbers' shops," on the shoulders of half a dozen lads in long red gowns, who staggered along in a somewhat unseemly fashion. Next came a "thurifer, with a great crucifix on the top of a pole," wearing a surplice "which had evidently not been washed since last Easter, and which was disgracefully ragged." He was followed by "an old priest in spectacles, and a young priest with many pimples on his face," both crooning forth the Office for the Dead. "The old priest had something the matter with his knee-shorts, which compelled him every two minutes or so to stop and hitch them up; and the young priest, at the imminent risk of getting a crick in his neck, was staring at the occupants of the very tall houses on either side the street, droning out his chants meanwhile and yawning occasionally, as though he found the Office for the Dead rather a bore than otherwise." The rear of the procession was brought up by the members of a Confraternity of the Dead, "their features, and all but the dim outline of their limbs, concealed under most hideous robes and hoods of bright green-baize," and they and the priests and the coffin-bearers somehow or other came into collision with the carriage in which Mr. Sala was sitting, "with a string of peasants bearing sacks of charcoal, with a dray piled with pumpkins, and drawn by two of the savage buffalo-looking oxen of the Campagna," with a knot of Dutch Zouaves, and with a mounted contadino. A terrific slanging match ensued, distinguished by all that richness and fulness and copiousness of scurrility which marks "the Roman allusions to the principal persons mentioned in the Scriptures." With his wonted autobiographical frankness Mr. Sala informs us that he has himself before now had words with a man in a mourning-coach, and he adds that he once saw two gentlemen "get out of a 'brougham-hearse' in the middle of Russell Square, and fight, the undertaker waiting for the purpose, and an admiring circle of partisans in hatbands and scarves cheering the combatants on from their cab-windows"; but he ends by declaring that this Roman slanging match—"the blasphemy, the Billingsgate, the tawdry coffin, the dirty surplices, the howling mummers in green-baize, and the Cross above all, like the mast of a wrecked ship visible above a stormy sea"—made up such a funeral spectacle as he had never before witnessed.

Before taking leave of Mr. Sala, we will quote one more passage, that in which he describes the "glorification" of the Apse of St. Mark's by the sunny shaft that is shot at certain hours into the midst of its shadows, when

> The great recess is all at once in a blaze. Looking out of the darkness you might fancy the high altar to be on fire. Understand that this apsis is wholly covered with golden mosaic, and that in its centre is a colossal figure of the Redeemer. This golden alcove of glory, this inexhaustible treasure-chamber, this stupendous shrine glittering and trembling in its abundance of radiance, fills you at first with unspeakable awe and veneration. You do not wonder that the poor people who come here to pray, and who are crouching humbly in the tenebrous nave, muttering their orisons, should accept in this a sure and visible symbol of their salvation—that, abject, poverty-stricken, oppressed, ragged, and hungry, they should swathe their souls in those golden cerements, anointed to them with blessed balm; that after a toilsome day and scant pay these weary water-carriers, and flower-girls, and gondoliers, and fishermen should find, in the contemplation of the glorified shrine, peace, and consolation, and hope.

VEUILLOT'S COULEUVRES.*

SEEING that it has been maintained by Feuerbach and other sceptical writers that a malignant spirit is an element of Christianity, its champions and defenders never give deeper satisfaction to its enemies than when they write malignantly. In this way M. Louis Veuillot continues to please the unbelieving French, and his successive publications, each if possible bitterer and fouler than its predecessor, are received by the sceptical part of the population as Mr. Pickwick's onslaught was received by Dodson and Fogg. But Mr. Pickwick had a Sam Weller to draw him back and get him out of the way, whereas Louis Veuillot has no Sam Weller. The Ultramontane religious world approves of him, and the dignitaries of his Church consider him, on the whole, a useful man to throw dirt which is too nasty for them to touch. Not that they are very particular themselves in this respect, but a bishop can hardly write under the direct inspiration of that Muse ordurière whom Veuillot courts, and who has advanced him to his present pre-eminence.

When a French peasant speaks of a pig, he often uses a periphrase, and always apologizes for mentioning the unclean creature. Thus in one part of France the pigs are always called les habillés de soie, and even in speaking of them thus delicately and elegantly it is considered necessary to add the apology sauf votre respect. In this way a recent French review of Les Couleuvres never mentions M. Veuillot without adding excusez-moi. We will content ourselves with offering a general apology. We beg the reader to pardon us for speaking about M. Veuillot, and tender the excuse that, although foul, he is interesting as a typical specimen of the religious vituperator. Spite and scorn have become so much the habit of his mind, that even in writing about things outside of his speciality of religious vituperation he is still spiteful and scornful. We will allow this as part of his defect, and answer him softly.

> For in those days
> No knight of Arthur's noblest dealt in scorn;
> But, if a man were halt or hunch'd, in him
> By those whom God had made full-limbed and tall, > Scorn was allowed as part of his defect
> And he was answered softly.

It might be argued that since vituperation has its use, and may be a powerful weapon—nay, even under certain conditions an irresistible weapon—it is right to employ it in a good cause. Mr. Stuart Mill has shown that it may be advantageously employed by a dominant sect, but not by a weak one; that the use of it strengthens the strong and weakens the weak. It crushes the opposition of a feeble minority, but it arouses the indignation of a majority. Are M. Veuillot's books a help to the Church in France? Is the Church strong enough there to employ unmeasured vituperation without inflicting injury upon herself by arousing the indignation of the unbelieving laity? The true answer to this question seems to be that whilst M. Veuillot gives satisfaction within his own community he arouses nobody's indignation. It is almost impossible to make a Frenchman indignant about any religious matter unless he is a real Catholic, and a Catholic of an uncommonly earnest kind. This is a point on which Englishmen have the greatest difficulty in understanding the French temper. The ordinary Frenchman is as indifferent to religious matters as the ordinary Englishman is to the controversies of artists; his indifference is absolute, and nobody becomes indignant about what he does not care for in the least. But within the Church, M. Veuillot's writings have some effect, and a bad effect, because they tend to widen the great chasm which separates the world of priests and women from the active world of men. His antagonism to modern France breaks out continually, and concentrates itself in hatred to Paris as the centre of modern ideas. He hates our century, too, generally, and therefore (hating both the century and the city that he lives in) is in a state of mind liable to continual irritation. In fact, everything irritates him, and he spits upon everything. Here is his goodbye to Paris, on leaving it for the holidays:—

> Bonsoir, Paris, carogne aimée!
> Si quelqu'un vient, je suis sorti.
> Me voici hors murs, bien parti,
> Loin de ton haleine embaumée.
>
> Vers toi s'envole la fumée;
> Qu'elle t'étouffe, et que Titi,
> Ton amant le mieux assorti,
> Y perde sa voix enrhumée!
>
> Par les soins de tes figaros
> Invite à ton lit des escrocs
> Et des Titis toujours plus sales;
>
> Va, gueuse! et prends-en à mourir;
> Et qu'on te voie enfin pourrir
> Dans tes ordures colossales!

The following verses are on the subject of "our century," and are supposed to constitute an accurate picture of the present time:—

> De l'art et du savoir les secrets colportés
> Ne laissent nulle part subsister nul mystère;
> S'il en reste un ou deux au ciel ou sur la terre > Babinet avant peu les aura dépistés.
>
> Trimm, pour un sou, nous vend les suprêmes clartés,
> Et donne, en outre, un meurtre avec un adultère.
> Gallinard et Ponsard commenteraient Homère;
> Nous possédons les trucs de toutes les beautés.
>
> Nous n'avons plus besoin pour rien d'un ciel propice.
> L'homme vit par lui-même; il fait, par artifice,
> Du soleil, de l'argent, du bœuf, des rois, du vin.
>
> O siècle incomparable et fécond en merveilles! . . .
> Il offense pourtant mes yeux et mes oreilles
> Par trop de ressemblance avec Monsieur Havin.

Can it be necessary to remark how absurdly unjust all this is? In the first place, we are not unwilling to recognise the existence of mystery; on the contrary, no century has ever been so willing to admit it, because no century has ever been so much imbued with the scientific spirit. Take a single point as an example. A hundred years since, everybody could tell you the exact date, or something very near the exact date, of the creation of the world, but now this is an acknowledged mystery. And so in literary criticism, a century ago everybody knew who wrote every ancient book, but now it is admitted that the authorship of many ancient books cannot be positively ascertained. Even the grounds of the moral relations between men, and of duty, about which no mystery whatever was formerly believed to exist, are now admitted to present serious difficulties which have not yet been cleared away, though many earnest men in different countries are patiently seeking for more light. The sneer at the scientific spirit of investigation (personified in M. Babinet) is unjust in this, that it implies a light and easy confidence in the immediate removal of all mysteries, which is not only foreign to the modern scientific spirit, but even directly opposed to it. In fact, the leaders of science inform us that many of the great mysteries they recognise must remain for ever insoluble.

The sneers at literature in the second stanza show an equal want of comprehension of the modern spirit. It is a part of the craft of the satirist to make it appear that his victims sell their talents à vil prix.

> Trimm, pour un sou, nous vend les suprêmes clartés.

Timothée Trimm (M. Léo Lespès) is not a great literary man, and from his enormous productiveness (an article a day, regularly) it is clear that he must often touch upon subjects that he has not really studied; but the sneer at the pecuniary cheapness of his talent is ridiculous. Few journalists have ever earned so large an income as M. Léo Lespès. To put it in a form intelligible to M. Veuillot, he earns as much as seven French bishops, and this pecuniary success is the measure of his vast influence, since he writes in the halfpenny papers. Almost every workman in France reads Timothée Trimm, and there is not a writer living, except Mr. Charles Dickens, whose pen has such extensive influence amongst the people. And this popular literature, especially when (as in the case in question) the writer is a chroniqueur touching upon many subjects in lively and readable essays, finds in its very cheapness an element of power. The Church herself has a cheap press, and sells suprêmes clartés at as low a figure as possible. It would have been in better taste to let M. Havin alone just after he was dead, but M. Veuillot is incapable of restricting himself within the limits of decency. Having insulted M. Havin during his life, he must now have a kick at his corpse.

* Les Couleuvres. Par Louis Veuillot. Paris: Palmé. 1869.

M. Veuillot's hatred of Paris and the Parisians finds perhaps its most intense expression in a poem entitled "Quitter Paris":—

> Sur plus d'alignement quel monde plus servile
> Prend sa loi des journaux, des filles, des tailleurs?
> Quel pavé voit grouiller populace plus vile?
> Je ne saurai jamais tant m'ennuyer ailleurs!

What is hateful in satire of this kind is its determination to see everything on the unfavourable side, to be as uncharitable and as misanthropic as it can. M. Veuillot is determined to see nothing good in the population of Paris because it is not very ardently Catholic; is, in fact, decidedly anti-clerical. But, studied from a human rather than a clerical point of view, the Parisians are not altogether vile. How ill the world could spare Paris, with her artistic culture and her intellectual light! How many noble lives are led within the wide circle of her fortifications—lives devoted to the best labour of the mind, and marked by a simplicity as to externals which is all the more striking and admirable that it is surrounded by so much luxury! There is no place in the world where a man of talent may live more genially and happily—where his poverty, if he happens to be poor, is so slight an obstacle to the attainment of a pleasant and respected place in the world. The temper of the Parisian lower classes, as contrasted with the temper of the French peasantry, is remarkable, too, for great kindness and sympathy. There are probably few cities in the world, and not a single country province, where the poor help each other so much. M. Veuillot complains of ennui in Paris, but Paris is the last place in the world where an intelligent man would suffer from ennui. It is a sinful place, no doubt, but it is not a more sinful place than Rome, and we fear that London and New York are little better. The explanation of M. Veuillot's hatred of Paris is that he hates the modern spirit of which Paris is the metropolis and home.

We cannot say much in favour of the literary quality of M. Veuillot's book. The versification is often extremely poor, as for instance in the following verses, which, being printed in italics, and at the beginning of the book, ought to have been rather more careful in structure:—

> Comme il est écrit sans faconde,
> Comme il fut pensé sans apprêt,
> Je n'attends pas que ce livret
> M'attire une estime profonde.
>
> Mais comme la raison abonde
> En mainte page, l'on pourrait
> Me supposer un plan secret
> De me moquer du pauvre monde.
>
> Je ne suis point si mal appris!
> Je n'ai ni haine ni mépris
> Pour la naïve espèce humaine.
>
> Je dirai plus: je l'aime un peu;
> Cela, tu le verras sans peine,
> Lecteur, si tu sais lire.—Adieu.

Let us, in conclusion, express the hope that M. Veuillot's condition of mind is not a common one amongst the members of the clerical party in France. A more spiteful and malignant writer does not exist. The idea of justice seems to have no place in the man's brain. In the name of religion he utters the most outrageous slanders, and then grins with horrible satisfaction at his own foulness. No wonder that Paris should be disagreeable to him; the place he lives in must always be disagreeable to him. Even the priests who employ his pen cannot respect him. The wonder is that the Church should be willing to accept aid from such a source.

WARD'S LECTURES ON THE HOUSE OF AUSTRIA.*

WE trust that these Lectures are the forerunners of something on a larger scale from the same hand. There is probably no living Englishman so well fitted to deal with the German history of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as Mr. Ward. If we had no other means of knowing the fact, the little book before us would go a long way to persuade us of it. How far the lectures were effective as lectures we do not at all know, and we should greatly like to know. They were delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, and we are bound to suppose that an audience of Edinburgh philosophers will understand many things which an ordinary audience would not understand. An ordinary audience, we feel sure, would not go away from Mr. Ward's lectures with any very clear idea of the Thirty Years' War. The case is much the same as with Mr. Ward's Translation of Ernst Curtius. We ventured to think that a writer less thoroughly saturated with German scholarship than Mr. Ward would really make a better translation from German into English. So here he is in a manner crushed under the weight of his own subject. There is so much to be crowded into a small compass, and he has the whole story so thoroughly at his fingers' ends, that he seems hardly to make enough allowance for the necessary ignorance of his hearers. As it is the great temptation to do in such cases, Mr. Ward falls into a sort of allusive way of telling his story, which is effective with those who know it well already, but which is apt to be puzzling to those who do not. But, as we before said, we are perhaps judging an Edinburgh audience by audiences of a meaner clay, and, if the philosophers of Modern Athens could follow Mr. Ward with ease through the whole course of these two lectures, we are thoroughly glad to hear it. One thing is certain; whatever effect the lectures may have had as lectures, they abundantly show how thoroughly competent Mr. Ward is to undertake the subject in some form which will not compel him so painfully to compress his knowledge into a small compass. He shows throughout that thorough mastery of the time of which he is speaking without which a man has no right to undertake a great historical subject. His study of the Thirty Years' War has plainly been no holiday work. He has gone thoroughly into the matter; he has looked at it from all sides, and he has approached it in a spirit of genuine criticism and impartiality. He has that vigorous and trenchant way of dealing with things which comes from thorough familiarity with the times and events of which he is speaking. In short, we have often read lectures which we should think must have been more attractive and effective at their delivery; but we have never read any lectures which bear more thoroughly the impress of one who has a true and vigorous grasp of the subject in hand, none which give us richer promise of what we are likely to have if the author ever throws the results of his labours into a more congenial shape.

Mr. Ward's subject, it must be remembered, is not the Thirty Years' War, but the House of Austria during the Thirty Years' War. This carries him back for a long time before the beginning of the war, while the later stages of the war itself are somewhat hurried over. To set forth the position of the House of Austria when the great war began, it is necessary to sketch the career of the German branch of it from Charles the Fifth, or indeed from Maximilian, onwards. Mr. Ward sketches off the successive princes of the family in a vigorous and epigrammatic style. Maximilian is, "in poetry and prose, saluted as 'the Last German Knight,' while in truth he ought to be remembered as the first German Landsknecht." Charles the Fifth "entered into a conflict with the spirit of the German nation." To him that nation "came to owe its permanent disintegration." Charles, in fact, was too much of an Emperor, he held too much of a really Imperial position, he came too near to being a true "mundi dominus," to succeed as a national King in Germany or anywhere. We think, however, that Mr. Ward and the German writers whom he follows look rather too much on Charles as a Spaniard. Surely the peculiarity of Charles's position is the truly Imperial characteristic of belonging to no nation in particular. But, so far as Charles of Ghent could be said to have any nationality, it was surely Flemish rather than Spanish. All that Mr. Ward says of Charles's German reign is a specimen of his best manner, and he gives in a short space the result of no small thought and reading. We would except only an incomprehensible sentence in which he says that Charles "caused the princes who were individually impotent against him to identify the unsolidation of their territorial autonomy with the national cause." Here we come very near to meeting the Insoluble. We can only guess that "unsolidation" is somehow the opposite to "solidarity." But till we know what "solidarity" means, this does not make us much the wiser. But we will let Mr. Ward off for his "unsolidation" on the strength of a passage which does one good to read:—

> The French King had, for the first time, crossed the frontier as vindex libertatis Germanicæ; and though his German allies were eager to withdraw from the shameful league, France clung to the prize which she had cheaply secured—clung to it, till a century afterwards it was legally incorporated in the French monarchy in the Peace of Westphalia. And thus Germany, which to the dynastic ambition of the greatest of the Habsburgs owed the perpetuation of her weakness, saw the greed and the terror of his opponents begin a new page in her history—the most shameful which its records contain. France henceforth had a footing in the Empire; nor has she ever since awoke from the hallucination that a river German on either bank, from source to sea, was designed by nature—for it is nature who is credited with the device—as a boundary-line.

The notion about the frontier of the Rhine is a memorable instance of the way in which it is possible to say a thing over and over again till people believe it, perhaps till the speaker believes it himself. When the historical limits of the Rhone and the Saone are once passed, why stop at the Rhine? Why not the Elbe, the Vistula, or the Dnieper? The armies of the Great Nation have visited them all.

Then came Ferdinand the First, then Maximilian the Second. We are here reminded of that brilliant essay of Lord Macaulay which set forth in how large a portion of its possessions the Roman Catholic religion was in the position of a ruler who had been driven out and who has returned from banishment. That Austria is now Roman Catholic was, as every reader of that essay will remember, the work of the Jesuit reaction of those days. Under Ferdinand, who "played fast and loose with the privileges conceded by him to his Protestant subjects, without giving violent umbrage to either side"—under Maximilian, tolerant on principle, Protestantism had conquered well nigh the whole of the Austrian dominions. But, as Mr. Ward says, "the virtues and the weaknesses of Maximilian combined to ripen the situation for the outbreak of the Great War":—

> As it was, in Austria and Styria the Protestant lords were allowed the free exercise of their religion; and with the aid of pastors from Wittenberg, fast converted their tenantry; while in Bohemia religious liberty was virtually permitted; Silesia and Moravia as usual sharing the fortunes of the sister-dominion. Yet it was not toleration by an individual sovereign, but a legally-defined position, independent of the individuality of himself or his successors, which Maximilian, warned by his knowledge of the character of his probable successor, should have bestowed upon Protestantism, if he was really minded to open a new era for his states. A charter such as the Bohemians afterwards extorted from Rhodolph might, if granted by Maximilian, have founded religious liberty upon a basis which even the determination of Ferdinand II. would have proved unable to shake; while the permanent establishment of the privileges of the Austrian and Styrian Estates would have proved an obstacle to the same prince in the first step which he took towards the great reaction.

Then, in 1576, after the second Maximilian, came the second Rudolf, whose name, by the way, Mr. Ward writes in the somewhat uncouth-looking form of Rhodolph. But Mr. Ward's portrait of the stargazing Emperor is one of the best things in his book. Nowhere does his power of terse, keen, epigrammatic expression come out more strongly. Rudolf "was one of those princes who, like Louis XV. of France, seem passive instruments in the hands of the evil genius of their people." "His courtiers called him a Solomon; but even in the prime of his years he was a Solomon in his dotage." He "sat in his chamber, where perpetual silence was enjoined, dreaming over the horoscopes of foreign ambassadors, the single kind of inquiry which he was interested in addressing to them." One is reminded of other studies of Mr. Ward's when we hear of "Philip Lang, a vile minion, characterized by all the sensuality and recklessness of a Cæsarean freedman." Here again we cannot withhold an extract:—

> By education he was a Spaniard; for, during the childhood of the wretched epileptic Don Carlos, Philip, uncertain as to the life of this his sole heir, had been fain to bring up the Archduke and his brother Ernest at his own court as possible successors to his thrones. The influences of a court which, in the opinion of Catherine de' Medici, transformed even her daughter, a Medici and a Valois, into a thorough Spaniard, and which actually thus transformed a son of William of Orange—had deepened the natural gloom of a mind in which, as in that of more than one other Habsburg, rankled the fatal heritage of the mad Joanna. When in his twenty-fifth year Rhodolph ascended his thrones, he brought with him the manners and sentiments, but not the indefatigable energy of the Spanish king; nor the belief in himself which, notwithstanding the philippics of distinguished historians, saves the royal scribe of the Escurial from the contempt of posterity.

Our readers may perhaps remember that we have always held that Mr. Motley rather overdid matters in his utter depreciation of Philip the Second, whom Mr. Ward hits off in his best manner as "the royal scribe of the Escurial." We are glad to find Mr. Ward taking the same line.

We leap over Matthias to Ferdinand the Second, who "enters under widely different conditions indeed, but with virtually the same ends, upon a resumption of the task of Charles the Fifth." "A man devoid of genius but strong of will," he "consciously resumed what seemed to have become a hopeless task." That task is "to crush out heresy, and to establish a monarchy which, from Baltic to Adriatic, shall be one in allegiance and one in faith." His portrait is drawn with as vigorous a hand as the portrait of Rudolf; but we must hasten on. Mr. Ward's subject is, at least indirectly, the Thirty Years' War, and in most minds the main interest of the Thirty Years' War gathers round the name of Gustavus. Let us see how the great Protestant champion appears in the eye of Mr. Ward. He is less full about him than we could have wished, but his view of the Swedish King's policy is clearly set forth:—

> Gustavus Adolphus—of this there remains no doubt—aspired to no less a prize than the Imperial crown. But it was not his intention to wrest it from Ferdinand. Rather, it appears to result from his entire course of action, that he designed to carve out for himself with his sword a great territory, by the tenure of which he would become a great German prince, entitled at Ferdinand's death to claim the German crown, to which he should have been in the lifetime of the defeated Emperor appointed the successor.

Lastly we have Ferdinand the Third, we have the end of the war, we have the weary diplomacy of Munster and Osnabruck, and we have the Peace of Westphalia. We have the Imperial dignity cut down to a shadow, but still retaining that strange life which enabled it to drag on through another century and a half of being. "Shorn and mutilated, the Empire had become a mere aggregate of independent territories." "What was the Emperor now beyond a president among his peers?" Worse still, France is "satisfied," satisfied "with German territory, and with what she prizes still more dearly, the opportunities of future interference." These and many other subjects Mr. Ward glances at; he only glances at them, but he glances at them in a way which makes us long for a fuller treatment of them by the same hand. Mr. Ward says that the labours of Ranke have made a history of the Thirty Years' War possible. We trust that he will practically show that it is so.

ECHOES IN PLANT AND FLOWER LIFE.*

ABOUT this time last year we noticed an interesting provocative to the study of the Trees of Old England from the pen of Mr. Grindon, and owned the charm of his intelligent and enthusiastic descriptions of the phenomena of tree-life. He has now put forth a similar little book on the Echoes of Plant and Flower Life, calculated to inspire even indifferent bystanders with a curiosity to know more of botany, and to teach beginners how much food there is in plant-life for the poetic mind. Unless where his subject runs away with him, and he is betrayed into surmises as to the admiration with which Penelope must have regarded the hyacinthine locks of Ulysses (p. 105), there is nothing in this little volume that is not in good taste; and what there is of sentiment never descends to maudlin, but is mainly justified by the subject-matter. The author indeed is to be welcomed as one who brings to keen investigation a mind the very reverse of sceptical, which applies every discovery to the vindication rather than the calling in question of providential economies. Gifted with a lively fancy and an observant receptive mind, he is quicker to spy concords than discords. "To me," he writes, "it is still a fact of most pleasant recollection that in the balanced beauty of the swinging anthers of the woodbine lay one of the earliest incitements I received to the study of flower-structure." He claims for a rightly-conceived "Language of Flowers" (not the "Oriental," nor its frivolous latter-day expansion) the rank of "an integral portion of genuine botany which does not concern itself alone with forms and surfaces, but rises from these considerations, after mastering them, to scrutiny as to how plants procure their living, what they have to say for themselves, alike for the glory of God and the delight and instruction of man. He who stays among the forms and surfaces is only a vegetable anatomist—expert and learned, it may be, as to externals—but he is no botanist till he asks what do these things signify? Both occupations are good; let neither observer look with disparagement on the other. One is Lucretius enumerating the phenomena; the other is Virgil extracting and portraying the loveliness."

By his title, "Echoes," Mr. Grindon explains that he does not mean resemblances, such as are the basis of popular nomenclature or scientific classification, found in superficial aspect or relative affinities; not real family likenesses, or illusive resemblances that might pass for such; but, as he expresses it, "resonances from things of another substance," the action of which he illustrates, in his own style, "by the tree in the ancient forest calling to the blossom on the hills; and the fern in the dell calling to the weed on the beach." These echoes or resonances he teaches us to apprehend in the general aspect and figure of plants, in their leaf, flower, bracts and calyces, stamens and pistils, fruit, seed, colour, and odours; and this teaching he divides into six chapters, followed by a brief conclusion. And, under whichsoever of these heads we test his principles and research, we shall find equal ground for satisfaction. For example, touching echoes of plan and figure in his first chapter, he points out how the passion-flowers, and the gourd and melon race (cucurbitaceæ), although differing widely in blossom, correspond almost exactly in stem and foliage, habit, and tendril. The passion-flower fruit is a miniature gourd; the gourd ripens "titanesque passion-flower berries." Both are naturally climbers, and equally throw out "great curling claspers, like wire bell-strings, which often midway reverse the direction of the coil." To this illustration Mr. Grindon appends an interesting notice of the various climbing instruments of different plants. Those above-mentioned send out their tendrils from the axils of the leaves, or the angles formed by the union of leaf and stem. Some, like the Gloriosa of the East Indies, and the Mutisias, cling by the attenuated and twisted extremities of their leaves. Others, like the Tropœolums and Clematis, and the Ramping Fumitory, supply their lack of tendril by curling their leaf-stalks. The Virginian creeper puts out sprays of tentacula, each long fibre of which ends with a viscid cementing knob; and in two other plants, quite distinct and unallied, the leaf-stalks, as soon as the blade is withered, harden into hooks. Under the same head we learn how the Villarsia, an aquatic member of that terrestrial and Alpine family the Gentians, echoes the Nymphæas and water-lilies, and is "an Undine among the wild flowers"; and how the tropical palm tree is echoed in miniature as to its "coronal of pinnate leaves" by the Oxalis, or wood-sorrel, which in sensitiveness, if we may take Mr. Grindon's experience as conclusive on this sometimes disputed point, echoes the Mimosa. The palm-cyperus, akin in race and foliage to the sedges, is also palm-like in its top; and what it and the Oxalis are to the palm, the "Equiseta" or "horse-tails" are to the conifers, minute and mimic counterparts.

In his Trees of Old England Mr. Grindon was very instructive and entertaining upon leaf-forms; and into the second chapter of his present volume he throws much curious matter as to their "echoes." Of plants with peltate leaves—that is, circular leaves with a dimple in the centre, and a stalk attached to the point of the underside of the leaf which corresponds to this dimple, "as a pillar to a work-table"—the grandest example is the Egyptian Lotus, or Nelumbium Speciosum. This rises out of the water in forties and fifties, like green plates a foot across, upon stalks ascending to fully the height of a man. A middling echo to these is found in the leaves of the "caper-nasturtium," whose botanical name, "Tropœolum," bears witness to their supposed resemblance to those great round shields which were the pièce de résistance of a trophy. But our author notes a tinier echo still, in the "fairies' tables" of the "Hydrocotyle Vulgaris," the marsh-pennywort of our moors and pastures, and the "Cotyledon Umbilicus," or navel-wort," that springs out of wall-chinks and tree-fissures. This last echoes the Lotus, not only in its form of leaf, but in its epiphytic, and not parasitic, character. He has much also to say on the echoes of oblique leaves, those curious blades one side of whose midrib doubles, and sometimes trebles, the other; of holly-shaped, fork-veined, and feather-like leaves respectively. These last mark the foliage of all that family of trees the fruit of which is contained in some sort of cup or bowl. The exactness with which in its tiny capsule the little "Pimpernel" echoes these grander "cupuliferæ" is the signal to Mr. Grindon for one of his characteristic outbreaks of poetic fancy, an allusion to Helen's quest of a meet vase of gold to offer to her gods. Prosaic folks will find marvel enough in his data about dotted leaves, which, however diverse in family, agree for the most part in being resinous, or aromatic. So it is with the leaves of the myrtle, orange, and lemon; and, not confined to tropical plants, these oil-specked translucent dots mark the familiar St. John's worts of our temperate zone. To discern them the leaf requires to be held between the eye and the light, for though one St. John's wort (Hypericum) is called "perforatum," the specks in question are oil-glands, not actual holes. In his remarks on the venation of flower and tree leaves, Mr. Grindon includes a recipe for copying these by the "chromotype" process, depending on chemicals and sunshine. The mention of these odorous leaves carries us to the sixth chapter, on scents and colours. Most persons are aware of the reproduction of the scent of the Indian fruit by the lemon-scented verbena of Chili, and of the more ignoble echo of cherry-tart in the heliotrope. But here we have the odours of peppermint and garlic repeated in divers flowering-plants of the Cape and of Jamaica, and the smell of musk given out by divers unconnected flowers of various class and clime. Here too we learn the curious property of the orchids, summarizing and recapitulating much that belongs to other classes of plants. Not only do some of them echo the musky odour; but others reproduce the fruit-scents—apple, citron, strawberry, and the aromatics—clove and cinnamon and vanilla. And we are reminded—after learning that odour is of the essence of a flower—how curious are the relations between colour and scent. "Blue and scent rarely go together. White flowers, as a rule, are fragrant; orange-coloured, brownish, and lurid ones are generally disagreeable." But it must suffice to have glanced at those interesting facts, as there are features in the intervening chapters which must not pass unnoticed. In discussing the echoes of the "flower," Mr. Grindon notes the twofold scope of their teaching and use—their physical and moral intent. He recognises in flower-life an echo of man's life. The physical end of both is reproduction; but he regards flower-life as having for its other office to assist man by its analogies and echoes to interpret the mysteries of his own nature. Our author delights in moralizing on these real or apparent analogies. Thus, after enumerating the echoes of different fashions of inflorescence by members of families whose normal floral arrangement would not justify such an echo, and noting how the azure Jasione, a flowret of the bell-shaped order, echoes the alien "Scabiosa arvensis," he is led by the seeming watch which the latter keeps upon the wayfarer from out of the hedgerow to touch the question of the "consciousness of flowers"—one which we might have expected him, with Wordsworth and the "Sketcher," to answer affirmatively. But he resists the amabilis insania, and holds theirs to be a much less elevated poetry than "that which contemplates the lofty indifference of nature" parallel with, but independent of, man's concerns and feelings.

Perhaps, however, it is when he contemplates "bract" and "calyx" (stalk-leaf and flower-cup), and stamen and pistil, that the variety of Mr. Grindon's research is most pleasantly apparent. In pp. 60–1 he shows how, in the grander Euphorbias of tropical South America and of Madagascar, what seems a superb scarlet corolla is only the leaf aping the colour of the blossom, the intensely coloured "bract" eclipsing the petal, the flowers themselves being comparatively insignificant beads. Our roadsides supply an illustration of this in the sage-like Clary (Salvia Verbenaca), of which the flower is insignificant in comparison with the tufty "bracts" of rose or violet. Upon this phenomenon the author remarks, "that wherever the subordinate part of a plant successfully emulates the aspect and complexion of a higher one, the latter foregoes its prerogative, and, though retaining all its functions and usefulness, becomes comparatively plain and unattractive." A compensatory law of singular interest! Again, after enunciating the rule of three or five calycine pieces in every evident corolla, according as it owns the queendom of lily or rose, he has a sound and instructive reflection on such exceptions to the rosaceous type as the fuchsias, the evening primrose, and the woodruff, all of which are four-petaled and have but four calycine pieces. He accounts for these as results of "some singular law of non-development, not yet visible to man," as is proved by "the incessant effort of individuals to attain the full or fivefold character." This effort is proved by abundant quinary examples of the above-named flowers, which are not therefore "monstrosities," but rather struggles to return to the normal type. Nothing in the lily tribes echoes the pentamerous structure of the rose, though the converse occurs in the ternary flower of the berbery. When liliaceous plants echo their rosaceous rivals, it is in tint and texture, due to their calyx and corolla appearing to be a flower of six petals. The calyx in the chief liliaceous tribes almost rises to the petaloid condition. A very quotable passage in this chapter is that which results from the author's observation of the so-called "sleep of flowers," and in which he notes how, in one way or another, the outer petals of flowers protect the tender inner parts from cold and wet. But we must refer our readers to it, as also to the main features of Mr. Grindon's interesting remarks upon stamens and pistil, filaments, anthers, pollen, and all the curious organisms for plant production, in which they will find not only a complete array of facts deserving to be known, but also many hints as to parallels and resemblances hitherto perhaps undreamed of. In every page we find the same tone of reverence for nature's perfect work. Touching upon the exceptional instances of solitary stamens, he bids us learn from "such curious withholding of parts and organs" nature's design "to show how easily, and at the same time how most thoroughly, she can accomplish a given end after apparently cancelling the means and instruments." Discussing, further on, the different movements of the anthers, with an aim to discharge their pollen, when he notices "the courtesies in flower-life" which are discoverable in some of these. In the centre of the Parnassia, a veined white flower of buttercup size and shape, > stands a conical purplish ovary, around which, while young, kneel five sulphur-coloured anthers. Presently one of these enlarges considerably; the filament elongates to such an extent as to enable it to incline over the ovary, which it kisses and then retires; meanwhile the anther of the next alternate stamen is swelling, and becoming lifted so as to enable it to fulfil the same design; then rises the stamen next alternate to the preceding one, and finally the two last rise nearly together, so that not one of the five is left absolutely to the last. Eventually all five (usually casting off their emptied anthers) lie back horizontally among their petals, forming a five-rayed star; in due time the ovary becomes a capsule of innumerable seeds, resembling the finest sawdust, and next year the ground is whitened anew with the floral snow.

We have said enough to show that the author of "Echoes" is gifted with a poet's vision and fancy; and we can cordially recommend the book to such readers as require an attractive cicerone to guide them across the threshold of botanical science.

A NOTICE prefixed to these volumes by the publishers informs us that the writer is "an accomplished member of a family whose name is conspicuous in Indian story"; and further, that, as she is now resident in India, the book has not had the benefit of her final supervision. Any blemishes are therefore to be set down to the author's absence, whilst her descriptions of society are to be accepted as at least first-hand. The apology must go for what it is worth in accounting for certain little defects in the narrative, which show a want either of literary experience or of careful correction, but which are by no means very annoying; they consist chiefly in certain unnecessary chapters by which the stories are eked out to their detriment as artistic wholes. The merit claimed for the descriptions may also be admitted in so far as they are obviously the work of a person familiar with the scenery. The claim, however, is rather misleading if it induces any reader to anticipate glowing accounts of Indian scenery, or very vivid pictures of Indian life. We should say that description is by no means the author's forte. There is a due sprinkling of the regular Indian names—we open upon such words as tiffin and dirzee and gharree and gindee, and many others used with abundant freedom—but they do not by themselves give a very strong local colouring. We are not brought any nearer to the Indian landscape, or to the indefinable atmosphere of Eastern life, than in any average book of travels, and most people are tolerably familiar with all the positive facts that they are likely to find mentioned. The stories have the fault, common with inexperienced writers, of being too much crowded with incident. The author is evidently afraid to an unreasonable extent of being dull; she will not give herself space to fill up the details of her plot; one catastrophe is hurried upon another till we are out of breath with the rapidity of the changes; and we thus have merely the skeleton of a novel, without the due covering of flesh and blood. Yet the author has some decided merits, which make one at least of the two stories very amusing. She is obviously full of a feminine impetuosity which gives a certain intensity to her style, and which occasionally leads to rather irrelevant outbreaks. For no particular reason, she explodes at one place into a totally irrelevant denunciation of the mobocracy, tyranny of brute force, and other evils illustrated, in her opinion, by the American war. She keeps more closely to her subject in denouncing the Sepoy rebellion, and exalting the marvellous heroism exhibited by her countrymen in 1857. "My pulse throbs to-day," she says in the character of one of her heroes, "as it did ten years ago, whenever I think of that tale of loathsome treachery and villanous cruelty. I could as soon find excuses in my brain, benevolence in my heart, towards the fiends of darkness, as to those their messengers on earth, if I let myself think of it; and therefore I may not think thereon."

Burns, we know, succeeded in finding a certain amount of compassion even for "auld Nickie-ben"; and we will hope that in time the author may learn to speak with less ferocity even of a mutinous Sepoy. Meanwhile her gush of vehemence, though rather out of character in the mouth of a male narrator, shows us a little of her real state of feeling. She is evidently in full sympathy with the genuine old Indian of the days before the mutiny or competition-wallahs; she partakes their prejudices, feels for their grievances, and is indignant with every one who presumes to find fault with them. She is exceedingly proud—and we have no wish to complain of her pride—of the great statesmen and soldiers who have built up our Indian empire. The worst villain whom she introduces is a wretched being who declares that "England is ripe for a republic," abuses a "vile aristocracy and a bloated priesthood," and is abandoned enough to hold that Englishmen habitually bully the natives and trample upon their dearest prejudices. This wretch is of course white with fear during an attack of the mutineers upon a small English garrison, and is threatened with immediate execution by a noble lieutenant in the army for making certain proposals savouring of treachery or pusillanimous surrender. The lady has certain qualms as to the propriety of actually striking a Hindoo, though one of her pet heroes is in the habit of doing so under provocation. He apologizes for his action to a lady fresh from England, but it is distinctly intimated that this is a fault on the right side. The unlucky native whom he knocks down, and who has committed the further unpardonable crime of getting rich at the expense of an incapable English employer—aided by the diabolical cringing and flattery practised by his abandoned race—is not suffered to escape without poetical justice. He is detected with rebel despatches, and summarily hanged, in spite of a feeble suggestion of the heroine that he might as well be pardoned. In short, the writer has a true feminine admiration of the most unqualified kind for her own countrymen and all their actions, and we can guess, without being expressly told, what is her opinion of Mr. Mill and Governor Eyre.

The principal moral of the book, so far as it has any particular moral, is the extreme difficulty of keeping out of debt in India. Of her two stories, the first depends almost entirely upon the fearful financial difficulties which involve an unlucky English family, the chief member of which is an engineer on an Indian railway. In spite of the best intentions on their own part, and owing partly to giving the Hindoo credit for some approach to honesty, they are ultimately brought to the verge of ruin; and the heroine is compelled to marry, with a view to serving her relations. In the other story, almost every person concerned is steeped to the very eyes in debt, and the most amiable find refuge from their troubles in a premature death. Indeed, there is a certain melancholy tone in both the stories, from the constant impecuniosity of all the actors, and the excessive mortality amongst them and their children. The author slays them right and left with an unmerciful hand, though she manages to tack a happy conclusion to a rather dismal story. If we were to sum up her accounts of Indian life shortly, we should say that the normal career of an Englishman in that unhappy country was to begin by getting into debt; then to marry, and get deeper into debt still; then to have children, who plunge him a degree further into the same hopeless bondage; and, finally, to be reduced to such a state that only two modes of escape are open—either the death of most of his family, which is highly probable, or the acquisition of a fortune by marriage or inheritance, which is scarcely to be expected except in novels. The natives have many faults, especially an unpleasant one of acting as leeches upon their masters' fortunes; but, if treated with a firm hand, they have also some considerable merits. These, however, are chiefly to be found amongst servants of the old school.

It is perhaps unfair to deduce from a novel any definite series of propositions of this kind. Probably the lady may have meant to give on the whole a different impression from that which her readers may derive. If she had written an essay instead of a novel, she would doubtless have given a more careful account of the matter. We will endeavour, therefore, to make her amends for any unintentional misrepresentation of her meaning by the willing admission that she shows considerable talent. The characters, though not drawn at much length, are forcibly sketched, and the ladies at any rate are lifelike and agreeable. The story called "The Wrong Turning" is, on the whole, very spirited. The plot is indeed bold in the extreme, and reminds us more of one of Edgar Poe's devices than of the domestic British novelist. The distinguished Count Schucksen invented by Captain Marryat may possibly have given the hint. That gentleman, as our readers will remember, is the butterfly of which Mr. Chucks, the boatswain, was the chrysalis. Having the good fortune to be left for dead in an officer's uniform, he passes himself off upon the Swedes as a British nobleman, and becomes an admiral in their service. The adventures of Mr. Elgin in "The Wrong Turning" are still more startling. By a lucky combination of circumstances he manages to assume the character of a rich cousin, who dies on board the same ship in which he is sailing, and who happens to be exactly his double in personal appearance. By this means he not only obtains admission into the Indian Civil Service, but, what is still more surprising, he manages after a few years to pass himself off upon the family of the man personated. He thus finds himself heir to a baronetcy and a large fortune, and provided with a pair of beautiful sisters, and a large circle of connexions and admirers. The story is so well managed that we are quite ready to yield that amount of credulity which may be fairly demanded for the appreciation of a novel. Indeed, given two or three very singular coincidences, there is no particular reason why the trick should not succeed under the peculiar circumstances described. The plot is very well adapted to produce the necessary situations for illustrating Indian life; and we must leave it to our readers to discover in the book itself the progress and ultimate fate of the virtuous impostor—for it is perhaps the most singular circumstance of all that the young gentleman turns out to be a pattern of admirable qualities. The other story is inferior in ingenuity, though there is a certain audacity in its construction. A young lady is supposed to have three lovers in succession. She returns the affection of the first two, one of whom turns out to be a scamp, whilst the other is summarily killed off; she then marries the third, without caring for him particularly, and the match turns out to be a very happy one. It would be a neat problem for a young novelist to work out this plot so as to make it tolerably natural, and yet to preserve our esteem for the heroine. When we say that the author of English Homes in India performs this feat very satisfactorily, we have implied that she has really some skill as a story-teller. And if she were a little less anxious to bring out morals about Indian society and politics, and would write her stories frankly, without any purpose beyond that of amusing her readers, we see no reason why she should not succeed exceedingly well, besides being quite as instructive as she is at present. If there must be a moral in a story, it should not be given raw, but be left for the discovery of the inquiring reader as resulting spontaneously from the whole character of the book.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

WHILE the fate of Livingstone is still in suspense, the attention of the geographical world is invited to the remains of another African traveller who has been frequently mentioned of late years. Baron von der Decken* does not appear to have enriched geographical science by any remarkable discovery. We find, at least, none recorded in this first volume of his travels, nor have we any reason to suppose that any was made by him. His claims to respect are derived partly from the literary merit of his work, and still more from his personal character and the almost unique position he occupies among African explorers. Noble by birth, and possessed of an ample fortune, he forsook the European society he was so well qualified to adorn, and devoted himself with astonishing persistency to the exploration of East Africa. Four unsuccessful expeditions failed to damp his ardour, and he perished in a fifth. To this title to respect will now be added the association with his name of a work of singular ability and interest. It is not properly his, for, although based upon his notes, it owes its attractive form to the pen of Dr. Otto Kersten, the companion of some of his earlier expeditions. Great part of its value is also due to the papers and sketches of a young Englishman, Mr. Richard Thornton, who, after leaving Dr. Livingstone's expedition, with which he was originally connected, joined the Baron, and perished with him. Thornton was a man of science, which Decken apparently was not. The value of his observations, and the graphic power of his descriptions, are handsomely acknowledged by Dr. Kersten, who has, indeed, frequently fused the notes of Decken and Thornton into a continuous narrative. We imagine, however, that the most interesting portion of this first volume is principally due to his own pen. It is the copious and picturesque description of the city of Zanzibar, the great centre of civilization and commerce on the inhospitable coast of East Africa. A more lively picture has rarely been traced. As a great commercial city, Zanzibar naturally exhibits an immense variety of nations, creeds, manners, and costumes. It may be compared to Singapore, which it greatly resembles. Such commercial prosperity naturally implies a degree of toleration, good government, and security for life and property, not often found in Africa. In fact, the state of feeling seems greatly to resemble that in Southern Arabia, so graphically described by Mr. Palgrave. The sovereign and his aristocracy are Arabs, the bulk of his subjects negroes, his guards Beloochees, and his revenue officers Hindoos. The Hindoos play the same part in Zanzibar as the Jews in Europe. They are the great merchants and bankers, and the Custom-house is entirely managed by them. Their ceremonial peculiarities are as marked and as troublesome as those of the most orthodox Jews. Each has his cow, which is more to him than wife and children. The Quakers of the East, they will on no account kill a serpent that may enter their houses, but conscience does not prohibit them from walling it up. The manners and customs of these various races are described with extraordinary spirit, and the account of the scenery and natural productions of the island is not less interesting. The latter part of the volume is richer in incident, but more of a piece with the ordinary narratives of African travel. It describes Decken's fruitless attempts to penetrate the interior, baffled by the treachery and perverseness of the natives with whom he had to deal. It is a weary record of disappointment, relieved by such interesting episodes as seeing eight lions in company, and shooting three rhinoceroses. Further expeditions will be described in the second volume. The scientific value of the present instalment is not great, but details of this nature appear to be held in reserve. The work is copious, and admirably illustrated by woodcuts and photographs from drawings, and by some beautifully executed maps. It is dedicated to the Princess Victoria of Prussia.

A work on the Byzantine Empire of the middle ages† deserves favourable notice as an industrious compilation of interesting facts, most of which are very little known. The writer would have earned much higher praise had he manifested a firm grasp or a wide view of his subject. He has all the materials for a brilliant picture at command, but fails to use them effectively from inability to generalize. The various morsels of information, extracted with laborious diligence from the historians of the Lower Empire, are tacked on to each other until the effect resembles that of a Byzantine mosaic—minute, quaint, and somewhat bewildering. The comments and reflections in which the writer indulges from time to time are rather of the commonplace order, and suggest that he has taken a just measure of his powers in attempting nothing more ambitious. As a compilation, the work is all that could be wished, and teems with curious information respecting all classes of Byzantine society, all branches of the administration, and the state of religion, literature, and commerce. It may suggest to others how fruitful a field remains open for historical research. The grand features of the period have no doubt been adequately exhibited by Gibbon, but the details remain to be filled in. The Decline and Fall would gain in value by becoming the centre of a system of auxiliary histories, supplementing the parent work by that exact and minute investigation of collateral points to which the vastness of Gibbon's plan forbade him to descend.

The correspondence of Ludwig von Ompteda *, Hanoverian Minister of State during the early part of this century, affords a most lively picture of the perturbation of the diplomatic world during the period of French preponderance on the Continent. After the occupation of Hanover by the French, Ompteda wandered from place to place, ever finding himself where the opposition to Napoleon was most active, and in intimate relation with the statesmen by whom it was principally conducted. The present volume comes down to 1800, a period when even the most resolute patriots had almost begun to despair.

Professor Mendelssohn-Bartholdy †, equally well known for his ability and his Austrian sympathies, endeavours to clear the Austrian Government from the reproach of having procured the murder of the French envoys to the Congress of Rastadt in 1799. He contends that the deed was committed by French Royalist exiles, but his reasons do not appear very convincing. There seems no doubt that the actual perpetrators were Austrian hussars, whoever may have employed them.

An anonymous history of Austria since the October revolution of 1848 ‡ is also designed as a vindication of the Imperial Government. The writer does indeed make large professions of impartiality, but his bias is sufficiently apparent. He is, however, much too able to exhibit himself in the light of a violent partisan, and it must be admitted that his leanings incline the right way. A more incapable set of men than the leaders of the Vienna revolt never existed, except perhaps the men who put it down. We shall see hereafter if the writer is disposed to deal as severely with the bigotry and narrowness of his own party as with the imbecility of their antagonists. The first volume of his work is entirely devoted to the October revolution. It is a work of much literary merit, and its copious stores of information would have rendered it very valuable had they been selected and displayed with reasonable impartiality.

"Photographs from the Hungarian Diet" § is not a very felicitous title, for the writer does not even attempt to photograph any one except the Premier, Count Andrassy. His sketches are all taken from the political point of view, and he betrays no sign of personal acquaintance with the subjects of any of them. In politics he is a decided adherent of the moderate party led by Deák, but moderation in party spirit is no article of his creed; and his portraits of the members of the Opposition are manifestly too much coloured by prejudice to be in any way trustworthy.

The contest between the Slavonic and the German elements in the Baltic provinces of Russia may appear a small matter at present, but will some day be recognised as a very serious one. A conflict between Germany and Russia would modify the political situation throughout the whole of Europe. Two recent works ‖, themselves only a portion of the literature of the subject, show what copious magazines of discord have been accumulated in the Baltic provinces alone. An independent member might moot the subject in the Prussian or the North German Parliament any day, and the mere discussion of it would go far to compromise the friendly relations which Court Bismark seems desirous of maintaining with Russia. The first of these books is devoted to the political, the second to the religious, grievances of the Czar's German subjects. The latter is by far the more interesting and ably written of the two. The complaints of the Germans are by no means unfounded. There can be no doubt that the St. Petersburg Government aims at completely Russianizing these provinces, and seeks to attain this end by a steady course of persecution, political, social, and ecclesiastical.

The most recent of F. Böhringer's series of ecclesiastical biographies * is devoted to Origen. It is an interesting work, free from dogmatic bias, and written in a clear and simple style. It is chiefly occupied with a copious analysis of Origen's writings, especially of his vindication of Christianity against Celsus.

Eckhart, the German mystic, is the subject of a highly interesting monograph by Adolf Lasson.† Little is said about his biography, for little is known except that he was a preaching friar of great learning, eloquence, and celebrity, that he flourished in the first quarter of the fourteenth century, that his doctrines were condemned by the Pope, and that he in a fashion retracted them shortly before his death. Herr Lasson's analysis of his writings is very exact and copious. Eckhart's thoughts are often of astonishing depth and beauty. His mysticism strongly resembles that of the Orientals. His position in the Church naturally gave it a decided Christian colouring, but this is evidently accidental.

The autobiography of the celebrated preacher Krummacher ‡ might have been expected to prove a piece of mysticism as well, judging from the opinion entertained of him in his lifetime alike by his admirers and his opponents. Both will be surprised by the writer's deficiency in fervour and unction, or in the conventional affectation of these qualities. He appears as a sensible, genial, and not intolerant man, principally distinguished by a clear perception of things as they are, and a knack of exposing the failings of others without seeming to intend it. The book contains numerous interesting sketches of celebrated persons and places. It is somewhat startling to learn that Professor Fries acquired popularity with his pupils at Jena by assisting them to draw up a code of rules for the regulation of duelling.

The tendency of O. Pfleiderer's § work on "Religion," and Marpurg's ‖ "Science and Faith," is conciliatory. Both evince the desire to impart something of a concrete character to philosophical speculation, and to take more account than hitherto of the human needs and emotions which find their expression in the various forms of religious faith.

Herr Maximilian Perty ¶ wishes to effect the still more difficult reconciliation between the belief in clairvoyance, apparitions, &c., and the spirit of modern scientific research. His collection of anecdotes is very rich and highly interesting, but, as usual, scarcely one case is properly authenticated. The few on which it would be safe to rely are precisely those which have least of a supernatural character. Herr Perty is much too easy in the reception of testimony.

Dr. von Hartmann  has prepared an agreeable surprise for readers repelled by the uninviting title of his work. He is, in the main, a disciple of Schopenhauer, and has followed his master, not merely in the nature of his philosophy, but in his clear and racy manner of setting it forth. A great portion of his arguments and illustrations are derived from physical science and the mathematics, and the consequent impression of firmness and reality is perfectly refreshing. The philosophy thus ably expounded is itself a strange centaur. One half of it abolishes the other. Dr. von Hartmann argues most cogently for the existence of design in the universe; yet he will have it that the cause of all things is unconscious, and the design itself undesigned. He powerfully exhibits the harmony, beauty, and benevolence of existing arrangements, and yet his pessimism surpasses Schopenhauer's, and almost caricatures it. He seems afraid of being thought less logical and consistent than his master. In fact, however, Schopenhauer's pessimism was no product of superior insight, but simply of wounded pride. His first works attracted no attention, and he easily convinced himself that a world which neglected him for thirty years must needs be a very bad one. Dr. von Hartmann has neither his predecessor's egotism nor his earnestness.

The great variety of the contents of J. Bergmann's Philosophische Monatshefte †† renders any detailed estimate of their merits impossible. The publication, however, may be recommended as one of considerable value to metaphysical students, who will find in it, not merely a copious collection of essays by various writers, but notices of the most important contemporary publications in this department.

The biographer of Emanuel Geibel ‡‡ has much, and not too much, to say about the difficulty of writing the biography of a man of letters in his lifetime. We are inclined to wish it were impossible. Even Herr Goedeke's dexterous execution cannot reconcile us to an undertaking so inconsistent with good taste. The author, to do him justice, recognises these objections, and employs the first pages of his work in proving, to every one's satisfaction but his own, that it should never have been attempted. He is, however, so fascinated by his hero's greatness as to be really unable to refrain. Now, a great Geibel is just as inconceivable as a little Napoleon. We would on no account disparage a most meritorious literary workman, but the honest truth is that Geibel is neither more nor less than a minor poet. His writings are charming alike in style and sentiment, but they are simply the refined productions of an accomplished man of letters. Herr Goedeke's point of view compels him to ignore these obvious considerations. He deems it of serious importance to humanity to be duly acquainted with the when, where, and why of each of the pretty fugitive lyrics that constitute the bulk of Geibel's writings. The biographical portion of his labours is executed on the same principle. He seems to be seriously of opinion that fifty incidents not worth telling are equivalent to one of importance. By this method of calculation his volume will be found to contain at least a hundred memorable events. We find it hard to believe that Geibel's own reputation will not suffer from this abortive apotheosis.

The task undertaken by J. J. Honegger * is too vast to be satisfactorily performed by any single writer. To give a satisfactory account of the civilization of the nineteenth century implies a degree of omniscience inconceivable even in an age of competitive examinations. The author, indeed, recoils from no branch of his subject, and would fain appear equally at home in the political, the literary, and the scientific department. It is, however, sufficiently evident that his knowledge is in many instances merely picked up at second hand. It is but natural that he should expatiate most freely where he finds himself most at home; we can therefore excuse the inordinate space devoted to German literature, although it certainly provokes a smile to see Eichendorff and Chamisso each occupying twelve times as much room as Shelley and Keats have between them. The work would be improved by the excision of everything that does not relate to Germany.

Karl Witte † must have devoted a large portion of his life to the study of Dante. The introduction to his collected essays on the subject, describing his original introduction to the great Florentine, and the successive stages of his acquaintance with his writings, is a really charming piece of literary autobiography. The essays themselves treat of a variety of subjects, most of which would only be interesting to very close students of Dante. They have appeared in various periodicals within the last forty-five years, which necessitates the frequent addition of postscripts to bring them up to the level of contemporary criticism. The style is exceedingly agreeable.

Professor Tschischwitz ‡ has at last done something more for Shakspeare than write ingenious essays about him. He has edited Hamlet in the style of a Greek play, with various readings, and a copious, but not diffuse, commentary, critical, philological, exegetical, and illustrative, at the bottom of the page. Nothing so comprehensive has, to our knowledge, ever been attempted before. The type is excellent, and the readiness of reference to the notes renders the use of this edition a real luxury. We believe that Dr. Tschischwitz has supplied the pattern which future editors will be obliged to follow. The other plays are to be published on the same plan.

A selection of German poetry with English versions, by H. E. Goldschmidt §, is noticeable as perhaps the only publication extant which supplies materials for an adequate estimate of the latter. The original and the translation are printed on opposite pages, which renders it a most desirable manual for students of German. This secondary character as a school-book may have proved injurious to the collection in an æsthetic point of view. To nothing else, at least, can we attribute the omission of Aytoun and Martin's version of the Bride of Corinth. Another peculiarity is the dependence of the compiler on the taste of others. He must follow where his translators lead, and can print no original of which he cannot discover a tolerable rendering. To this we must attribute the incompleteness and apparent caprice of the selection as a representative of German poetry—the entire omission of Novalis, Hölderlin, Lenau, Lingg, Schefer, and Geibel, and the extremely limited space accorded to Ruckert and Platen in comparison with Uhland and Freiligrath. So far as the editor's plan permitted, the selection has been exceedingly well made; the choice of English versions is usually judicious, and their standard of merit high, although there are some amusing exceptions. On the whole, the collection deserves to be cordially recommended.

The Zeitschrift für bildende Kunst ‖ contains its usual rich store of records of contemporary art, biographies of artists living and dead, essays on æsthetic subjects, and beautiful full-page illustrations. Some memoranda of the conversation of Cornelius are particularly interesting.

THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS.

THE leading Irish Protestants have decided, by a very small majority, not to petition the Lords to reject the Irish Church Bill, but to ask the advice of Lord CAIRNS as to what they had best do. It shows moderation and sense to have got even thus far, for a few weeks ago the Irish Protestants were in no humour to ask even their warmest friends what was the best course they could take. They were all for the most violent, determined, unhesitating opposition to a Bill so monstrous and so wicked. Now they have come to think that it may not be altogether possible for the Lords to reject the Bill, and that a petition begging for such a rejection might be inefficacious, because it would ask the Lords to do what they cannot do. It is much simpler to inquire of Lord CAIRNS what is the most prudent and effectual thing that the friends of the Church can do at the present crisis. But if this is pleasant and easy to ask, it is very unpleasant and difficult to answer. What the Irish Protestants are to do must depend on what is to be done in the Lords, and it will be the principal business of the Conservative party during what remains of the Whitsuntide recess to settle what it will be wise and possible for the majority of the Lords to attempt. This is a period of repose, during which the general political situation may be surveyed; but everything regarding the Commons is so simple, that there really is nothing so far to discuss or debate. The Ministry has the unshaken confidence of the country and of the House; its majorities are overwhelming; the discipline of its party is complete. If there are any symptoms of change at all, they are symptoms of change in the direction of advanced Liberalism. Mr. HORSMAN, who leant in a dangerous degree to the formation of Caves, has at length found a Liberal constituency to pardon his offence. But he enters Parliament again on the understanding that he is for the Ballot and for a large measure on the Irish Land question, and he has attempted to gain an exceptional position by a warm antagonism to the House of Lords. At Stafford a large section of the electors appear to regard with affectionate enthusiasm the claims of Mr. ODGER on the Liberal party. There is not in any section of the Liberal party, nor in any Liberal constituency, the slightest sign of wavering, much less of reaction. The very greatest amount of pressure, therefore, that could be put on the Lords to pass the Irish Church Bill will be put. If a collision between the two Houses is to be averted, the Bill must be passed; and if it is passed, it must be passed almost without alteration. It is almost exactly the old story of Free-trade and Protection over again. The House of Lords, being Protectionist, might have rejected a Bill for Free-trade in corn; but if it is to allow of Free-trade, it cannot make a Free-trade measure Protectionist. A Bill for the total disendowment of the Irish Church is a Bill that the Lords cannot like, but, if they accept it, they cannot change it into a Bill for the partial disendowment of the Irish Church. Exactly the same pressure would be put on the Peers to make them withdraw any amendments extending to the principle of the Bill as to make them pass the Second Reading. This is the great difficulty which embarrasses the Conservative leaders at the present time. What can Lord CAIRNS say to the Irish Protestants who ask him for advice? He cannot encourage them with any hope of an advantageous compromise; he cannot point out a plan of battle in which, if they will but help him, he may hope to be successful on their behalf; he cannot promise them that, if things are adroitly managed, they will not, after all, be so very much hurt. The alternative stares him in the face. He must either recommend them to petition the Lords to adopt amendments inconsistent with total disendowment, and therefore certain to be rejected by the Commons, or consistent with total disendowment, and then so insignificant that the most zealous Irish Protestant would not walk a hundred yards to secure them.

The one single hope that may, however, linger in the breast of Lord CAIRNS and his friends is that, although the country would decidedly not support the Lords if they rejected the Bill altogether, yet, if the Lords insist on amendments which may be made to seem tolerably fair, the country will not think them so much in fault, and that, opinions being divided and hesitating on the subject, the Lords may even manage to throw the Bill over until next Session with something like safety. The most interesting topic of reflection that can be found during the present recess is to ask whether there is any real basis for such a hope. It is not worth discussing whether Mr. GLADSTONE's Cabinet will accept amendments adverse to the principle of the Bill. They would, indeed, be foolish and weak beyond all belief if they did anything of the kind. They must have total disendowment, or go out of office. But is there any possibility that, if the difference between the two Houses were only about amendments giving the poor Irish Church a little more or a little less, a Government formed in harmony with the views of the Lords would have a temporary chance of life? Can any amount of adroit management or plausible argument persuade the country at the present crisis to be governed substantially by the Lords and not by the Commons? The question is worth asking; for although, on the average and as the general result of things, it may be true that the Commons govern, yet the Lords might sometimes govern, just as, although the majority of the House of Commons is said quite truly to decide the existence of Ministries, there have been three Ministries in the last seventeen years supported by an avowed minority in the Commons. We are thus led to inquire what is the present feeling of the country towards the Lords. Is it less favourable, or more favourable, than usual? In order to answer this, we may look back on the history of the past three months. Have the Lords up to these Whitsuntide holidays shown themselves to be in harmony with the spirit of the nation? On the contrary, they have, we think, shown that they are quite out of harmony with that spirit, and they have shown this all the more because they have not done or said anything outrageous. They have wished to be moderate, just, and useful. They have, above all things, implored to be allowed to take a real and efficient part in legislation. There has been nothing unfair, bitter, or personal on the part of the Conservative majority towards the Liberal minority. But it is precisely because they have done their best that the difference between them and the bulk of their countrymen has been made apparent. An assembly of very great landowners, of a few successful professional men, and of bishops, is evidently not an assembly which can bring itself into anything like real accordance with the Liberal constituencies. The Peers were almost clamorous for work at the beginning of the Session, and their importunities were rewarded with the permission to anticipate the Commons in the discussion of the Habitual Criminals Bill and the Scotch Education Bill. The former raised no party feeling, but the Scotch Education Bill offered many points for, not only political, but religious differences. Being sincerely anxious not to show themselves wholly impracticable, the Peers let the Bill go on, merely subjecting it to amendments. But the mode in which these amendments were framed and discussed showed the [illegible] any Liberal measure of importance in the Lords. It is there necessarily discussed without reference to the wishes of the people. The Government, of course, asserts that it is in harmony with those wishes; but this is only assertion, and the Lords, regarding the wishes of the people as a point in dispute, inevitably let their own wishes and feelings prevail. The unhappy Duke of ARGYLL must have over and over again wished that the Bill which he defends with so much zeal and courage had not been first introduced in an assembly accustomed to regard all such measures with inherent suspicion and dislike. The experience of what happened with regard to this Scotch Education Bill must tend to inspire the conviction that it is only in the House of Commons that Liberal measures can really thrive.

Even in the recent discussions on Irish land there was enough to show that the point of view from which the Peers regard political life is quite alien to that from which the bulk of Englishmen outside the House of Peers regard it. And here the Peers spoke with very considerable advantages. Mr. BRIGHT had been guilty of an indiscretion which seemed to commit his colleagues prematurely; the liberation of so many Fenians was a mistake leading to serious difficulties; the repeated murders in Ireland have excited general indignation. Many of the Peers spoke with great and long personal knowledge of Ireland, and the Opposition was only executing a fair party manœuvre when it tried to betray the Ministry into the suicidal blunder of sketching a Land Bill which they did not mean to carry. Nor was there anything in the speeches of the Peers that can be said to have been harsh, or domineering, or unpractical. They merely asked that the law should be upheld and that property should be respected. But then what they said had one fatal deficiency. It was all from one side. It was a mere chorus of landlordism. It absolutely ignored the Irish people, and their wishes and hopes and regrets. The thoughts that strike sorrow into the hearts of the general English public, the compassion and regret that overcome the mind when it is remembered that there are thousands of men and women born and grown up under British rule whose one hope in life is to escape from the blank horror, as they consider it, of our tyranny, seemed in no way to touch the Peers. An assembly discussing Ireland, in which the feelings of the Irish were no more represented than the feelings of the people of Timbuctoo—this was the attitude of the Peers. Compare with this what such a debate would have been in the Commons. There at least there would have been a play of feeling and opinion, a power of viewing a difficult subject from different sides, a sense of the immense difficulties that the subject presents. Discussion varies immensely both in its character and value according to the moral and mental atmosphere in which it is held, and the moral and mental atmosphere of the House of Lords is such that a discussion in it of such a matter as the Irish Land question cannot at present come to much fruit. The Peers are insensibly moulded from their birth into the belief that the feudal eminence and superiority which is their due may be justified, and is, so far as necessary, atoned for, by kindness, liberality, and justice. How are men so trained to judge of others who want neither their feudalism nor their virtues? The whole cast of mind of the ordinary peer makes him unfit to judge or to determine the class of questions which Ireland is now evoking; but when the audience he addresses and the political sphere in which he moves is entirely composed of people exactly like himself, his incapacity to deal with such question is necessarily intensified. That the country should be governed by the Lords, or under the influence or dictation of the Lords, seems therefore, at the present time, quite out of the question; and the considerations that lead us to this general result are far too wide to allow of their bearing being limited to the mere carrying of the Irish Church Bill. They show that the Bill must be carried; but they also show more; they show that the representative body in England must more and more throw the hereditary body into the shade.

THE SULTAN'S SPEECH.

THE SULTAN, following the example of the Crowned Heads of Christendom, has been making a speech. The matter and form of his discourse, however creditable and edifying it may be, is less remarkable than the fact that the Grand Turk should have spoken in public. For once the course of civilization, if not of empire, seems to take its way Eastward. If the SULTAN has been anticipated by his great Egyptian vassal in the importation of a Parliament, he may boast that he is the first Mussulman potentate who has delivered a Speech from the Throne. The new formality, although it may have in itself only a ceremonial importance, involves a virtual recognition of the superiority of European institutions; and, perhaps unconsciously, the SULTAN admits that he is no longer an irresponsible despot. Absolute sovereigns, content to command, have no need to argue or to persuade. An appeal to reason is inconsistent with a claim of final and unquestioned authority. If the SULTAN and his Mahometan subjects are really destined to reconcile themselves with modern usages, their unwonted docility must be attributed to a sense of national danger. Their ancestors three hundred years ago had the best standing army in the world; and now, although they are unsurpassed by any European race in soldierly aptitude, Turkey is no longer a match for any one of the great Powers. While the convenient but immoral practice of turning kidnapped Christian children into Janissaries has become wholly obsolete, more than half the population of European Turkey is exempt from liability to service. The Turks are perhaps morally and physically superior to their Christian neighbours, but an aristocracy, however warlike, supplies insufficient materials for a standing army. It therefore becomes necessary to reorganize the social and political system; and the SULTAN, himself one of the most orthodox followers of the PROPHET, has become convinced of the expediency of copying the ways of the prosperous infidel. It will not be surprising if the varnish of Western civilization is comparatively thin; yet Turkey has perhaps advanced as rapidly, since the destruction of the Janissaries by the present SULTAN's father, as Russia during the half century which followed the first reforms of PETER the GREAT. The imminent dangers which threatened the Empire in 1828, in 1840, and in 1853 have been successively averted; and the Cretan difficulty has within a few months been at last overcome. Although it may be true that while there is life there is hope, the mere continuance of vitality is not generally regarded as a ground of unqualified congratulation; but the SULTAN may probably have been well advised in assuming a cheerfulness which scarcely rests on a sufficient foundation.

As it is not incumbent on kings to write their own speeches, there is no impropriety in supposing that the address to the Council of State was composed by the GRAND VIZIER. More irreproachable sentiments have never been uttered by any Minister through the inspired mouth of his Sovereign. It cannot, in the words of the SULTAN, be doubted, at least for conventional purposes, that, "by completing and rectifying "laws the defects of which we have learned by experience, "and, on the other hand, by elaborating laws the utility of "which we have also learned, our country and our nation will "soon rise to the first rank of prosperity and civilization, and "daily increase in grandeur and power." It would have been at the risk of his head that the Vizier of some early AMURATH or SELIM might have propounded an implied doubt in the sufficiency of the Koran, and in the administrative omnipotence of the SULTAN. Through the mist of official verbiage may be discerned a curious simplicity of belief in the newfangled panacea of utilitarian legislation. Good laws have in truth an undoubted tendency to produce prosperity, but the rapid and visible transition from reform to grandeur and power indicates a pleasing reliance on popular credulity. It is not impossible that the Turkish mind, just opening to the beauties of civilization, may take Royal speeches in earnest; nor indeed is it likely that the professions of the SULTAN and his Ministers are wholly unmeaning. Any intelligent member of the Turkish Government must be aware of the importance of redressing the numerous grievances which cause or excuse disaffection. The experiment of admitting Christian members into the Council of State has not yet been fully tried, and probably it depends on the inclination of the Minister for the time being whether the recommendations of the Council are to produce any practical result. It will not be easy to attain that prosperity and grandeur which are anticipated as the immediate consequence of improved legislation; but a traveller who aspires to reach a distant summit is sometimes encouraged to proceed by the seeming nearness of his goal.

The SULTAN dilates with significant energy on certain economic propositions which apparently point to taxes or to a loan. It seems that the touchstone of civilization and prosperity is the solidity of the public credit, which is of course effectually tested by the facility of increasing the national debt. A few years ago the Porte was not sufficiently enlightened to borrow; but, since the utility of public credit has penetrated the Turkish mind, loans have been contracted with a readiness worthy of the most civilized and Christian States. In another paragraph of his speech the SULTAN apologizes for the great increase in the wants of the State. "If "one were to say that the necessary expenses of such or such "a State twenty, thirty, or even ten years ago, did not represent one-tenth part of the expenses of to-day, it would be no "exaggeration." Oriental arithmetic or rhetoric has always tended to the liberal use of figures, although in former times it was not the custom to disclaim exaggeration. With due respect to the SULTAN, a tenfold increase of national expenditure in ten years is not an ordinary result of financial experience. Within that time the expenditure of England has been somewhat reduced, and the outlay of France, of North Germany, of Austria, and of Italy, has been enlarged by a more or less considerable percentage. If such or such a State means Turkey, it is certain that the cost of civil and military administration has been largely increased, but scarcely in the proportion of ten to one. It is true that civilization is expensive, especially when it is created or introduced as a whole. The Turkish army and fleet are more efficient than at any former time, and improved guns and ships must be paid for; yet loans in time of peace are ruinous contrivances, and part of the increased estimates is entirely unnecessary. The SULTAN wastes enormous sums in building gorgeous palaces which are absolutely useless. Barbaric pomp offers an anomalous contrast to the political and economic doctrines which are so fluently propounded. "The facilitation of trade depends on "the number of railroads and roads, upon the employment of "capital and productive materials, and, lastly, on the existence "of a magistracy guaranteeing the full execution of justice." No statement could be more indisputably true; yet Turkey is as destitute of roads as Greece, and the money which might have been applied to the construction of railroads has been squandered on decoration. It may be hoped that the Government is serious in its professed desire to look forward rather than to dwell on the past. Reiterated expressions of a determination to reform the courts of justice probably represent the real conviction of the SULTAN and his Ministers. It will be long before the Mahometans admit the full equality of the Rayahs, but the public declarations of the SULTAN against exclusive bigotry may produce a beneficial effect.

In touching on foreign affairs the SULTAN has only to express unmixed satisfaction. The Conference of Paris decided the question which it considered, on the whole, in favour of Turkey, and the SULTAN is too little accustomed to just treatment to complain of the hesitating language of the assembled plenipotentiaries. He even affects to persuade himself that the friendly action of the great Powers is a result of his own respect for treaty-rights, and of his efforts to preserve peace. It was judicious to abstain from any reference to the statesmanlike vigour which was shown in the preparations for punishing Greek aggression. Peace was maintained, because Turkey was ready for war at a moment when none of the great Powers desired to precipitate a general conflict. The repression of the Cretan insurrection is mentioned in terms of reasonable complacency. The Turks have generally succeeded better in diplomacy than in administration, and they deserve credit for the firmness and sagacity with which they repelled every proposal of officious intervention. Russia, France, and Austria successively urged concessions which, even if they had effected the pacification of Crete, would have encouraged rebellion in the provinces on the mainland. The Turkish Ministers were acute enough to perceive that their patronizing advisers were divided among themselves, nor were they uninfluenced by the steady neutrality of the only Government which they are accustomed to trust. It is satisfactory to find that the SULTAN professes the most benevolent intentions towards his reclaimed Cretan subjects, as well as to all the other inhabitants of his dominions. Many of his good intentions will fail to produce practical results; but a long speech by the SULTAN, containing the most enlightened views of policy, is in itself a not contemptible measure of the progress which has been accomplished.

O'CONNELL.

THE late celebration of O'CONNELL's memory on the occasion of a removal of his remains to a new burial-place assumed, after the short interval of twenty-two years from his death, almost an antiquarian character. The few surviving friends who took part in the ceremony probably felt that O'CONNELL would now find himself in a strange and unfamiliar world. As in his time, Ireland is poor, clamorous, and disaffected; but the grievances which furnish a pretext for agitation, and the forces on which sedition relies, have in a great degree changed their type. A quarter of a century ago there was no external basis of conspiracy in the United States, inasmuch as the great Irish emigration commenced about the time of O'CONNELL's death. It was to France, and not to America, that SMITH O'BRIEN and his accomplices looked for aid; and within ten years the propagators of verbal treason have affected to reserve their allegiance for a French Marshal of Irish descent. It is a more remarkable fact that down to the close of O'CONNELL's career the claims of the occupiers to the whole or a part of the property of the landlords had never been publicly preferred. Then, as now, agrarian murders were perpetrated, with the connivance of the rural population; but no politician or orator had proposed the heroic remedy of confiscation. In O'CONNELL's youth the owners of the land were still creating petty freeholds for the purpose of increasing their own influence at elections, nor could his contemporaries fail to recognise the evils which had resulted from excessive subdivision. The independent Irish Kingdom which O'CONNELL, with doubtful sincerity, professed to desire, was not to be constituted by a social revolution, but to include peers and landowners, as well as a happy tenantry. It is possible that, if his active life could have been prolonged for another generation, he would have adapted himself to modern fashions; but one of his customary speeches, delivered at the present time, would fall flat on the ears of an Irish audience. In his better days, though his counsels sometimes amounted to menaces of civil war, he demanded measures indisputably just in themselves, and wholly within the competence of Parliament to grant. Like his successful imitators of the Corn-Law League, he invoked popular passion in aid of principles which admitted of scientific demonstration; and consequently the victory achieved by intimidation was a moral triumph. Even in his later and less justifiable enterprises, his objects were exclusively political, as far as they were seriously contemplated. Repeal of the Union would have rendered the working of the English Constitution impossible; but an Irish Parliament under the Imperial Crown might not have been incompatible with the existing order of society. The Union itself was then not half a century old, and for seventeen or eighteen years before its suppression the Irish Parliament would have been independent if it had not been controlled by the necessary practice of lavish corruption. O'CONNELL and his followers were not careful to recall the earlier history of the Irish Parliament before the repeal of the law which prevented all independent legislation. The prospect of success was never near enough to require the attention of the supporters or opponents of Repeal to practical details. If English statesmen of any party had taken the proposal into consideration, they would have been checked at the outset by the recollection of the Regency debates in 1786. The possibility that the powers of the Crown might be exercised by one person in Great Britain, and by another in Ireland, would have been, as far as Englishmen were concerned, a conclusive answer to the demand for Repeal.

The attainment of Catholic Emancipation left O'CONNELL in the condition of a victorious general on the conclusion of peace. His disciplined army, and his own genius and skill, no longer found legitimate employment, and there was a strong temptation to discover some new sphere of activity. His native gifts and his long practical experience would have made him the greatest of demagogues, even among a less congenial population than that which he served and governed. His magnificent voice, his eloquence alternately fiery, pathetic, and humorous, his legal astuteness, his ready enthusiasm, and his real or assumed religious fervour, made him the national representative and organ of every popular feeling in Ireland. His countrymen were carried away by his vigour when he was in earnest, and their intellectual quickness enabled them to appreciate the ingenuity of his bantering insincerity, and of his ready shifts and devices. The prototype whom he most resembled was the Sausage-seller in ARISTOPHANES, who browbeats and baffles CLEON by quicker wit and by superior audacity. An Irish populace is too clever to wish its leaders to share its own unqualified credulity. O'CONNELL, while he appealed with consummate mastery to legendary traditions, took care not to identify himself too closely with mythical politics or pretensions. His sympathy with the religious feelings of his countrymen was probably deeper, and it served his purpose to perfection. The Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy, with whom he treated as an equal ally, placed implicit confidence in the great popular leader, and supplied him with an invaluable staff of agents. When, from time to time, it suited his purpose to use seditious language, no prelate or priest disavowed his apparent designs. His occasional experiments in the field of Imperial politics were not successful. Within two or three years from the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill, Lord GREY's Government thought it necessary to prosecute him; and his alliance, formed in 1834, with Lord MELBOURNE and Lord JOHN RUSSELL, injured the Whigs in England more than it strengthened them by the support of O'CONNELL's disciplined brigade of Irish members. The final abandonment of the Appropriation Clause, and the subsequent accession of Sir ROBERT PEEL to power, restored O'CONNELL to his natural career of agitation. The profession of demagogue had become to him more indispensable than the accomplishment of any political project. He was perhaps soured by the discovery that he was thoroughly disliked and distrusted in England for the very qualities which raised his Irish popularity to the highest pitch. His reckless incitements to disaffection, his shameless mendacity, and his rude abuse of political opponents, justified a prejudice which was perhaps partly founded on his ostentatious devotion to Roman Catholic interests. Having no longer any terms to keep with his former associates of the Liberal party, he declaimed to excited multitudes on the propriety of dissolving a connexion which he can scarcely have hoped practically to disturb. If he had been agitating for any attainable object, and not mainly for the sake of agitation, it is hardly to be supposed that his spirit would have been utterly broken by a State prosecution, leading to a short imprisonment, and ending, with the aid of a technical quibble, in an ultimate failure of justice. He returned to the House of Commons amid the cheers of Lord JOHN RUSSELL and the more factious Whigs, but neither in England nor in Ireland did he resume political activity. A coarser and rasher body of demagogues began to tread on his heels, exciting the people to the civil war which began and ended in the historical cabbage-garden. He lived to lament the beginning of the famine, and he died at its close, as the inscription on his coffin records, on his way to the threshold of the Apostles. The implied inference that he was a devout Catholic may probably be true as far as his personal feelings were concerned. His public career was, from first to last, utterly inconsistent with the doctrines of the Syllabus which form the political creed of modern Rome. It is a curious illustration of the force of sectarian prejudice, that Catholics such as MONTALEMBERT revere the great demagogue as a hero or a saint, because he defended their cause with alien weapons. As he represented all the intellectual qualities and all the moral deficiencies of the Irish character, it is rather surprising that his memory is not more deeply cherished in Ireland than that his second funeral has been attended by civil and ecclesiastical dignitaries.

Since the time of O'CONNELL Ireland has advanced greatly in material prosperity, and the most flagrant of its political grievances is about to be removed; but Fenianism, supported by American hostility to England, constitutes a standing nuisance, if not a chronic danger, and the whole fabric of society is threatened by the attacks on the right of property in land. The place of O'CONNELL remains vacant, although released convicts and municipal agitators are fluent in treason. By a long course of just legislation, only once or twice interrupted by outbursts of English fanaticism, the upper and middle classes of Irish Catholics have been reconciled to the Imperial Government and Constitution. Schemes for the establishment of an Irish Republic formed on the American model, and proposals for the expropriation of landowners, would probably have been distasteful to O'CONNELL himself. The priesthood, although they have discouraged the Fenian conspiracy, take the part of the peasantry against the gentry of their own as well as of the hostile communion. Archbishop LEAHY, in his recent censure of the Tipperary assassins, is careful to avoid any advocacy of the rights of property. To him Catholic or Protestant landlords form a separate class, though they are fully entitled to immunity from shots behind hedges. Perhaps some improvement in political relations may be traced in the Archbishop's professed confidence in the present Ministry and Parliament. It might not be prudent to inquire whether the popularity of the Government depends in part on the indiscreet speeches which have been delivered by some of its principal members.

M. THIERS AND THE FRENCH OPPOSITION.

THE unusual length of M. THIERS's address to the electors of the Second District of the Seine symbolizes accurately enough the position held by him among the Opposition candidates. At this moment he is indisputably the foremost man among the adversaries of the Government, the man whose defeat would be most grateful to the authorities, whose success will give most employment to the Ministers in the Corps Législatif. The strength and weakness of the Opposition are alike indicated by this fact. M. THIERS is a statesman of long Parliamentary experience and great Parliamentary tact. The resistance, such as it is, which the EMPEROR has encountered in the Chamber since 1863 has been in a great measure the work of his hand. No one has known so well how to combine the scattered fractions of Liberal opinion in a common hostility to the Government; no one has been so successful in weakening the ties which bind the members of the majority to each other, and in snatching a vote here and there from the compact phalanx which moves at M. ROUHER's nod. Without M. THIERS the minority in the Corps Législatif might have been a rabble; with him it has become an Opposition. But this success, considerable as in many respects it is, is extremely limited in its scope. As in the somewhat similar case of Mr. DISRAELI among ourselves, it is essentially a Parliamentary success. His name draws crowds to the gallery of the Corps Législatif, but, except in the little world of newspaper readers, it awakes no echo out of doors. M. THIERS represents no party in the country, and the ideas which recur most often in his speeches are only partially shared by any existing group of politicians. Consequently, though no man has come so near to victory in the perennial conflicts between the Opposition and the Government, his oratorical triumphs always leave the impression of being their own end and their own reward. They may occasionally influence a vote or two in a division, but they are absolutely without effect on the feelings or the opinions of the French nation.

No one who reads his address will see any cause for wonder that this should be the case. The statement with which it virtually opens would of itself be sufficient to account for the fact. With all his shrewdness, M. THIERS has failed to understand the time in which he is living; otherwise he would never have told his constituents that the great question of the nineteenth century is whether free institutions are compatible with monarchical government. Without attempting, in imitation of M. THIERS, to determine what the great question of the nineteenth century is, it may be safely said that the question to which he assigns this exceptional pre-eminence has no claim to be thus regarded. The reconciliation of monarchy with free institutions is merely one aspect of the much larger problem, how to find a philosophical basis for the liberties which have hitherto been secured by custom and tradition. Every institution has in turn to submit to examination, and to justify its existence upon other than accidental grounds. When M. THIERS defines real freedom as a state of society in which a responsible Ministry carries out the will of the nation freely expressed by its freely-elected representatives, he gives us the form without the substance. Freedom has existed before now in the absence of these conditions, and even their presence has not always availed to secure it. The truth is, that M. THIERS belongs, by instinct and preference, to the régime of July. He has no eye for any wider questions than those which were then agitated; and consequently his programme of "necessary liberties" has but little interest for a generation which has learned to demand stronger meat than the advantages of trial by jury. M. THIERS's foreign policy is the counterpart of his domestic policy. Its character is essentially prosaic. It makes no allowance for ideas or sentiment. It is the very embodiment of prudent self-interest. There is no difficulty, indeed, in believing that it is popular just at present with a considerable number of Frenchmen; for the foreign policy of the Empire has been showy and unsuccessful, and the irritation excited by the latter feature may be easily confounded with a genuine distaste for the former. But there is something more congenial to the native instincts of the French nation in such enterprises as the emancipation of Italy or the occupation of Rome than in M. THIERS's proposed intervention on behalf of the Germanic Confederation. In the enthusiasm of a French democrat in favour of Italy, or of a French Catholic in support of the POPE, there is an element of magnanimity which is wholly wanting in M. THIERS's bourgeois anxiety not to let a rival trader secure a larger custom. The folly of the French Government in not preventing the German war in 1866 is an admirable theme for Parliamentary attack, but it is not a subject calculated to excite any strong feeling in the country. There is something undignified about these continual laments that France was foolish enough to permit what she is not strong enough to undo; and when coupled, as they usually are, with protests against increased armaments, they make the Opposition show to disadvantage as the petty and carping critics of a policy for which it is powerless to suggest a substitute. However true it may be that M. THIERS foretold what would happen when the evil was easy to prevent, he will hardly gain credence for his disclaimer of having "used the same language, after the event, for the vain pleasure "of blaming."

The increasing violence of tone observable in the extreme democrats may be to some extent the result of what they no doubt regard as the unnatural alliance between M. THIERS and the more moderate members of their own party. They see the Republican cause betrayed, as they think, by a system of tactics which allows its defenders to unite themselves, though only for a temporary purpose, with men who favour monarchical institutions, and who would even put up with the Empire if it secured to the Legislature the enjoyment of certain technical rights. Perhaps a readiness to make this last concession is, in the eyes of an advanced democrat, the worst possible symptom of a man's political state. His feelings towards the EMPEROR are not of a kind which admits of compromise. NAPOLEON III. is to him, not merely an enemy to be feared, but a traitor to be hated. The most ardent Imperialist cannot dislike the notion of a third party more heartily than the democrat of this type. He can draw no distinction between hostility to the Administration and hostility to the dynasty; it is all summed up in hostility to the man. To what extent this feeling prevails in Paris and the other great towns it is impossible to say. The apparently exaggerated precautions to which the Government has recourse on the very first appearance of discontent may very easily be misinterpreted. There may, of course, be an enemy in the background who is invisible to ordinary observers. It will be twenty-one years next month since the suppression of the last Socialist demonstration in June, 1848, and in that long interval the revolutionary forces in France may have found time and means to repair their shattered energies. Still, in a Government such as that of the Empire, even genuine alarm is not conclusive evidence of real danger. Officials easily contract a habit of exaggeration which may at last deceive themselves as well as others. A bureaucracy is by nature fussy, and the nervous dread of revolution which seems to actuate every Frenchman who has anything to lose, is not likely to be lessened by the reflection that, in the event of an outbreak, they are likely to be its first victims. Perhaps the simplest explanation of the late riots in Paris is also the most probable. Paris, like London, has its roughs, and the rigid supervision to which they are ordinarily subjected must make them the more anxious to seize the rare opportunity of asserting themselves which is afforded by the electoral meetings. That they sung the "Marseillaise" instead of whatever answers among French lyrics to "Tommy Dodd" or "When Johnny "comes marching home," may be attributed either to superior taste, or to their knowledge that their choice would give more annoyance to the authorities. Supposing that, in its origin, the riot in the Boulevard du Temple was of this character, the violence of the police was very well calculated to invest it with a political significance to which it had in reality no title. It is, no doubt, desirable that the ordinary street traffic should not be interfered with by large and vocally-disposed crowds, but as long as no further inconvenience was sustained, the case was scarcely such as to call for repeated charges by the cavalry of the Municipal Guard.

Whether the police authorities were acting on their own responsibility, or under the direct orders of the Government, and, if the latter, whether the Government was really frightened, or had an object of its own in appearing so, are points upon which speculation may range at will without any risk of being interfered with by the publication of any authentic statement. The charge of creating a disturbance in order to justify the continuance of repressive measures is so easily brought that it is as well not to believe it too readily. At the same time, although the riots, or rather the mode in which they have been suppressed, may make the Government additionally unpopular among the working-classes of Paris, there is so little chance that a different course would have made any material alteration in this respect that it may have been good policy to use Paris as an instrument for reviving a wholesome dread of revolution in the rural districts. For, at all events, it cannot be doubted that the effect upon the country is extremely likely to be just what the authorities would desire. The object of the EMPEROR, from the time that he mounted the throne, has been to make Paris no longer paramount in France. Its will has been overruled by the introduction of universal suffrage, and the danger of its giving effect to its will by physical means has been greatly lessened by the external changes which the city has undergone. The next time that Paris rises it will discover an additional meaning in the new Boulevards which it has cost so much to build. But the mere hint of an insurrection in the capital will probably do more than either bribes or threats to secure the votes of the provinces for the official candidates. Paris did not use its former supremacy so benignly as to make rural France indifferent to the prospect of its being regained by another revolution.

ARCHBISHOP LEAHY AND DEAN McNEILE.

TWO dignitaries—the one of the Roman Catholic, the other of the Anglican, Church—have just issued manifestoes. No two documents could possibly differ more in the spirit in which they are written, or in the purposes they are designed to serve. The manifesto of Archbishop LEAHY is couched in a vein of moderation, good sense, and practical wisdom; the manifesto of Dr. McNEILE is an effusion of the fiercest and most violent religious bigotry. Both manifestoes, however, may claim the merit of being singularly opportune. It was high time that a spiritual leader of the agrarian murderers of Tipperary should dwell on the guilt, should paint the inutility, and should in some degree trace the causes of the shocking acts of assassination which are endangering the peace and compromising the future of Ireland. It was also expedient that, at a moment when the Irish Church Bill is going to be submitted to a hostile assembly, the real theory of extreme Protestantism should be placed on record once for all. It may be doubted whether there is another man in England who could have done this so well as Dr. McNEILE has done it. There is no trimming, or shuffling, or shrinking from extreme language or extreme consequences, in the exposition of his views. He goes at once to the very end of the matter. He is for what he expressively calls the hopeless exclusion of Roman Catholics from British power, and for allowing them either to hold no land at all, or for providing that the amount of land they hold shall be always exceedingly small as compared with that held by Protestants. What he wants is simply the restoration of the old Penal Code which in the last century kept down Irish Roman Catholics as if they were alien savages or born traitors. Protestantism can only exist, he thinks, if this amount of repression is used, and he has the sense to see and admit that he cannot speak of Ireland alone. Throughout the whole British Empire no Catholic is to be allowed to possess beyond a bare modicum of land, and Catholics are to be excluded from political power, not only absolutely, but hopelessly. They are to be made to understand that, unless they renounce their religion, they are to be treated as recognised traitors. The Church of Rome is, he says, in undying, unwavering enmity to all Protestants, and to all Protestant sovereignties and institutions. All Catholics think that they have a perpetual claim, barred by no lapse of time nor by any quietude of possession, against all the lands of all Protestants. In this state of internecine war, which the nature of Catholicism renders perpetual and incapable of mitigation, Protestants are not only at liberty, but are bound, to use the weapons of self-defence, and to keep down by every means those who would crush them in a moment if they could get a chance. Have we really at this time of day to write the answer to views like these? No possible good could be gained by examining into the value of Dr. McNEILE's historical or theological statements. Let us admit that the theory of Catholicism is essentially adverse to the theory of Protestantism, and that Catholics never abandon the theory of Catholicism. But, at any rate, we may appeal to the records of experience—that is, to the lessons deduced from facts—as to the mode in which the world is governed. If these records prove anything conclusively, they prove that all the evils of Catholicism are intensified by the stirring up of fierce religious strife, and that all these evils are mitigated, while the good side of Catholicism, which Dr. McNEILE ignores altogether, is brought out and fortified, by the reign of justice, mercy, and moderation. Catholicism does not change, but Catholic nations change, and in these days are changing rapidly. They are drawing nearer to the standard which wise Protestants consider the essential merit of Protestantism. And how has this been brought about but by men having gradually learnt that Christianity was not in its nature calculated to thrive by differences of creed being followed out to their bitter end?

It is a great pleasure to turn from Dr. McNEILE to Archbishop LEAHY. His Pastoral is exactly what such a document should be. It speaks plainly as to the wickedness of the crimes committed in Ireland. It gives, in unmistakeable language, those results of his own experience and that of his subordinates which it is of deep importance to the public to know; and it aims at enabling men of all parties and creeds to approach the difficult question of Irish land in the right spirit. We learn from the pastoral that in the opinion of the Archbishop two things are certain—first, that there is no such thing as an agrarian conspiracy to commit murder in Ireland; and secondly, that nothing said by Mr. GLADSTONE or Mr. BRIGHT has had any appreciable effect on the minds of the class to which the murderers belong. It is true that these were the conclusions to which the English public was rapidly arriving after the best investigation it could make. We do not learn that there is no conspiracy solely from Archbishop LEAHY, for all the facts relating to the murders show that, with perhaps one or two exceptions, they were committed by individuals, each having some wrong or fancied wrong to avenge, and not by gangs of conspirators selecting one out of a number to be the assassin. The police may not know very much about the secret doings of the Irish peasantry, but they know enough, and the landlords and farmers know enough, to decide whether there is a social conspiracy now, like the political conspiracy of Fenianism a year or two ago. We are not aware that there is any exception to the universality of the testimony that no such conspiracy exists. Those, too, who know the Irish peasant best are equally unanimous in declaring that his feelings about the land are far too ancient and far too deeply rooted to permit any great increase in their strength to the vague generalities of Mr. GLADSTONE, or the impracticable schemes of Mr. BRIGHT. The plain fact is, that there are at least some districts in Ireland where neither landlord nor tenant consider the land as a mere article of commerce, as to which both parties are free to make the best bargains they can. The tenants think the whole land-owning class, without reference to religion, a set of intruders who have got hold of what ought to belong to the tenants, or, more vaguely, to the Irish people. In consideration of the long possession of the intruders, and from a sort of dim respect for law, they are willing to pay with more or less regularity a rent to the landlord, provided that its amount is not raised, and that the landlord interferes in no way with the land, except simply to receive from it such rent as may be paid. The landlords, of course, do not admit this view to be right, and it is evidently totally alien to the whole theory of property in land which has been introduced into Ireland from England. No one could think for a moment that the landlords are to blame for not recognising or adopting this view; but the important point, the point which will inevitably have immense weight with those who desire simply to do justice, is that the landlords do really admit this theory in a measure. They have been so inoculated with the fervour with which the peasants maintain their view, that they have come to admit that to use the law to turn a tenant out of his holding requires a special moral justification. They think it incumbent on them to justify those who are shot by showing that, even on the theory of the peasants, the victim of assassination was not to blame. Whether this customary modification of the English theory of landed property ought to be recognised in any way, or any value to be attached to it in future legislation, we consider it wholly premature to inquire. Schemes for settling the Irish Land question framed hastily by Englishmen are worse than foolish. What England has to do at present is to acquire materials for dealing with Ireland justly, and to prepare itself for using those materials in a wise and comprehensive manner.

Everything depends on the temper in which such a subject is approached, and if it is the business of Englishmen to take care that they are not carried away into extremes, either by landlordism on the one hand or by socialism on the other, it is the business of men like Archbishop LEAHY to take care, if possible, that Irishmen do not in their folly throw away the bright chance they now have of getting from England all they can fairly ask. As it is truly said in the Pastoral, Mr. GLADSTONE's exceptional strength at the present moment entirely rests on the support he receives from public opinion in England. If Ireland irritates England, seems wholly unworthy of the efforts made to deal fairly by her, and reddens her hands in a succession of secret murders, the best feelings of England may die away, and the worst come into fearful activity. The Archbishop, however, goes far beyond merely entreating his countrymen not to shoot unoffending, unsuspecting men from behind walls and trees. He appeals to them to trust Imperial legislation. He points out to them that, if they do trust it, they may really hope to get from the Parliament at Westminster all that it can be for their true good to have. This, we believe, is not going in the least beyond a true description of what England is willing to do for Ireland. There is a right mind and a right spirit, as regards Ireland, which the Liberal constituencies will not put away from them except under great provocation; and the agrarian murderer is the only person from whom this provocation is likely to come, if peace is preserved between England and foreign Powers. A war may, undoubtedly, betray a sympathy in Ireland with the enemy which would overwhelm England with surprise and indignation; but, so far as political foresight can reach, we may safely say that, if the Irish assassins do not spoil the prospect, the Irish Church Bill will become law this Session, and will be followed by an Irish Land Bill next Session. It is so important that property should have its due rights maintained, and it is so dangerous to dally with schemes of communism, that Englishmen may be very well satisfied that the Land question should have been first ventilated by the Peers, and that the first appeal to public opinion in England should have been made by the great proprietors, and their case set up as needing to be shaken on very good grounds if it is to be shaken at all. But Irishmen may rely that England will in turn hear other people too, and that the subject, before it is done with, will be considered, not only as it regards the passions and interests of individuals, but also as it affects the whole Imperial policy of the United Kingdom.

SPAIN.

THE majority of the Spanish Cortes, although it has not yet discovered a King, is determined to found or to retain a Kingdom. It may be conjectured that the motives by which its decision has been influenced are chiefly negative, arising from the uneasiness and alarm which are associated with the name of a Republic. In all parts of Europe, and especially in Spain, the most active Republicans are the assailants, not only of royalty and of privilege, but of property, of social arrangements, and of religious creeds. In the great cities of France extreme Republicans affect to regard the Democrats who hold the faith of 1848 as antiquated pretenders, incapable, through cowardice or dulness, of understanding the true meaning of equality and freedom. The party of innovation, even where it is strictly moderate, or even aristocratic, always shares the discredit which attaches to revolutionary extremes. When JOHNSON asserted that the Devil was the first Whig, he can scarcely have thought that WALPOLE, PELHAM, CHATHAM, and BURKE were irreconcilable enemies of order. The more temperate Republicans in all countries aspire to the American type of democracy, which is liable to the charge rather of prosaic monotony than of dangerous originality. The Spanish Republicans who stand on the same level with Mr. BRIGHT or Mr. LINCOLN would have little difficulty in establishing the form of government which they approve, if they could dissolve their unwilling connexion with orators who denounce Christianity and property as mischievous superstitions. The Cortes are determined that no system shall be at present adopted which will appear to the community at large a symbol of subversion and anarchy. The Crown is accordingly still to be the object of constitutional veneration, although it must for a time hang on a bush, in the form of a regency. It is believed to be nearly settled that SERRANO is to exercise the Royal power in the name, not of an absentee, or of a minor, but of a King who has still to be elected; and the Assembly which applauds the eloquence of democratic opponents of the project will probably decline to accept their guidance. According to the legal maxim, that is certain which can be ascertained; nor is it doubtful that the Cortes has full legal capacity to designate the future sovereign. The moral difficulty of a choice only increases with delay, and an indefinite interregnum might be thought scarcely distinguishable from a provisional Republic; yet an ingenious Conservative would contend that the principle of monarchy must be inherently sound, when its abstract expediency is successfully asserted in the absence of any concrete or personal representative. It is perfectly true that the countries where royalty is most firmly established have the smallest difficulty in dispensing with the actual intervention of the sovereign. GEORGE III. was, during several years of his reign before his final illness, frequently incapable, from insanity, of transacting any kind of business. The Ministers made it their business to conceal the temporary aberrations, and Parliament deliberately connived at the irregularity. On one or two occasions both Houses ordered the Great Seal to be affixed to Acts which they had passed; and a daring Chancellor once ventured to consummate a similar fiction on his own responsibility. A superficial theorist might have supposed that a prerogative which could be so paradoxically treated had become insignificant or obsolete; yet personal loyalty was to that generation a genuine feeling, and there was scarcely a professed republican in the United Kingdom. The supporters of monarchy in Spain, although they are guided by considerations of utility, are not unmindful of the influence of a Crown on the popular imagination.

Some of the arguments of the Republican party, although to Englishmen they seem inconclusive, may perhaps have been well adapted to a Spanish audience. The effect of first principles and of antithetic generalities in Parliamentary debate is in exact proportion to the political inexperience of speakers and listeners. No man of business cares for the see-saw formulas by which it may be demonstrated that, if he is not to oscillate to the left, he must swing to the right. Mr. GARRIDO, in an eloquent argument for a Republic, lately proved, to the satisfaction of his party, that the national sovereignty was incompatible with hereditary monarchy, because there cannot be two sovereign powers. It is evident that the inconsistency depends on a tacit and double assumption, that a king must be absolutely as well as nominally inviolable, and that a free nation can practically recast all its institutions at pleasure. It migh have been thought that the summary deposition of ISABELLA II. furnished a sufficient illustration of the ultimate responsibility of kings. The people, according to Mr. GARRIDO, abdicate their rights by delegating them to any authorities which are not moveable and revocable; but the term of office of a President or of a Deputy is in theory as inconsistent with so-called national sovereignty as the duration of a dynasty. Ancient Greek politicians thought that the distinctive excellence of a republic or free commonwealth was the subordination of arbitrary discretion to fixed and immutable laws. The Athenians were so profoundly convinced of the possibility of illegal legislation as to hold the proposer of a decree which might perhaps have been unanimously passed by the sovereign Assembly accountable during an indefinite time, in life and in goods, for the lawfulness of the measure. The Americans, after submitting for seventy years to the restraints of a written Constitution, are now anxiously concealing from themselves, by evasions and legal fictions, their gradual resumption of the full powers which are regarded by Spanish Republicans as the essence of national sovereignty. In another part of his speech Mr. GARRIDO contended, with force and plausibility, that the adoption of the Republic would strengthen the cause of authority and law. It seems not impossible that, in the first instance, or perhaps permanently, a formal concession to popular demands might detach the moderate Republicans from their revolutionary allies. Spaniards alone can judge of the comparative advantages which might accrue to the cause of order from either of the opposite systems; and the solution preferred by the majority of the Cortes may be fairly supposed to correspond with the deliberate judgment of the nation. It may be assumed that the unasked advice of GARIBALDI will, if it is noticed at all, be regarded as an impertinence. It is unlucky that a gallant and profoundly ignorant adventurer should mistake his own vocation so entirely as to affect the character of a cosmopolitan promoter of republics. The Spaniards, whatever may be their defects, have nothing to learn from the contriver of Aspromonte and Mentana. The Republican party will not acquire or deserve general confidence by seceding from the Cortes, in accordance with the advice of some of their leaders, when the monarchy is finally sanctioned. The unwillingness of minorities to submit to constitutional defeats is one of the principal impediments to free government in Continental Europe. In the United States the divine right of the majority has never been questioned but once, and the deviation from established rule cost half a million of lives, and a thousand millions sterling in money. The clerical Deputies who have already left the Cortes may be excused for abandoning an impossible position. The accidental excavations which have discovered the corpses of murdered heretics in the Burning Place of the Cross would alone have determined the Cortes to reject the pretensions of the clergy to the maintenance of ecclesiastical supremacy.

Thoughtful Spanish politicians probably attach greater importance to the constitution of the army than even to conflicting forms of government. For many years there has been no instance of a political revolution accomplished by any other than military agency, and there is sufficient ground for the warning addressed to the Cortes by TOPETE in last Thursday's sitting as to the natural termination of an indefinitely prolonged period of suspense. The chiefs of the army and navy who dethroned Queen ISABELLA still form the Executive Government, and one of them is universally believed to have no intention of relinquishing his actual power. SERRANO may be Regent, but the Commander-in-Chief, as long as he retains his post, will be Regent over him. A general, however, is, as TALBOT told the treacherous Countess, nothing without the soldiers who are the limbs and sinews of his power. The problem to be solved by PRIM is the replenishing of the ranks at the end of existing terms of service. The conscription, which is in France almost popular except with its victims, is the object of universal detestation in Spain. At the same time every statesman worthy of the name condemns the principle of a National Guard, or, in the language of a former advocate of the system, the organization of bayonets which think. An enormous bounty fails to attract volunteers, and consequently, if an army is to be maintained, compulsory enlistment is unavoidable. Spain is in no danger of invasion from abroad, but it is difficult to understand how any Government can dispense with the command of a considerable armed force for the suppression of disorder. The insurrections of Cadiz and of Malaga would have triumphed if the Ministers had not been able to despatch regular troops to the seats of rebellion. It is also certain that, but for reinforcements despatched to the aid of the colonial Government, Cuba would have been lost. The article in the Constitution which declares that all Spaniards are bound to aid in the national defence, although it seems primarily to point only to defensive armaments, will, under the pressure of necessity, be held to authorize a conscription. If political questions must unfortunately be decided by superior force, it is, on the whole, better to rely on a regular army than on irregular bands.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.

THE Endowed Schools Bill has emerged from the Select Committee to which it had been referred, and the reference has not been fruitless. The Bill, as prepared by the Government, consisted of two distinct portions—a provisional measure by which existing schools were to be improved and the means for establishing new middle schools were to be found; and the machinery of a permanent Schools Commission, under the authority of which all those schools, new and old, were to be maintained in efficiency. Obviously there was no immediate occasion for doing the two things at once. The venerable precedent of Mrs. GLASSE's hare seems here to apply, and the prudent example set in University reform, in which the authorities were offered time and opportunity to reform themselves, with the still more recent instance of postponing the future relations between the disendowed Irish Church to the greater and preliminary necessity of disendowment, has not been thrown away on the Select Committee. The original Bill of the Government has been cut in two, and the Select Committee have only retained the provisional half; and it is understood that the measure for constituting the permanent and executive Educational Council will be postponed till the next Session, already so rich in golden promises. Most of the objections—and they were not very formidable—urged by ourselves and others against the first part of Mr. FORSTER's original Bill have been fairly canvassed and met; and, as it is acknowledged on all hands that no reasonable objection can be taken to its provisions in their amended shape, there can be no doubt that the Bill will be passed with little or no opposition. In one quarter, that of the trustees of the multitudinous charities of the City of London, an organized and formidable opposition, based on no unreasonable grounds, to some of the provisions for dealing with charitable endowments left for other than educational purposes, has signified from Sion College its intention of offering no objection to the amended Bill.

The first objection felt in several quarters to the Bill in general was that it was rather like legislation under panic. The defects of many endowed schools were so scandalous that there was a temptation to pass a crude and hasty measure; and in the zeal of many promoters of middle-class education there was, or there was suspected to be, something of one-sidedness and crotchetiness, and at least an excess of anxiety for an immediate and pressing object, scarcely weighted by sufficient discretion and temperance in dealing with so delicate a question as that of conciliating, while superseding, local authorities. Nor are we quite assured that public opinion is sufficiently matured to make it practicable to do the whole thing out of hand. A temporary Commission clearing the ground, inviting internal reforms in old and badly-managed schools, settling principles by which useless endowments have to be utilized, creating and educating a general interest in the subject, will render the work of the permanent Commission comparatively easy, will give everybody time for mastering a subject about which public knowledge is vague, and public interest not very active. Most of the local objections will melt away when time is given to local authorities both to think over the necessity of reform and to settle for themselves what form of organization for a purpose strange and unfamiliar to them old institutions and endowments should take.

We proceed to specify the modifications introduced by the Select Committee. In the original measure, as relating to existing schools, and providing for the future that no special religious instruction should be enforced in the re-settled schools, it was assumed that a school had no religion in particular, unless where expressly named by the founder, or by the constitution given at the foundation of the school. In these cases, and in those alone, the existing religious or denominational character was not to be interfered with; but this religious character must be proved by documentary evidence. In the amended Bill, specific religious instruction settled, not from the date of the institution, but within fifty years of the founder's death, is to be held sufficient proof of a special and denominational religious character, and secures the school from non-interference in the existing religious instruction.

The original Bill excepted from its operation foundations not more than thirty years old; in the amended Bill this age of non-exemption has been prolonged to fifty years. Again, in the original Bill the initiation of new schemes was in all cases to be left to the Commissioners. The Commissioners were to construct the new constitution, and send it down to the local authorities and governing bodies, to whom was left the power of objecting and suggesting modifications, but nothing more. In the amended Bill, a somewhat complex sliding scale of initiating reforms and new constitutions has been adopted in the case of large endowments (1) of more than 10,000*l.* a year, (2) of more than 2,000*l.* a year, and (3) in the case of wholly educational endowments of a gross amount exceeding 1,000*l.* a year. In class 1 the governing body is allowed twelve months, and in classes 2 and 3 six months, to start and propose a prior and initial scheme of reform and re-appropriation of their funds, which local propositions and schemes are to take precedence of any draft scheme from the Commissioners. In the case of lesser endowments the governing body may propose an alternative and confronting scheme with that drafted by the Commissioners, and may insist on its being considered concurrently with that of the Commissioners.

Mr. FORSTER'S Bill proposed that, in the case of doles in money or kind, marriage-portions, endowments for the redemption of prisoners for debt and captives in slavery, loans, and other miscellaneous and effete charities, the Charity Commissioners might confiscate or appropriate such endowments for the purposes of middle-class education. This is the clause which provoked such strong objection in the City, seeing that it not only superseded all local authorities, but drew no distinction between large and small parishes, in some of which the endowments for apprentice fees and loans were found to be very useful. In the amended measure the loan endowments are omitted, and in all other cases of such miscellaneous endowments and charitable funds they can only be diverted from their original purpose on the petition of the trustees and governing bodies, while security is to be taken that, on their re-appropriation and re-settlement, the interests of persons in the same class of life as those for whose benefit they were originally given shall be maintained. Further, in the original measure no appeal was given to a Head-master, dismissed at the pleasure of the Commission; in the amended Bill this appeal is recognised and provided for, though not very clearly. And, finally, in the Bill as amended by the Select Committee, the security of the non-educational parts of mixed foundations is better provided for.

One provision of the original measure which may be thought open to controversy is left untouched—namely, the period of three years within which the powers of the temporary Commission are to be exercised. And we may add that, while quite sufficiently stringent powers are given to the Commissioners to dismiss an incompetent master, we might wish that a parallel discretion had been left to them of deposing any governor or trustee whose continuance in office might be found prejudicial to the foundation. But, on the whole, little fault is to be found with the amended measure. As regards the general object—that of the reform of our wasted endowments—no difference of opinion prevails; and while, on the one hand, the important principle is conceded that charitable endowments which are not now applied to education cannot be so applied without the consent of the existing local authorities and governing bodies, on the other hand, the most questionable features of the original Bill, which are chiefly to be found in the second part, are at least postponed. We may well wait for what is most important, the character of the proposed permanent Commissioners, on which the success of any legislation must mainly depend. Their names, numbers, and personal qualifications are all of the first moment. We should hope that the same temperate and conciliatory spirit which has animated the Select Committee will have its influence in settling the permanent provisions of the measure. We shall have ample time and opportunity to canvass the propriety of excluding from the operation of the Bill the seven greater schools, for the inclusion of which Dr. TEMPLE, so far at least as Rugby is concerned, so strenuously appeals. It is argued, and the argument appears to be weighty, that the proposed examination of all endowed schools coming under the Act by examiners appointed by the permanent Educational Council will give rise to many practical difficulties. The powers of such examiners will have to be strictly defined. Already in primary schools the crotchets and special tastes of particular school inspectors are too carefully studied by village masters and mistresses; and the whole cause of middle-class education would suffer under examiners with a twist, a bias, and a specialty, as they say. Again, to require a certificate of fitness for a head-mastership to be granted by the Educational Council, or by the Committee of Council on Education, in the case of graduates even in honours, would undoubtedly have only the effect of discouraging men of high attainments from taking the office in grammar and middle schools. These are the most prominent defects of the second, and postponed, portion of the Government measure. And before we quit the subject we may be allowed to remark that, in settling the future of these middle-class and endowed schools, it must be borne in mind that no cast-iron and uniform scheme ought to be assumed either by the Permanent Commissioners or their Examiners. There will be middle schools and middle schools; and just as middle-class society and middle-class requirements shade off into those of the higher and lower social ranks, so ought the schools and their education to do. There ought to be at least a first-class, upper middle-class, middle-class, and lower middle-class. The Inquiry Commissioners have already, it is feared in some quarters, betrayed something of a doctrinaire character in what they have forecast as the ideal of the standard-middle school. Machine-made schools and machine-made masters and an unelastic examination will certainly not perpetuate the present abuses and defects of English education, but they will import new ones.

THE MONEY-MARKET.

THE recent advance in the price of money is by no means the worst of the symptoms that have clouded the aspect of trade for the last two or three years. That money should be comparatively scarce is a less serious indication than that money should be as plentiful as the market rates showed it to be for month after month, and almost year after year, and yet that the industrial enterprise of the country should have sunk to so low an ebb as to be unable to employ it to advantage. Ever since the last panic, now so far back as to be almost an historical event, trade has languished as it never languished in this country before. Some improvement has been traceable within the last few months, and, to some slight extent, the increased demand for money may be due to greater commercial activity. But the recovery has as yet been so slight that it is impossible to attribute to it effects so considerable as to have raised the rate of discount from 2 and 2½ per cent. up to the present standard of 4½ per cent. The movement seems rather to be due to the lack than the excess of activity at home. When it was suddenly discovered that Companies with an aggregate nominal capital far exceeding 100,000,000*l.* were worthless bubbles, that more than 20,000,000*l.* had been actually paid up for the benefit of promoters and financial agents, and of scarcely any one besides, when some of the largest railway undertakings were so discredited by fraud and extravagance as to throw doubt upon almost the best of railway debentures, it was not surprising that the closing of so many of the ordinary channels of investment should have caused a glut in the money-market. If trade had been vigorous enough to take advantage of the opportunity, the abundant supply of capital would have rapidly flowed into remunerative ventures; but the same distrust which had shaken all confidence in Company securities had at the same time sapped the foundations of legitimate trade. It was a problem at the time where all the money that was floating about was to be placed, and the result, as many persons anticipated, was that investers, finding no field at home, and unable to get a fair rate of interest in any English investment which they were disposed to trust, set themselves to seek opportunities of sending their wealth abroad. Notwithstanding the repeated acts of repudiation of so many borrowing Governments, almost any foreign loan became a more tempting investment than could be found within the four seas. Even the wretched Republics of South America continued to find purchasers for their bonds without discontinuing their old habits of dishonesty. Only the other day the Minister of one of these indebted States, with an effrontery developed only in Spanish blood, coolly announced to the foolish creditors of his penniless State that impossibility of payment was a legitimate ground for repudiation, and that his Government was unfortunately incapable of any longer devoting to the payment of interest the proportion of its Customs' duties which had been assigned as a security for its bonds. It is puzzling to guess who the original bonâ fide subscribers for such securities can be, but the fact is certain, that for a long time past English capitalists have preferred the bad faith of foreign Governments to the not more flagrant, though perhaps more astonishing, bad faith of native Directors. The result has been that the wealth of this country has been poured without stint into the coffers of foreigners, until at last the hoard begins to show signs of depletion.

The suddenness of these indications admits, we believe, of an easy explanation. For a long time after the close of the American war, United States bonds were mistrusted in England, in consequence of the ill-judged threats of repudiation with which the Americans strove so energetically to damage their own position. As soon as it became evident that the tide had turned, and that both the PRESIDENT and Congress were disposed to adopt the better policy of honesty, American bonds grew into favour here, as they had long before done in the Frankfort market. At the same time, the Atlantic cities of the States rushed into commercial ventures with more ardour than had been known for many years, and the inevitable course of trade consequent on these conditions was a very rapid absorption in England of American bonds, and a dangerously active importation from Europe into the States. So long as England and other countries were ready to take payment in United States securities, there was nothing to stay the westward flow of capital, and this, added to our previous large investments in other foreign bonds, produced the comparative scarcity of money which is symbolized by 4½ per cent. There is nothing at all to be regretted in a rise of price which may check a drain in every way mischievous to the interests of this country. That an individual investor gains by preferring a foreign security more profitable than any he can find at home, and equally safe, cannot be doubted, and political economy forbids any interference with the natural flow of capital. The world grows richer by capital being taken to the place where it can be used to the greatest advantage. But political economy is terribly cosmopolitan, and though the world may grow richer, the lending country may become incalculably poorer by the operation. The actual lenders fare well enough, provided their calculations are sound, but all the indirect benefit gained by the stimulus of home investments is transferred to other nations whenever foreign loans become, as they have long been, the favourite security of the market. It may be that the higher rates now prevailing may divert a larger share of the capital seeking investment into home channels, and, if so, the approach to stringency will be an unmixed good. And there are, it is true, some little signs of a movement in this direction. The cotton trade is still depressed, but there can be no question that a sluggish and gradual revival is going on in most departments of commerce. It may be traced in the daily reports from the manufacturing districts, and it is plainly visible in the Board of Trade returns. But the recovery is still very slow, and either those engaged in trade lack the opportunities or the courage to extend their operations, or else the possessors of available capital still retain too much distrust to be ready to advance it as freely for such purposes as they do in more prosperous times. The higher rate of discount ought to check, and seems already to have checked, to some extent, the drain occasioned by the recent fancy for foreign securities; and though not in itself a benefit to those who have to work with borrowed capital, it may in the long run prove to be such by restoring closer relations between the possessors and the users of money.

After allowing for all the considerations on which we have dwelt, there is still something quite unusual in the monetary history of the last year or two. That the Bank bullion should fall, as it has done within the last year, from 20,000,000*l.* to 16,000,000*l.* is a common enough event, but that this should happen after a plentiful harvest and without any activity at home to account for the absorption of capital, is a new, and not a satisfactory, feature. That it is a temporary consequence of natural distrust is obvious enough, but temporary disorders which last over years have too much of the chronic character about them to be viewed without regret. By degrees the evil must cure itself, and we trust that it will do so before any considerable addition has been made to the amount of English capital risked on the credit of Governments of doubtful faith.

"PLAIN LIVING AND HIGH THINKING" AMONG UNDERGRADUATES.

THE Memoir of Keble, lately written by Sir John Taylor Coleridge—the friend of Keble's youth, manhood, and age—is a book full of suggestiveness. It well deserves the attention of every one who is able, and who is concerned, to think on current questions of intellectual, social, and religious interest. But there is no quarter to which it appeals so clearly and pointedly as to the Universities, and especially to their undergraduate members.

The condition of undergraduate life at any given time is a matter of much more consequence in our social history than many people who are unacquainted with the Universities would readily admit. Undergraduate life always presents a reflex of the wider picture of national life among the middle and upper sections of society. It may be sometimes a painful, not an agreeable, reflex; but it is not the less interesting, and certainly not the less instructive, for that. We have not the slightest intention here of writing an essay on the weak points of life at the Universities. We believe that at any rate one of the two great Academical societies that are the pride of England has made marked advances towards a higher standard during the last twelve or fifteen years. And we are prepared to learn that such advances are on the increase, both at Oxford and Cambridge. But no close observer, however friendly, whether his point of view be taken from the inside or the outside, will hesitate to admit that undergraduate life is exceedingly deficient in two great merits—simplicity and seriousness.

To say this is to utter an apparent commonplace. But there are moments, and there are points of contrast, at which what seems to be a commonplace is in reality the only means of expressing the truth. And at such points a commonplace often becomes a commonplace no more. It acquires power and vitality, which redeem it, and give it a sense that glows and stimulates. Let any one who maintains a loyal interest in the Universities go and spend a few days at both during the Easter Term. And when he has done that, let him sit down and read Sir John Coleridge's account of the old Corpus days when Keble and Arnold were of the scholars, or Wordsworth's Prelude, or Tennyson's fine canto beginning "I passed beside the reverend walls," or Wordsworth's sonnet, from which the title of this paper is borrowed, or such a fine and stirring composition as Professor Selwyn's Memorial Sermon of 1861, now just re-issued, which resulted in the undertaking and completion of the magnificent new chapel at St. John's, a building which will be henceforward among the finest ornaments of Cambridge. When in writings of this kind, remarkably diverse in their nature, we read memorials of a life lived in the past, sometimes so nearly approaching an ideal standard that it is hard to conceive what could be added in idea to what was realized in act, the aspiration after simplicity and seriousness is a thing very far removed from commonplace.

The description furnished in Keble's Life is not the only description that has appeared of the way of living among the young scholars of Corpus in that golden age when Keble was one of them. Already, in the Life of Arnold, Sir John Coleridge—always writing con amore on that subject—had drawn the picture of the College as then it was. But in the recent memoir everything is fuller and more distinct; and if the lines are here and there a little "distance-mellowed and even glorified," they are no doubt, for all that, accurate and precise enough. Here, then, in the society which contained at the same time John Taylor Coleridge, and Keble, and Arnold, and Ellison, and Dyson, and Cornish, there was going forward, near sixty years ago, a way of life that ought not to remain only recorded in the chapters of memorial books, but should be often drawn forward into the common daylight. No doubt it is true that the exact circumstances of the then Corpus scholars cannot now be reproduced in any College in either Oxford or Cambridge. There is now in neither University a single collegiate society remaining which consists of elected scholars only. Such a preliminary tie between all undergraduates then admitted to Corpus formed unquestionably a bond of union and a stimulus to esprit for the House. Much in the same way, though in two of the cases it was side by side with resident commoners, the scholars of Balliol and Trinity at Oxford, and of King's at Cambridge, have at different periods cultivated an esprit de corps with a surprising degree of success.

But this peculiarity of circumstance is not enough, and the undoubted genius of some of the men concerned is not enough, to account for the "plain living and high thinking" that was the especial glory of Keble's old College in his time. It must remain always the eminent merit of that circle of friends, that they availed themselves of these advantages and used them, as strong will and virtuous sound sense can use any circumstances, so as to produce a splendid result. Corpus was by no means the only close College in Oxford in those days, nor for the greater part of half a century afterwards. But Corpus seems to have been the only close College which, just at that time, resolved to turn the circumstances of privacy and intimate social intercourse into an ideal arena of life-long discipline. And, if we now ask attention to some of the characteristics of that bygone College life, this is done in the firm persuasion, not only that any existing College set would be the better for an infusion of the same elements, but that no undergraduate of high aims ought to pass over unnoticed the chance which Keble's Memoir gives him of looking at an academical ideal.

Sir John Coleridge, talking of his contemporary friends, speaks of their "activity in the studies of the place, the simplicity and ease of their social intercourse, the delights of their walks, and the intellectual interest of their earnest talks together." They were all, except Keble and perhaps one or two more, public-school men, or rather boys in the real sense, for Keble was less than fifteen when elected at Corpus, and barely nineteen when he won his Oriel Fellowship. And, this being considered, what strikes one at once is the remarkable absence, not only of luxurious and quasi-luxurious recreations, but also of the strenua inertia developed by an excessive athletic zeal. They got on not only without billiards and steeplechasing, but even without having erected boating, cricket, and inter-University athletics into the position of the real business of the place. We are speaking of the excess of these things—of zeal without knowledge in their pursuit. Arnold at any rate (and he was not a single instance in the Corpus set) was remarkable for the genuine athletic spirit, both at Oxford and afterwards at Rugby. "I like and love," said both Milton and Locke, "all exercises and pastimes that be fitte for my nature and abilitie." And Professor Selwyn, who quotes that passage, cannot rouse the St. John's of the present to emulate her Burleigh and Ascham and Butler and Martyn and Wordsworth and Herschel, without an expressed desire also that the "Lady Margaret" may have high place on the river, as of old. But it is simply matter of fact, and it is brought out (perhaps unintentionally) by Sir John Coleridge in strong relief, that the athletics of Oxford in Keble's time, and of Cambridge in the later time of the Selwyns, were subsidiary and not primary; the enjoyment of the thing was intense enough, but the luxury was as yet undeveloped.

As regards that "activity in the studies of the place" which was cultivated by these Corpus scholars, the prizes and classes secured by Coleridge, Keble, and Arnold alone were as many (if not more) in number as any three of the most brilliant contemporaries in a single College ever won. And the perfect ease of their social intercourse, instead of being allowed to become a cause of degeneration, was used to stimulate the intellectual earnestness of their discussions. There could be no better proof of resolute and sensible activity than this one fact supplies. They seem to have debated with perfect freedom, like the set of Arthur Hallam some twenty years later in Trinity, Cambridge—

> Of youthful friends, on mind and art
> And labour and the changing mart,
> And all the framework of the land—and, of course, as many a good set has since then done, and is now doing. But the debates of the Corpus men were not merely remarkable from the after celebrity of some who shared in them. Any undergraduate, or any observant reader whatever, who will take the trouble to read over the records in Arnold's Life as well as Keble's, will find the characteristics so thoroughly good and uncommon that he will probably discover something new to imitate or aim at with every fresh perusal.

If it were necessary to specify any one point in the society which Sir John Coleridge has so well described, we should be inclined to select the freshness and elasticity of their life and spirits. They went up young to the University, it is true; but their elasticity did not desert them as they grew older. "Plain living and high thinking" was to them, and is always, not a rule of life only; it is a germinating element of strong and progressive development. It gives without pretension and without fuss. And the overflow of the sense of that development is seen in a perfect elasticity of spirits, as free from boisterousness as it is from depression—a gift which was clearly common in Corpus, and in which Arnold seems to have excelled. This elasticity of spirits partly creates, and partly is the same thing as, a highly intensified power of enjoyment. That is a power which ought to be more common, and at a higher degree, than it is. We are speaking of a power of enjoying almost anything that contains by possibility an element of pleasure; of the power of producing and reproducing sources of enjoyment not from without, but from within; of infinite enjoyment through the threefold channels of the senses, the emotions, and the intellect. This faculty of creating and perceiving pleasure in a high degree is sometimes regarded as one of the special functions and endowments of genius. And so it is. But it is not men of distinguished genius alone that possess and exult in a high power of enjoyment. The same privilege often falls to the lot of men of distinguished goodness. It was the simplicity and purity of their lives, quite as much as their genius, which made Keble's set capable of enjoying, up to an unusual degree, the > Wide grass meadows which the sunshine fills,

> And all the warm green-muffled Cumner hills.

The means of enjoyment in those days were very much less plentifully supplied or eagerly sought after than they now are. But the internal sources of enjoyment seem, in one University circle at any rate, never to have run dry. Continental travel in vacation time, for instance, was then very costly, and was rarely undertaken. But Sidmouth gave to Keble what Switzerland has often failed to give to explorers of a later day.

It would be an unreasonable omission if, while speaking of an intensified power of enjoyment, we left altogether unnoticed the kindred characteristic of strong and steady affection which marked this set. It is a matter which does not require many words, but it deserves notice, and it will well repay attention. Arnold's and Keble's Letters, and the recent Memoir of Keble himself, are very remarkable monuments of a very rare degree of strong College attachment. But the attachments of the Corpus scholars among themselves, lifelong though they were, and maintained through all kinds of diversity in pursuit and profession, do not alone represent the kind of character which we are just now speaking of. There was hardly a man of the set who was not remarkable for an intense cultivation of home affections, and whose life was not powerfully influenced (at one time or another) by the strong and sacred ties of family. As for Keble himself, he left Oxford in the first instance in order to be near his father, whose age and health seemed to require his presence; and the same consideration caused him at various times to resign the curacy of Hursley, to decline the offer of the Archdeaconry of Barbadoes with a salary of 2,000*l.* a year, and to refuse the vicarage of Hursley upon the occurrence of a vacancy on the first occasion. The same strong sense of filial duty was one chief means in overcoming his repugnance to publish the Christian Year, and inducing him to lay aside his original intention of allowing it to appear only posthumously.

It is scarcely necessary, after the mention of these characteristics, to add that the Corpus set in Keble's time were remarkable for seriousness, not less than for manly clearness and plainness of life. They did not play fast and loose with their prospects and their future aims. Here, again, is a remark which only the sense of a powerful contrast will redeem from the level of commonplace. But try the experiment of first reading something about the youth of Keble and Arnold, and then looking through the tradesmen's bills of A.B. or C.D. who failed to satisfy the Little-Go examiners the other day. A serious view of life will not sound like a very commonplace phrase when you look at the contrast, and think of "the pity, the pity of it, Iago." Three at least of these Corpus associates, by virtue of a life at once simple and serious, and by educating their genuine powers through that discipline, left a strong mark not on Oxford only but on their times, and two of them on the very heart of the nation, in the great interests of religion and of education.

It was said at starting, and we repeat it here, that the University life of the present, notwithstanding many features of a very sinister kind, is far from presenting no symptoms of improvement. The really important point to remember is that a genuine advance to a higher standard can be secured among the undergraduates only by efforts from themselves. Certain measures of reform may always be resorted to by the legislating bodies, whether for University or College. But these measures are not always certain of success, and at best they can do no more than modify to a slight degree the circumstances which surround a student. Almost unfettered freedom of action will always remain, as it ought to remain, within the decision of his own will. It will remain within his own option to live a life of simplicity and stability, and to develop his own circumstances as the Corpus scholars developed theirs, or else to remedy at the Mitre or the Bull whatever defects in social refinement the College may have failed to supply.

How directly and immediately a high social standard reacts, whether in a public school or at the Universities, on the intellectual life of the place, it is unnecessary to point out. The reaction at Corpus was as clearly traceable as its effects were remarkable. In the intellectual condition of the younger sections of a University there are varying kinds of deficiency at different times. There is sometimes a want of width and scope even amongst the most active men, an excessive tendency to special study, and a corresponding narrowness of aim and grasp. At other times, and under other conditions, the weakness arises from too great diffuseness, and the result is seen in a species of mental indecision even where the charge of shallowness will not lie. Now a mode of academical life such as Sir John Coleridge has drawn can never furnish an infallible remedy to intellectual difficulties, but it is one of the surest methods for putting things in the way of improvement. University legislation would be an easy matter if the temper of the Corpus set were a general one in the Universities, or if every College could say, as Professor Selwyn tells us that St. John's could in the sixteenth century, primum alimus optima ingenia optimis disciplinis ac moribus. But we have no intention to point the moral of Keble's Memoir in detail. If University sets would read it widely, it could scarcely be ineffective, for a book is seldom written better able to point its own moral for itself.

THE USE AND ABUSE OF FOOT-NOTES.

FEW things among the many mysteries of authorship are more difficult to understand than the principle on which a writer manages his foot-notes, if he resorts to them freely and copiously, or the principle on which he omits them, if his use is sparing and rigidly limited. Caprice seems to rule at the bottom of the page in a sovereign manner. One author regards a third or a fourth of each page as lawful space in which the rubbish of his note-books may be honourably shot, to the edification of his readers and to the glory of his own erudition. Another carefully removes every trace of the scaffolding, enginery, bricks, mortar, and the rest, without which he could not have constructed his great work, and yet which would only obscure its lines, proportions, and general impression if they or any bit of them were left in the way after the work is finished. A third sort of writer differs from both of these; for while he does not rigorously clear away all the relics and débris of his labours, nor, on the other hand, leave them all piled up in gigantic heaps, he darts down at his reader upon sudden and groundless pretext with a little shower of references, characterizations, and emphatic side-strokes, which take one violently by surprise and leave us wondering why we should have deserved this swift and fierce descent, and why, if it be fitting here, it should be omitted in the next page or the next after that, or even through a whole peaceful chapter that follows undisturbed by a single reference, characterization, or anything else of the kind. Of course it is quite plain that there can be no general rule about foot-notes, any more than there can be a general rule about long sentences and short sentences, the number of sentences that ought to make a paragraph, and the like. The subject, and the particular writer's conception and treatment of it, are both of them considerations that have a great deal to do with the fittingness and dimensions of the foot-note. In a novel, for example, a foot-note is usually a superfluity, and in this class of books we usually find it in the particularly objectionable statement at the bottom of the page that "This is a fact," or "The writer can vouch for the truth of the remark which is put into So-and-so's mouth," as if it made any difference whether the remark be vouched for or not in the proper person of the author. For one thing, the truth of a remark which is given to a character in a novel is less to the point than its dramatic propriety; and for another thing, as a rule, there is no more reason why we should take the word of the novelist for the soundness of a remark than the word of the puppet whom the novelist has created. Surely it comes to much the same thing in point of credibility. Let it be said, however, that there is one great living romance-writer whom the foot-note, if he had only condescended to it, would have saved from a good many violences upon the proprieties of his text. In one of Victor Hugo's sublime descriptions, it would be a profound comfort if the text were not broken by strange references to a wind which blew for fifteen hours and thirty-five minutes on the 18th of January, 1867, or maybe to an extraordinary fish found in July, 1840, in the waters of the Susquehanna by Jefferson B. Scribbs of Wilmington, Delaware. If we must be told of the particular fish and the particular storm, then, in the name alike of art and mental comfort, let them be relegated to the foot of the page, or, still better, the end of the chapter, where we may skip all these needless bits of useful information in a lump. But as art is concerned with wholes, we could well dispense with this profusion of particularities, whether in text or foot-note; and we may admit generally that in fiction one suffers fewer things of the foot-note than anywhere else. It is in history, and especially in philosophical history, that the foot-note can be most rampant. Everybody knows the look of one of Mr. Buckle's pages; usually rather more than one-half is covered with a perfectly tropical plantation of references to all manner of books, with decisive remarks thrown in off-hand upon men and things in general. To take the History of Civilization down into the country is as good as having a library with you. Every other sentence is a peg on which to hang a foot-note a couple of inches long. If you have digested the foot-note, you find that you have by that time lost the thread of the text. Resuming this painfully, you read on five or six lines more, and are once more jolted off the track into the rut of another foot-note. Perhaps the great Gibbon set the most effective example of this kind of practice; only it is just to say that his notes are scarcely ever overloaded, that they usually are directed by some intelligible purpose of reference, and that, when they are not this, they are repositories of something which might well have been left out altogether, but still which is better in the obscurity of a foot-note than thrust into the broad and open day of the text. This is a very different thing, however, from a practice that is growing up, among writers otherwise of merit, of turning the foot-note into a special region where they may skip and frisk, denounce and extol, epigrammatize and antithesize, with a summariness and an airy decision most refreshing to behold. They pay a certain respect to the dignity of the text, and then reward themselves for so much self-restraint by wonderful gambadoes at the bottom of the page. Here they raise or demolish an idol in the twinkling of a sentence; flash a bit of Greek or Latin or old French in the reader's eyes, merely à propos de bottes; characterize a philosophy as briskly and lightly as if they were turning a couplet; and sum up in a phrase any system of which they may have chanced to bethink themselves. The consequence of all this is that one might make, out of a work annotated and illustrated on such profuse principles, a terrible anthology of unsupported and point-blank assertions upon the most questionable and questioned matters; unqualified judgments about things which can only be treated with a hundred qualifications; summary pronouncements upon characters the most complex and difficult of interpretation. It would really be worth while to take one of these random annotators and confront him out of his own small type with a list of the propositions which he expects us to take on trust, as well as with a short summary of the incongruous classes of matter which he has lugged in by the ears. The warning would be most effective, and the exposure of such an author's intellectual looseness most severe. He himself would probably be shocked at the strange omnium gatherum which he had invited his public to inspect, and might even awaken to the fact that, instead of being that prodigy of aptness and sober meditation and reasoned judgment which he had supposed himself to be, he is a bit of an impostor, who, to paraphrase Moth's image, had been at a feast of books and stolen the scraps.

There are two most obvious and definite objections to the prevailing fashion. The first is that no reader of less than Macaulay's memory can possibly remember a fraction of the information or opinion which is thrust upon him in these over-crammed notes. There is nothing about them to give them the proper adhesive quality. They are fragmentary and fugitive, offering no compact or shapely whole which may impress either the imagination or the understanding. They flit under the eye, take place for a moment among our impressions, and then are swiftly obliterated by the next and the next and the next, that follow in close succession—one being historical, its neighbour philosophical, the next to that æsthetic, the fourth industrial, and so on, right through the scale of knowable things, and all within the mightily brief space of a couple of pages. The second objection is like unto this. Even if we could retain, say, a twentieth part of the information and opinion purveyed in this barbarous manner for our instruction and building up, the form in which it comes would be enough to make even this twentieth part something worse than useless. The knowledge which consists merely of detached propositions, whether statements of fact or expressions of conviction, is hardly any better than ignorance. The author, emptying out his commonplace-book into his foot-notes, very likely knows all about the heading under which such and such a fact or opinion comes, what it is related to, what are its bearings—in a word, what is its true and fundamental significance. But the public does not read as a student writes. It is well if accumulated foot-notes do not distract the mind alike from themselves and from the text, the substance of the book thus between two stools falling to the ground. At best, the reader who does the text justice only gives one eye and half a mind to the cloud of semi-impertinences and irrelevancies underneath. What chance is there, then, of even ordinary attention being given to those propositions, so thick in number, so varied in subject, which require for their right comprehension and assimilation an attention quite extraordinary? If the writers of books would only bethink themselves of the real nature of the process of reading, how it is gone through even by the better sort of people, they would perceive the absurdity of these olla podridas of erudition mostly surface. But, one of the profuse annotators may retort, we write for persons with the capacity for reading, who have learnt to take pains over a book, and who will laboriously give a worthy closeness of attention to important matters. And this is all very well, but every student will feel that the pains which would be needed to digest a great quantity of scattered annotations would be much better expended in going over the ground on his own account. Moreover, he will certainly feel that, unless he does go over the ground on his own account as well, what he picks up among the disjected members of elaborate foot-notes will be of uncommonly small substantial value. Opinions swallowed whole, and information taken in in ready-made lumps, are to the scholar or the thinker as nearly good for nothing as may be. So that in neither case is any real good done. The disciplined reader does not care for matter heaped up indiscriminately as by some process of literary pitchforking, while the crowd are simply dazzled, and so pass lightly and unburdened on.

As we began by saying, it is out of the question to lay down a general rule on such a subject, but the nearest possible approach to a rule may perhaps be found in the simple maxim to abstain from foot-notes with a rigorous self-restraint. Where an historian, for example, has to give references to, or citations from, his authorities, their use is of course indispensable. And, again, one must plainly distinguish between foot-notes and a professed commentary by one writer upon the text of another. To fill a foot-note with references to authors where a thoughtful reader may find the subject further illustrated is scarcely ever advisable, because if the thoughtful reader cares for the subject he will have no difficulty in gaining this information for himself—a labour which will make it twice as useful to him when it is gained. And, finally, to crowd notes with detached opinions de omni scibili is not only not advisable, but not even permissible to an author who either respects his subject and his art, or who understands the scope and the limitations of ordinary receptivity.

MR. STEFANOS XENOS.

WHO is Mr. Stefanos Xenos? some of our readers, troubled with short memories, will inquire. In these rapid days popular notoriety as well as popular reputation is soon made and soon lost, and fame is terribly evanescent. Mr. Stefanos Xenos became known to outsiders of that marvellous City world which for many years he has adorned in the course of the proceedings taken by Dr. Thom against the Directors of Overend, Gurney, and Co., Limited, and chiefly in connexion with the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, which was only a periphrase of Stefanos Xenos, and which concern appeared in the accounts of the great Discount House as a debtor for some trifling sum of 300,000*l.* And, moreover, it was at the same time revealed that Mr. Stefanos Xenos paid Mr. Edward Watkin Edwards, the adviser, Mentor, and superintendent of the house of Overend and Gurney, an annuity of 500*l.* a year for his trouble in superintending, on the Gurneys' part, the business of Mr. Xenos, during the time in which he was under advances to that firm. Further, it came out that Mr. Xenos had made Mr. Edwards a present of a yacht and an Arab steed during their business connexion. While the concerns of these worthy people were before the Lord Mayor, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Xenos spoke of each other as hawk and dove; Mr. Xenos claiming to be dove and charging Mr. Edwards with a hawk-like character; and vice versâ. And while the storm was at its height, Mr. D. W. Chapman wrote an affecting and most filial letter from Tours, where he finds a sunny retirement from the storms of Lombard Street, to his father, Mr. D. B. Chapman, at Roehampton, in which, among other incredible and monstrous things, he spoke of Mr. Xenos's "depredations" on the house of Overend and Gurney. These two words, "hawk" and "depredations," fired Mr. Xenos; and he undertook to write a book to show that he was a dove, and no hawk, and that as to depredations he was the victim, not the robber. This pledge Mr. Xenos has just fulfilled in the shape of a book—a deadly heavy one—entitled Depredations; or, Overend, Gurney, and Co., and the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company. By Stefanos Xenos. London: Published by the Author, at 9 Essex Street, Strand, 1869. We do not intend to assume the responsibility of deciding whether Mr. Xenos has made out his case, chiefly because we do not precisely understand what his case is until we have come to some understanding as to what a dove is, and what depredations are, in Mr. Xenos's own view of them. Words are but the signs of ideas, and it is very probable that the notions on morality in general, and on commercial morality in particular, held by such gentlemen as some members of the Overend house, by Mr. Edwards, by Mr. Xenos, and by a good many people famous on the Stock Exchange, at the Baltic, and in the Board-rooms of Finance Companies, are so irreconcilable with our own that any attempt to get at a common understanding would be thrown away. It is rather silly work to decide, in the case of two very empty and dirty oyster-shells, which is the dirtiest; and we may well leave Mr. Edwards and Mr. Xenos to settle the correctness of their own estimate of each other.

When we say that Mr. Xenos's book is dull, we mean it with a qualification. It is dreadfully dull to us, consisting for the most part of minute and tedious details of all the author's unsuccessful speculations in the City. Mr. Xenos seems to have had a wonderful knack at always getting on the wrong side of the hedge. He has been a very whirligig of commercial Fortune; just always on the verge of astounding success, and as constantly floundering into a malebolge of misfortunes and failures; always, by his simplicity, getting imposed on and taken in by partners, agents, and fellow-speculators, yet always inventing, and successful in, wonderful schemes which not only promise, but secure success. From his own account, he combines the elements of audacious intrepidity in business with a guilelessness and simplicity of character quite childlike. He is for ever getting overreached by commonplace vulgar harpies and traders on his simplicity, yet always getting the upper hand of the whole commercial world by his adroitness, his intuitive perception of openings before they were visible to the rest of his craft, and by his heroic devotion to work, and facility in divining combinations of profit. We shall not contest this estimate of Mr. Xenos, as for other reasons, so because we have no grounds on which to dispute. And we say this distinctly, that however dull the commercial details of Mr. Xenos's book, the biographical and autobiographical fragments which are embodied in it are very pretty reading indeed. To these we restrict ourselves.

Mr. Xenos is a Greek, and since the days when Anastasius was drawn as the type of the modern Hellenic mind, we have not had so lifelike a portraiture. The autobiography is however disappointing and tantalizing, because scanty. We are not satisfied on a point which has caused us some curiosity, whether Mr. Xenos was born in Krete—the Krete, we mean, of Epimenides and St. Paul. Or can it be that one of the other two notorious Kappas, celebrated in antiquity, claims him for a son? It cannot be Kappadokia, seeing that the object of this book is to show that our Stefanos was not only not a robber, but the victim of robbery on the part of Overend and Gurney. It cannot be Kilikia, seeing that Mr. Xenos was not a pirate, but a sailor of ships, and a sufferer from at least land-pirates. Like Homer's, Mr. Xenos's birthplace may therefore be left doubtful. He was educated by the Greek Government at the military school of Evelpides for eight years, destined to become an artillery officer, and his life has done credit both to his training and to the name of the well-omened academy in which he was educated. He is still a soldier and free-lance of Fortune, and he has not yet attained those portals where Dante says all hope is to be abandoned. He seems to have quitted his own country on political grounds, and to have had some hereditary connexion with the extreme Hellenic faction. He speaks of the popularity of his family name, his father's patriotic services, and the great sacrifices which he made for Greece, as well as of his literary works. And incidentally it comes out that he was the proprietor and editor of that queer Greek newspaper, published some few years ago in London, the Brettannikos Aster, which was suppressed, or practically suppressed, by Earl Russell, on account of its seditious, if not treasonable, however patriotic, language against the Otho Government. The Provisional Government of Greece in 1865 appointed Mr. Xenos Greek Consul-General in London, in reward of his services in connexion with the British Star; but, though Mr. Xenos cannot understand why, the English Government refused him his exequatur, and he reasons characteristically on this event. Such a refusal, he says, could not occur now; and for this curious reason:—"The late revelations with regard to the long-boasted commercial honesty of England's mighty merchants will have taught her not to indulge any longer in eulogiums upon her national virtues." From which we gather that, as Mr. Xenos's services were declined because the English Government of that day believed in "commercial honesty," they would not be declined now that we are forced to own that there is no such thing as commercial honesty among us. This seems to be scarcely a complimentary view of Mr. Xenos's character, though it is plain that he must entertain it and perhaps appreciate it. Mr. Xenos's father is alive in Greece, and he has a brother Aristides. Aristides in old time was the inconveniently virtuous statesman whom the Athenians got rid of because he was too good for them; we are led from the present author's account of himself to suspect there may have been some mistake in the names of the Xenos family. Stefanos ought to have been Aristides, for he was not only too good for Greece, but he has been honoured with ostracism more than once in London. Mr. Xenos introduces us to his London life in 1856, when he was running a line of sailing vessels from England to the Levant. This business in 1857 he expanded, with the aid of a Greek house, Lascaridi of London, into the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company—i.e., Messrs. Xenos and Lascaridi chartered ships and lost a good deal of money. They then discovered that the right thing was to own, not hire, ships. Consequently, they turned shipowners as well as ship-charterers and consignees of cargo; but they had debts, no capital, and must have ships. As Mr. Xenos says, "To accept bills for 150,000*l.* is only an affair of a few minutes, and to provide for them is also only a momentary concern, if you have credit, your property free, your business well organized, and no enemies." Unfortunately for Mr. Xenos, from the very first moment of the existence of the O. S., these conditions of success were never available for his Company. Consequently, he was obliged to get money as he could, and, to make a long story short, in the long run he fell into the hands of Overend, Gurney, and Co., and Mr. E. W. Edwards. As we have said, the story is tedious, and, except to those concerned, very uninteresting; but undoubtedly Mr. Xenos, in recounting his sufferings, is very amusing. He is a literary artist, and occasionally lights up the darkest clouds full of discount and balance-sheets with very shrewd and sparkling bits of personal reminiscence and picturesque and, of course, veracious anecdote.

Here is a photograph of a class. "I confess to a prejudice—I dislike English Levantines. They do not inherit the Anglo-Saxon firmness of character nor the Greek vivacity of intellect. Brought up in the Turkish school, they become adepts in the arts of bowing and scraping, of fawning and formularies. They are neither English, Greeks, nor Turks, but a mixture of all; they can change the hue of their nationality with a chameleon-like facility to suit emergencies—a faculty that enables them to stand the fire of commercial battles and defeats with salamander-like indifference." Among other notables with whom Mr. Xenos was connected is one Mr. Gottheimer, in whom we are surprised to recognise Mr. Albert Grant, late M.P. for Kidderminster. "Mr. Albert Gottheimer, formerly a wine merchant trading under the firm of Coverdale and Gottheimer, was, at that time, as Manager of the Mercantile Discount Company, studying closely the Limited system, through which the Fates afterwards made him a magnificent GRANT. . . . The future father of the Crédit Foncier and Mobilier of England was too sharp" for Mr. Xenos; and one would think that he would have been too sharp for most folk, seeing that Mr. Gottheimer-Grant charged 100*l.* for one week's loan of 3,000*l.*, with the kind promise of renewing on the same terms. But here is more engaging stuff. Mr. Xenos introduces us to Overend, Gurney, and Co. in the flesh, and we feel the same sort of awe as the blameless Ethiopians must have felt when Zeus and the Olympians came uninvited, as one would think, to dinner. Dealing with these Hellenes, we must be pardoned for getting Hellenic in our illustrations. Mr. Xenos's classicality is contagious. Mr. Xenos compares the four principal partners of the great Discount House to Adonis, the Chevalier de Faublas, J. B. Colbert, and James Wilson—the rôles being respectively filled by D. W. Chapman (the exile of Tours), A. G. Chapman, H. E. Gurney, and R. Birkbeck. Mr. D. H. Chapman is described as "one of the handsomest of Englishmen, fond of flattery, surrounded by sycophants, loving the drama, fond but ignorant of pictures, and maintaining a hospitality lavish as that of the Prodigal Son"—which photograph reminds us that Mr. Benjamin Higgs was much the same sort of man. Mr. A. G. Chapman (a stranger to us, and who was "relieved from his duties" chiefly because "he signed so many cheques") is described "as a boyish-looking young man, of a very feminine aspect" and bullying manners. Mr. Henry Edmund Gurney was the genius of the institution possessed of a "high moral and intellectual cast . . . speaking with a loud tone, proud-spirited, somewhat pompous and dictatorial in manner, but with a deep sense of religion, and always performing acts of benevolence . . . a member of the Society of Friends . . . he became the tool of a clique, especially the favourites of Mr. Chapman's." Mr. H. E. Gurney is described by Mr. Xenos as ambitious, but with more work than he could manage, leaving the investigation of securities to D. W. Chapman and his factotum, the celebrated Mr. Edwards; and in this connexion Mr. Xenos thinks proper to speak of "babes in knowledge and refined rogues." Mr. Robert Birkbeck is described as a man of unflinching honour and integrity. Not without some gruff facetiousness, Mr. Xenos describes the interior of the great Discount House in Lombard Street, and the details of a grim and grimy torture-chamber, known, we believe, as the sweating-room, where applicants for discount were left for hours to their pleasant meditations on impending insolvency. Mr. E W. Edwards is painted as "a man of pleasing appearance, placid countenance, cool temper, of gentlemanly and fascinating manners, soft and sweet of speech." The story of the yacht which Mr. Xenos gave, if he did give, to this Mr. Edwards is very well told:—

"It was the 28th of January, 1861. 'We all kill ourselves for money,' remarked the official assignee. 'Will you come and have a little dinner with me at the Garrick?' 'With pleasure,' I answered. We arrived at the club. . . . I did honour to the splendid hock. . . . 'I cannot give you champagne or red wine,' said Mr. Edwards, 'as the doctors have ordered me to take nothing but hock.' I thought it rather selfish of Mr. Edwards not to offer his guest red wine because he had been forbidden to drink it. We retired to the smoking-room. . . . We discussed Overend and Gurney, the Oriental Steam Navigation, and the British Star. . . . Mr. Edwards expressed a wish to make a cruise in the Greek Archipelago. At that time I had two yachts. . . . 'Will you lend me the steam yacht for a short cruise?' 'All right,' said I, 'you can have her altogether, as she is of no use to me.' 'Thank you; you are very kind.' We had no further communication on the subject. . . . Next morning Mr. Edwards requested me to send him the yacht's papers of which I had been so kind as to make him a present. I had forgotten all about the matter . . . but, much against my will, I sent him the yacht's papers." We regret that Mr. Xenos has not favoured us with the parallel history as to how he gave, or was done out of, the Arab horse, but which, anyhow, Mr. Edwards got hold of. But the skill with which this yacht story is told is inimitable. Mr. Xenos does not say that the hock of the Garrick was too much for him; he does not say that he either did or did not intend to give the yacht to Mr. Edwards; but he gives just enough of hint to let us infer—if we are so pleased—that he was done by Mr. Edwards. We wish we had space for the scene in a Victoria Street flat, where Messrs. Edwards, Lascaridi, and Barker, "smoking the finest Havannahs, and sipping wines of the finest bouquet," meet to settle a loan, which they all know to be a ruinous advance, of 80,000*l.* But we hope that Mr. Xenos's budget is not exhausted. Mr. Xenos's adventures, too, on the Stock Exchange are very rich and suggestive reading. He tells us that he has always been in the habit of keeping a diary and taking notes. We trust that he will favour us with them. Our curiosity is provoked when he tells us that he might, had he pleased, "have garnished his narrative"—a narrative of the lives and doings of our gravest City men, be it remembered—"with playful allusions to many an operatic Zephyrina and dramatic Eucharis. He might have told tales of Pretty Horsebreakers and capricious Anonymas; or he might have hinted at certain titled Calypsos, at whose bidding some of our good City men entered the commercial lists and fought the most desperate combats." Mr. Xenos has, in his present book, given us a scandalous chronicle of one sort, and he is quite the man to present a scandal-loving world with another. Maybe we shall meet him again. Meanwhile, from this curious revelation of some of the mysteries of discounting, financing, and Limited Liability Companies, we are tempted to think that there is something in Mr. Xenos's classical and commercial question:—"Must we imagine that Diogenes has consumed a gallon of the best Colza oil in searching among our capitalists and their agents for an honest man, and has ultimately extinguished his lamp in despair?" Our own little lantern is, we admit, burning very dimly.

THE POPE AND THE PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA.

THE Greek Church has all along been the standing difficulty of Ultramontanism. It was impossible to ignore the Episcopal succession of her bishops and clergy as has been done, on the slenderest grounds, with the Anglican Episcopate. It was equally impossible to establish any charge of heresy against her, for on every point of doctrine she retained, with the minutest and most rigid accuracy, the faith of the ancient Church before the division of East and West. And, in fact, whatever individual theologians on either side may have said in the heat of debate, about the famous Filioque controversy, on neither has any formal indictment for heresy been preferred. Two Popes, Clement VIII. and Benedict XIV., have expressly ruled "that the Greeks are bound to believe the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, but not bound to assert it, unless there was danger of scandal." No such concession was ever made, or could have been made, by the early Church to the Arians as to the use or disuse of the critical "iota" with which Gibbon makes so merry. And, more than this, there has never been any formal denial on the part of Rome that the Greeks are included in the unity of the Church. On the contrary, it has often been implicitly admitted. Not only does St. Bernard ask Pope Eugenius III. if he "can possibly think it lawful to dismember the Church," when his reference to "patriarchs" shows that he had the East in mind as well as the West, but the Popes themselves have always used similar language. Gregory X. summoned the Council of Lyons "because of his extreme bitterness on beholding the rent of the Universal Church foreshadowed in the net of Peter the Fisherman, that broke for the multitude of fishes which it enclosed; we do not say, divided in its faith, but notoriously and lamentably divided as to its faithful members." A passage in the original Decree, inviting them to Basle, was cancelled because the term "heretics" had accidentally slipped into it. Eugenius IV. told his envoys that the Council of Florence was summoned "for the union of the Western and Eastern Church," and asked the Greeks themselves "in what shall we be benefited if we fail to unite the Church of God?" At the Council of Florence Greeks and Latins sat and voted as equals, and it was meant to be known as the Eighth Œcumenical Council, ignoring the eleven, commonly so-called, which had met in Western Christendom, since the schism. Cardinal Pole actually speaks of it as the Eighth, in his work on the English Reformation. And even Pius IX., extravagant as his language about his own pretensions is apt to be, has invited the Eastern bishops to come to the Council of the Vatican "as their predecessors came to Lyons and Florence;" and they came to those Councils as equals "to unite the Church of God." It is indeed worth remarking, that none of the Popes have formally asserted the terms "Catholic" and "Roman Catholic" to be identical, or appropriated the former term to their own communion. They have been content to call it, and to let others call it, "the Roman Catholic Church." Neither will any respectable controversialist have the hardihood to maintain that, whatever gift of infallibility the Popes may lay claim to, it has not preserved them from allowing the Nicene Creed to be tampered with against the canons of the Church at the arbitrary will of temporal sovereigns, or from upholding for centuries the authenticity of forged documents, and using their evidence to cover most iniquitous acts, and to guarantee many important points of their own distinctive teaching. It is equally undeniable that this course of conduct was mainly instrumental in producing the rupture between East and West, and was, together with the systematic evasion of the demands for internal reformation in the Latin Church, the immediate cause of the second great schism in the sixteenth century. It is the deliberate verdict, not of an Oriental or Protestant Christian, but of a distinguished Roman Catholic student of our own day, that, when the origin of the divisions of Christendom is sought for in the light of history, "it is the conduct of the Popes, more than anything else for the last thousand years, in governing the Church, which has divided it."

It is not wonderful, then, that Roman divines should be tempted to regard the Greek Church very much as some English politicians are disposed to look upon Ireland. They would be only too thankful if it could be blotted out of the map of the Christian world altogether. But there it is, nevertheless, and it is a phenomenon that has to be taken into account, however it may be dealt with. Least of all can its existence be ignored in view of the approaching Council. All the five Patriarchs were consulted about the convocation of the ancient Councils, and in nearly all of them one of the four Eastern Patriarchs presided; at none was the Pope present in person. The Council of December next has been summoned by Pius IX. on his own sole responsibility, but he has still felt himself obliged to notify its assembling to the Eastern Patriarchs, though he has been induced by some sinister influence at Rome to refuse them the ordinary courtesy of their proper titles. We had occasion, some months ago, to notice the interview between the Papal emissary and the Patriarch of Constantinople. A report has now appeared of a similar interview between the Patriarch of Alexandria and the Latin Bishop of that city, who was commissioned to convey to him the Pope's invitation to the Council. There is a close resemblance in the account of the reception of the Papal envoys by the two Patriarchs, and the result is in either case the same; but there is, of course, some variety in the details of the conversation. We seem to see in the tone of the rival prelates a lively illustration of what has long been the normal attitude of the Eastern and Western Churches towards each other. The Patriarch of Alexandria, like his brother of Constantinople, begins by asking whether the contents of the letter of invitation coincide with what had been already published in various newspapers; and on receiving an affirmative reply, announces that he cannot accept it. There were many reasons for this besides the strange discourtesy both of the form of the missive and of allowing its publication before it was delivered. And after expressing his sympathy with the "excellent desire of the Pope for the union of all the Churches of Christ, for which we, too, of this ancient apostolic and glorious throne of St. Mark, have always offered up prayers," the Patriarch proceeds to specify three of these reasons. In the first place, he denies that "the most blessed Pope of Old Rome" has any right to summon a Council without previous consultation with the Eastern Patriarchs, to whom, equally with himself, appertains the government of the Church, while to him the testimony of history accords precedence, but not supremacy or universal jurisdiction. The Pope's manner of acting "denies the equality which exists among the holy Churches of God, and abolishes their independence, proclaiming that Rome holds sway over other Churches equally self-governing." Here, no doubt, the argument has a sound historical basis. The second objection is more obscure. We do not quite see how by sending his invitation "the Pope gives us to understand that salvation is to be obtained exclusively in Rome, whereas the energy of Divine grace has operated, and does operate, throughout the habitable globe." It is admitted, we imagine, by Roman theologians, that Divine grace operates without as well as within the visible Church. Probably, what the Patriarch means is, that Rome denies that portion of "the habitable globe" which is under the jurisdiction of the Eastern hierarchy to be any part of the visible Church. But no Pope, as we said just now, has ventured officially to deny this. The Patriarch's third objection is significant, considering the ardent desire of the Jesuits and their following to get the Assumption of the Virgin made into an article of faith. He complains that the Council is summoned for the festival of the Immaculate Conception—"a dogma wholly unknown to the Church, a recent innovation, and by no means a solitary one." It will be recollected that a considerable section of the Latin bishops, when consulted on the point, urged that the Immaculate Conception was not capable of being defined, or that, if it was, the time was inopportune for defining it. Yet a great deal may be urged in defence of the doctrine on the principle of development; but how a visible and external fact like the alleged bodily Assumption can possibly be verified in the notorious absence of all contemporary evidence, unless by a new revelation, it is not easy to understand. If the Greeks object to the Immaculate Conception, which is said to be widely believed among them, being raised into a dogma, what would they think of defining the Assumption, which they have never accepted—the corresponding festival being called with them the "Sleep of the Virgin"? The Patriarch goes on to suggest that if "the Holy Pope of Old Rome sincerely desires the purification and unity of the whole Church," he should put himself into communication, "as a brother and an equal, with the other holy Patriarchs," as to the best means for securing the end in view, observing at the same time that "the best of all methods would be to adopt the course to which history points, and to approximate the modern institutions of Rome to those of more primitive times." To the reply of the Latin bishop that the right of the Pope to summon the Council is legitimate, "as head and sovereign over the Church and successor of the Apostle Peter," the Patriarch rejoins by again denying these pretensions, "which are at variance with the received teachings of the Church of which Christ is the only Head." The Roman envoy then at last condescends to enter on historical ground, and argues that Alexandria is the See of St. Mark, who was consecrated by St. Peter, and that the great Athanasius appealed to Rome. The Patriarch answers that St. Mark's consecration by St. Peter proves nothing, as all the Apostles were equal, and that if St. Athanasius appealed to Rome when under persecution, it was as a suffering brother to one able to help him, and not as to a superior. Here the Bishop again shifts his ground, and asks the Patriarch if, for so important an end as unity, he should not be more willing to waive matters of form. To this opinion there is the obvious retort, that "it is not a question of form, but of most important principles." And the Patriarch concludes by repeating that, if his Holiness really wishes for the unity of the Universal Church, he must write to the Patriarchs individually, and endeavour in concert with them to come to an understanding respecting the proper course to be adopted.

Many remarks suggest themselves on perusing the account of this interview, and comparing it with that between the Papal emissaries and the Patriarch of Constantinople. It is an ingenious theory of the Irvingites that the three great sections of Christendom are prefigured by the three friends of Job—the one who appeals to authority representing the Roman, and the one who appeals to antiquity the Eastern Church, while the third who relies on reason represents Protestantism. Whatever may be thought of the theory, it certainly harmonizes well enough with the parts sustained respectively by the Greek and Latin interlocutors in the dialogue we have just recounted. The one is constantly appealing to the evidence of Christian history: the other says he is "not come to discuss," and relies almost exclusively on authoritative claims. It is further worth remarking, as the contrary is often asserted, that there is no attempt on the part of the Greek Patriarchs to arrogate to themselves any exclusive claim of churchmanship. They speak of innovations in the West, but they speak of the West throughout as a part of the Church, and recognise the rights of the Pope over "his own Patriarchate"—that is, over Latin Christendom. As to the prospect of the Greeks being induced to attend the Council, it would perhaps be premature to speak with confidence at present. That they will not attend it unless they are to be received as equals, and allowed full liberty to speak and vote, is clear. It is no less certain that their presence would be a fatal bar to the scheme for getting the infallibility of the Pope defined. They are too well versed in Church history, and too firmly tenacious of ancient precedent, to listen to such a pretension for a single moment. Yet it is now understood to be settled that Archbishop Manning shall propose this at the opening of the Council. It is known indeed that Dupanloup and others of the French bishops will strenuously oppose it, but they are expected to be outnumbered. No doubt they would find in an accession of Greek prelates welcome auxiliaries in their uphill struggle, but for that reason, if for no other, those who pull the wires at Rome are very unlikely to encourage the Greeks to come. We have seen before what the German Catholics, who are already in communion with Rome, think about the Council and their own chances of getting fair play there. What are the Greeks likely to think of it, who are divided from Rome by some eight centuries of bitter antagonism, and who have never accepted the very first postulate of the system on which the gigantic superstructure of modern Ultramontanism has been built?

CURIOSITIES OF THE IRISH CHURCH DEBATES.

It is almost a matter for regret that we cannot have many more of those strange sayings, historical and philosophical—for we suppose that an inquiry into the Insoluble is to be reckoned as philosophical—which have amused us well nigh weekly during the progress of the Irish Church Bill through the House of Commons. To be sure we have the Lords in store, and among the Lords are the Bishops, and among the Bishops are still certain Irish Bishops. It will be hard if some of the prelates, to say nothing of certain of the temporal peers, do not help us to some original views of ecclesiastical history, and something special ought to come from some Irish Bishop, painfully conscious that it is positively his last appearance. Here then is something to look forward to. But it is an almost painful thought that the time will soon come when we shall no more, at least on this matter, hearken to our Charley, our Conolly, or our Jenkinson. It is grievous that some things are in their own nature forbidden to happen again. Dr. Ball has most likely by this time shut up his Blackstone and turned to the Statute-Book, and he will hardly give us his theory of a Supreme Head again. Sir George Jenkinson may very likely babble again some other time about the Coronation Oath; but even Sir George Jenkinson can hardly persuade himself a second time that he is saying something new. So let us enjoy the few chances that are left us. The third reading may bring out something still. In the debate on the Report Mr. Charley has certainly out-charleyed everything that he has said before. He at least, we are sure, will die game.

We are bound, however, to say that both Mr. Charley, even in the most absurd speech which has yet been made, and Mr. Bentinck, in a speech of a very different kind, did hit upon points the Ministerial answers to which were not perfectly satisfactory. Mr. Bentinck, among a good deal of ignorance and confusion, had got hold of a truth with regard to lay clerks, organists, and such like. And where Mr. Bentinck was wrong, the Attorney-General for Ireland certainly did not put him right. Mr. Bentinck asks for compensation for lay clerks and organists. The Attorney-General for Ireland answers, "It would be quite absurd to treat an organist or a singer in a choir as a freehold officer," and adds the question, "If a singer lost his voice, was he to be compensated out of the funds of the Dean and Chapter for the rest of his life?" Neither the speech nor the answer to it goes to the root of the matter. It is plain that neither disputant has thoroughly mastered the nature of Lay Vicars and their freeholds. With all deference to the Attorney-General for Ireland, it is not absurd to treat a singer in a choir as a freehold officer, because many singers in choirs are undoubtedly freehold officers. There may be no such in Ireland; as we have not mastered the particular constitution of every Irish cathedral, we do not profess to know whether there are or are not. But there certainly are plenty such in England, and if Ireland differs from England in this respect, the right answer would have been to say that there was such a difference. Most likely in Ireland, as in England, the position of these officers differs in different churches, and no general statement can be made about all of them. The Attorney-General asks whether a singer who lost his voice is to be compensated out of the funds of the Dean and Chapter. We answer that there are in England—whether there are or are not in Ireland it is for the Attorney-General to tell us—many such singers who, if they lose their voices, have certainly no claim to compensation out of the funds of the Dean and Chapter, but who still retain their own income out of their own funds, their right to which is exactly the same as the right of the Dean and Chapter to theirs. Mr. Bentinck picked out several personal instances of hardship or supposed hardship in Ireland, but he did not touch on the real nature of the foundations which he was talking about. He seemed to have no notion of any cathedral or collegiate church except Westminster Abbey. The House was asked to go across the road and look at the lay-clerks of the Abbey; it was not asked to take certain longer journeys which would have been much more to Mr. Bentinck's own purpose. The singers in choirs in English churches are of three classes, and the position and claims of members of those three classes would, in case of an English disestablishment, be very different. Whether each of those classes exists in Ireland neither disputant told us; but till somebody does we cannot give any general answer as to the proper way of dealing with Irish singing-men. In England, in most of the Old Foundations, there are Colleges of Vicars, subordinate to the Dean and Chapter as to their duties in the church, but quite independent of them as to their revenues. These Vicars were originally the deputies of absent Canons, who took the share of duty which fell to their masters—"master," we may add, is still a technical name in some places. In process of time the Vicars were, in most places, incorporated and endowed. To this day they have their own estates, of which they have either retained the freehold, or else have parted with it to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on such terms as they may themselves have thought fair. In these cases the adult part of the choir is formed of the members of those Colleges or some of them, most commonly of those who are now allowed to be laymen. At Hereford, unless some change has been made within the last few years, the whole body remains, as it anciently was, a clerical body. In most cases it is partly clerical, partly lay, the clerical members being the Canons' assistants in divine service. But whether clerical or lay, these foundations form distinct and independent corporations, with exactly the same rights as all other corporations. How a member of such a College can be deprived of his office is doubtless provided for in the statutes of each foundation. But it is clear that he cannot, any more than a member of the Chapter, be turned out of his freehold by the arbitrary will of anybody. He can be dispossessed only by the prescribed judicial process, whatever that process may be in each case. His losing his voice in no way affects his freehold any more than the Dean's losing his voice affects his freehold. Next comes another class, including all or most of the cathedrals of the New Foundation and also Mr. Bentinck's pet church of Westminster. Here the members of the choir do not form independent corporations with their own estates; still they are statutable members of the collegiate body, entitled to whatever rights and to whatever stipends or proportions of corporate income the statutes may give them. By what process such a "singer in a choir" can be deprived of his office, how far his office is strictly for life, whether, if he loses his voice, he has a right to compensation, are questions of statute in each particular church, to be determined, subject to any possible provisions in later Acts of Parliament, as the wisdom of King Henry, Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, King James, or King Charles may have thought good to appoint. In the former of these classes, the freehold right of a Lay Vicar is as good as the freehold right of an Archbishop, and in the second class there is what may be reasonably expected to be a life tenure and a primâ facie right to compensation. But in some cases, besides these statutable officers, Deans and Chapters have strengthened their choirs by singers who are merely stipendiaries, who have no corporate or statutable position, who have no rights beyond what they have under the common law of contract. These last, it is clear, if their Deans and Chapters happen to be suppressed, have no claim upon the public, but are simply in the same case as people thrown out of work by any other cause. Mr. Bentinck should have explained more clearly to which of these classes his Irish clients belong, or whether, as is possible, they belong to some fourth class different from all. Is the organist of Christ Church, Dublin, a statutable officer or a mere stipendiary? Are the Vicars Choral of Armagh a corporate body or are they not? The whole matter turns on the answers to these questions. But neither Mr. Bentinck nor the Attorney-General tells us, and neither the House of Commons nor the public at large can be expected to be so versed in Irish ecclesiastical law as to know the fact of themselves.

Mr. Bentinck then really had something to say, if he had known how to say it, and the official answer was not wholly to the point. And even Mr. Charley, in the most grotesque speech of the Session, was fumbling after a truth. In theory an impropriate rectory is not a property alienated from the Church, but an ecclesiastical benefice held by a layman. Its owner is the rector, and as rector he has both rights and duties. The Vicar is in theory his deputy, and in old times, if the Vicar's maintenance was not enough, the corporate or private holder of the rectory might be made to enlarge his income out of the tithe. We believe that we are not wrong in saying that this was done as lately as the time of Charles the Second. To this day the holder of an English impropriate rectory is, in the absence of any local custom to the contrary, chargeable with the repair of the chancel, just as an incumbent rector is. How does the law stand in Ireland on this point, and how will it be affected by the Bill? The point seems not to have been thought of on either side of the House; and it is clear that the question of impropriate tithe is not so foreign to the scope of the Bill as Mr. Gladstone seems to think. Thus even Mr. Charley had got hold of something, though the use which he made of it was certainly the most ludicrous thing which has turned up during the whole discussion. Because the Duke of Devonshire is impropriate rector of certain Irish parishes—twenty-six, Mr. Charley says, and we cannot correct his figures—therefore Mr. Charley suspects that the Duke of Devonshire is hounding on a cry against the Church. If so, the Duke must have the strangest notions of adapting means to ends of any man living. The Duke is most likely a tithe-payer as well as a tithe-owner. In his character of tithe-payer he might have an intelligible motive for hounding on a cry against the Church. But Mr. Charley accuses him of so doing in his character of tithe-owner, in which his interests clearly lie the other way. The confiscation—we do not object to the word—of ecclesiastical tithe may conceivably make the ownership of lay tithe less safe; it cannot possibly make it safer. Both Mr. Charley's speech and Mr. Gladstone's answer show that the case of rectories held by the Duke of Devonshire or by any other layman is more likely to be called in question after the passing of the Irish Church Bill than they were before. The interests of impropriators clearly lie in letting the tithe question remain untouched. Moreover Mr. Charley seems to think that no people but "wealthy Whig peers" are holders of impropriate tithes. Really by this time monastic lands, episcopal lands, and impropriate tithes have got pretty well scattered about among people of all sorts, people of all ranks, all politics, and all religions. It is not so very rare a thing for an impropriate rectory to belong not to a Whig peer but to a Tory squire. We have known them held by women and children, not particularly wealthy, and of politics of which Mr. Charley would approve. The Botanic Garden at Oxford, including, we presume, the monkeys which live or did live in it, is maintained by the tithes of one parish, and we have heard of the tithes of another parish going to keep up a Dissenting meeting-house. So Mr. Charley's theory of a monopoly on the part of "wealthy Whig peers" will hardly stand. In fact, nothing can be more unwise than for gentlemen on his side of the House to stir any question about the "period of the Reformation," "the grasping kings," "the grasping monks," and all the rest of it. In the eyes of all reasonable people, the illegal surrenders made to Henry the Eighth, the sheer burglary—for it was nothing else—committed by Henry the Eighth at Glastonbury, Reading, and Colchester, were acts of confiscation and sacrilege of the foulest kind. But in the eyes of all reasonable people, the Act of Parliament which confirmed all these alienations, though it could grant no moral absolution to the original spoilers, gave a perfectly good title to all who honestly inherited or honestly purchased after the passing of the Act. But no inconsistency can be more glaring than when Tory gentlemen, Tory members of Parliament, whose wealth comes from deeds of confiscation and sacrilege, who are fattening on the lands and tithes of plundered Abbeys and plundered Bishoprics, whom an Act of Parliament alone hinders from being sacrilegious robbers, talk as if there was some limit to the powers of Parliament, and raise the cry of spoliation, confiscation, and sacrilege against a measure which indeed alienates Church property, but alienates it for the public good and not for private pelf. Mr. Fellowes in Huntingdonshire innocently said on the hustings that the right of the Irish Church to its property was as good as his right to his property at Ramsey. So it is—till the sovereign power makes it otherwise. But it is a strange doctrine indeed that that sovereign power might rightly confiscate the estates of the Abbey of Ramsey for the private enrichment of Mr. Fellowes, but that it may not confiscate the estates of this or that Irish Bishopric or rectory for the common good of the Irish people.

ST. PANCRAS PARISH.

THE war which is raging in St. Pancras parish illustrates the difficulties which beset all schemes of Poor-law reform. A sort of triangular duel is being perpetually carried on between the ratepayers, the Central Board, and the public. Each side has, of course, its weaknesses. The public is inclined to be apathetic for long periods, interrupted by sudden outbursts of spasmodic energy. The Poor-Law Board may sometimes yield too readily to pressure from without, and attempt to enforce schemes of impracticable completeness, though at other times it yields with equal facility to simple indolence. The ratepayers act pretty steadily on the very natural principle of a strict regard for their own pockets. Of this we cannot complain; it is the practical expression of that sacred principle of local self-government of which Englishmen are so unspeakably proud, and which has done so much to produce our present system of effective administration. It is at any rate just as well that there should be a good dogged force of resistance to be overcome which may serve as a decided check upon extravagant schemes of reform. The question raised by the St. Pancras dispute is whether, on the present occasion, this resistance has not been pushed beyond reasonable bounds into the old familiar policy of penny wisdom and pound foolishness. The elected guardians have had the advantage of an advocate who can write like a gentleman, and who has doubtless put their case in the best possible form. Dr. Edmunds, in his letter to the Times, said what was to be said, and said it in a good spirit. He declares himself to be unpledged to any step beyond opposing all attempts to destroy local self-government, and we can fully believe that he does not intend to act in any unreasonable spirit of opposition. This being so, we can judge of the merits of his constituents without any fear of overlooking their strongest arguments.

The first question concerns the ingenious manœuvre of the Board in altering the hour of meeting. The guardians who were elected under the impulse of the economical reaction were jealous of the ex-officio guardians. In order to get rid of their interference, they resolved, by a majority of one, to meet at an hour at which it was impossible for the ex-officio guardians to attend. The Poor-Law Board met this resolution by exercising their undisputed right of forbidding the hour of meeting to be changed. Dr. Edmunds says that this interference was "at once uncalled-for and impertinent." Considering that the avowed object of the motion was to prevent the presence of persons who had a right to sit on the Board, and that it would, in fact, have secured that object, we cannot see that the interference was "uncalled-for." It was called for by the simple consideration that it was necessary in order to give the ex-officio guardians a chance of exercising their privilege. The principle of appointing ex-officio guardians at all may be wrong; but, so long as they exist, the Poor-Law Board is bound to see that they are not deprived of their position by underhand manœuvres. As for the "impertinence" of the proceeding, the word scarcely strikes us as appropriate to an enforcement of the law by the highest official authorities; but, in a game of impertinence, the guardians are already showing that they are able very speedily to bring matters to a satisfactory equality.

There is the further assertion that the sudden adjournment of the Board left no funds for the relief of the poor, and put twenty-four persons who had been in waiting, on their invitation, for the election of a matron, to great inconvenience. Dr. Edmunds replies, that he or any other guardian would have been happy to advance the money required in case of need. That may probably be the case, but it does not meet the apparent presumption that the guardians were in such a hurry to insult the Poor-Law Board that they forgot altogether to discharge their ordinary business. The injury inflicted may have been trifling, but the spirit indicated is not the less significant. The guardians held themselves to be aggrieved by the resistance of the Poor-Law Board to their ingenious manœuvre, and proceeded to show their resentment by the first means which occurred to them. When they are cooler, they will perhaps remember that they will occupy a better ground for enforcing their demands if they will abstain from any but straightforward measures of opposition. By their present action they make it incumbent on the authorities to stand by the ex-officio guardians so long as they are liable to these insidious methods of assault.

The guardians, then, appear to us to have begun by putting themselves in the wrong; but the question remains, whether they have any substantial cause for complaint. So long as ex-officio guardians have seats, they must be supported; but is there any ground for the assertion that their influence has hitherto been a bad one? The complaint made by Dr. Edmunds is that, in obedience to "sensational writing," the guardians have launched into unnecessary expenditure. Sensational writing has many sins to answer for, and we will endeavour to avoid it as much as may be. The extravagant measures adopted are the erection of a "vast infirmary at Highgate, and of enormous schools in Hertfordshire." Dr. Edmunds admitted on Thursday that on this question public opinion was very much divided, and in his letter he has little to say of the schools; and the statement made by Mr. Wyatt, if we may assume it to be accurate, shows how small a ground for complaint really exists. St. Pancras, it seems, had no schools of its own, and contracted with the Hanwell schools for the greater number of pauper children in the parish. The Hanwell committee having given notice of the termination of this contract, St. Pancras was forced to build schools for itself. The greater part of the necessary expenditure has already been incurred, and, if Mr. Wyatt be correct in his anticipations, the difference between the payments made to Hanwell and the cost of maintaining the children at the new schools will more than defray the repayment of the money borrowed for the building and the interest upon it. At any rate, the building of schools was simply a necessity, and the only question can be whether the provision made was extravagant. The case of the infirmary, upon which Dr. Edmunds insists at greater length, seems to be still stronger. The parish hospital was overcrowded, and the building was originally intended for a school. The sanitary condition of the place was so bad that erysipelas was threatening to spread throughout the wards. An additional ward had to be provided for contagious skin diseases on the male side; and, this being impossible on the female side, the women and children had to shift as best they could, when there were twenty in a ward, with ten beds. The doctor was forced to retire from low fever and diarrhœa, brought on, as one of the guardians now opposed to building a new infirmary expressly admitted, "by the bad drainage of the workhouse." The matron died from the combined effects of disease internally and a polluted atmosphere externally, and the gentleman who took the doctor's place during his absence was forced to retreat from horrible stenches which were affecting the health of convalescent patients.

Now it is perfectly open to Dr. Edmunds to maintain that the plans for the new infirmary were unduly expensive, although, according to Mr. Wyatt, the whole cost, including the purchase of the land, would be covered by a rate of three-farthings in the pound. But Dr. Edmunds does not condescend to any such argument. He complains of the removal of the infirmary to Highgate, though it does not appear that the room could be so easily provided elsewhere; and he is eloquent against the evils of the infirmary system. He says that it will break up the homes of the poor; that, "by massing together large numbers of sick people, it must greatly increase the number of the sick and make it difficult for those who recover to get free from reliance on parish relief." These arguments, whatever their value, are obviously quite irrelevant. It is not a question whether there should be an infirmary at all; there is one already, and the new infirmary will only provide for the numbers already treated, and for those who, with equal claims, are constantly pressing for admission. The sick are already massed together, and, in fact, are packed so closely that the sanitary condition of the present infirmary is disgracefully bad. The very object of building a new one is to diminish these evils in the only way in which they can be diminished, by providing sufficient accommodation. It might be better, if it could be done satisfactorily, that the poor should be treated more commonly at their own homes; but, as matters stand, it is plain that the real question is between crowding them, in defiance of all sanitary considerations, into a totally inadequate building, and providing a new one in which they can be properly treated. The evil of encouraging the sick poor to rely rather upon parish relief than upon their own prudence is certainly a very grave one, but the degree to which economy can be pushed in such matters is defined by a very simple consideration. When you have got a sick man to deal with, the best plan, in an economical as well as in every other point of view, is to cure him as quickly and radically as possible. Infirmaries should not be palaces of luxury; but they should be clearly directed to the extirpation of disease, instead of being so many centres of contagion. The St. Pancras Infirmary has unmistakeably sunk below the minimum point fixed by the most obvious sanitary principles; it is not objected to it that it is far from luxurious, but that it produces positively deleterious results. A hospital ought at least to be clean, well-drained, and sufficiently large to admit of a proper classification of the patients; and Dr. Edmunds has not given the least reason for thinking either that the present building is not scandalously insufficient, or that the proposed building would be larger than is necessary to secure these very moderate requirements. The meeting of the guardians, on Thursday, showed how much even Dr. Edmunds's views are in advance of those of his constituents. The proposal to seek for further information before condemning the schools, though the terms in which it was proposed showed a strong leaning towards an unfavourable conclusion, was rejected; and it seems that the Jacobins of this little legislature are able to overcome the moderate Girondins as represented by Dr. Edmunds.

It is undoubtedly difficult to distinguish between economy of the two varieties—that which would limit the relief afforded so as to prevent it from demoralizing the poor, and that which is simply opposed to spending money, even when there is every chance of its turning to profitable account. We are quite willing to believe that Dr. Edmunds and gentlemen of his stamp conceive themselves to be speaking in the former sense; but, unless they can advance more telling arguments, we are equally convinced that they are likely to be the instruments in the hands of a blind obstructiveness. Their professions of general principle are admirably correct, and correspond to the most orthodox doctrines of political economists and philanthropists. When we come to translate them into details, we find that they cover a simple and very natural objection to paying taxes under any circumstances. Some excuse will always be found by the more intelligent persons for proving that every proposed reform comes under the head of reckless extravagance; and so the sheer dogged weight of parochial stupidity manages to cover itself by their help with a decent veil of respectable platitude. We can only hope that, till some better grounds are shown for objecting to the proposed improvements, the Poor-Law Board will exercise their authority without flinching, and, if it should prove to be necessary, will apply for increased powers to Parliament.

A MAY POSY.

EXETER Hall is now pretty widely recognised as a generic name. It already includes more halls than either University can boast—Freemasons' Tavern, occasionally St. James's Hall, Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, and no end of "Gospel Halls." The flowers of May, which formerly used to bloom only in the Strand, are now scenting the air of all the postal districts of London. Even St. Paul's Cathedral has this year been decorated with the flowering annuals of the Bible Society. Festoons of Presbyterians, United Free Methodists, Anabaptists, and Independents—the rich produce of the platform—hung about the stalls and surrounded the pulpit.

The prize of the season, however, has been taken, we are glad to see, by Exeter Hall proper. For it was there that on Monday, the 26th of April, was stuck, "conspicuous amongst the occupants of the platform," the gorgeous blossom of Africa, "little Dado." We are indebted to the public spirit of the United Methodist Free Churches for the introduction of Dado into this country. The prize drew all eyes toward it. The annual report referred to the presence of "little Dado." The audience had evidently come together to hear about Dado, and to see him. The mover of the first resolution prepared the way for Dado. At last the gatherer and cultivator of Dado, the Rev. Thomas Wakefield, stood up, amidst universal applause; the patient listeners believed that Dado's time had come; but the missionary talked six columns without uttering a word about the blossom of the Gallas. It was not until he had reached the end of a glowing peroration that the presence of Dado suddenly occurred to him, and he skilfully manipulated the sham peroration into a real one by declaring that he had forgotten "this little boy." The relieved feelings of the long-tried spectators found vent in a burst of cheers. "Let me," said the cultivator, "introduce to you my friend from Africa. His name is Dado." The little fellow, the reporter tells us, was here placed upon a chair by the speaker's side, and the exhibitor went at length into his history. It was no doubt interesting to the classes who compose the United Free Methodists to learn that the object of their patronage, like most of the heathen flowers brought to England for exhibition, "belongs to a high family." Dado, it appears, was out one day with his nurse and a slave boy, when they were decoyed into a hut by some people called Wakokomo, who are a sort of Fenian subjects of the Gallas. The Wakokomo, instead of shooting their landlords, steal their wives and their children, and sell them to the Turk. Of a Turk at Mumbas Mr. Wakefield obtained Dado; it was just at a fortunate crisis, for he was leaving Eastern Africa for Exeter Hall without any heathen spoil. Two brilliant notions struck Mr. Wakefield—first, that Dado would be just the trophy "to make an" anti-"Roman holiday" in Exeter Hall; and, secondly, that Dado would be a cheap and easy tutor for Mr. Wakefield himself. On this last use of Dado's acquisition he naïvely remarks, "I thought if I could get him to come with me to England I might, by conversing with him on the voyage, considerably improve myself in speaking the language." The cost of Dado was not mentioned; we suppose the Turk would not give him up for nothing. A dialogue between Dado and the missionary, in the tongue of Gallas, would have given liveliness to the meeting. On the principal end for which Dado was plucked up and transplanted, Mr. Wakefield says:—"I thought that you who are supporters of our mission would feel a particular interest if you could see a little interesting boy like that, a specimen of our East-African races." The Christians to whom the Apostles returned used to rejoice when they "heard" of the people who had been converted. The United Methodist Free Churches think "seeing is believing," and their missionary shows them a specimen of the children of the people who ought to be converted. As for Dado himself, whether he has been baptized—we beg pardon, whether "he has found peace"—does not appear. Dado's fame reached Exeter Hall before Dado himself, and the demands of United Methodist Free Churches men and women for his portrait were so numerous that it was impossible to supply them. A stock, however, was created against the day of exhibition; and Mr. Wakefield closed the moving of his resolution, "That this meeting rejoices in the spread of Protestant principles," with the apostolical appeal, "We have a few photographs with us to-night, and if there are any here who would like to grace their album with the interesting picture of a distinguished foreigner, they may do so for one shilling." It is satisfactory to find that the study of the bald languages of Africa has not caused Mr. Wakefield to deteriorate in the knowledge and use of that rich penny-a-lining verbiage of which his native tongue is capable. Applause, says the reporter, followed this announcement, and shillings, we presume, followed the applause. The reporter, alas, cannot give us what would be the most interesting missionary fact of all—the real impression made upon poor Dado's own mind by all he has seen and heard since he came into the possession of English United Methodist Free Churches men. We cannot help believing that if the Apostle St. Paul had carried about Timothy and Titus in this way, and made shows of them to the brethren at Jerusalem, neither of them would have cared very much to be a Christian Bishop.

A fine orange-tinted flower was produced at the close of this missionary meeting. A Mr. Wirsop was "entrusted with a resolution," in which the United Methodist Free Churches were urged to increase their Protestant zeal. They must change it, Mr. Wirsop told them, from its present culpable "warmth" into a glorious and laudable "fever-heat." One result of the expected Papal Council may be a prohibition of their importation of little Dados. Mr. Wirsop's flower was remarkable for its classical form. Africa had in it a city called Carthage. Did not Cato, that heathen old Papist, close every speech he made to the Romans with the inflammatory ending, "Carthage must be destroyed"? "Therefore, even at a missionary meeting," cried Mr. Wirsop, "I would venture to conclude by saying, 'Let there be no peace with Rome.'" The audience perhaps imagined that some interesting form of pre-Christian Protestantism perished in the fall of Carthage, for they loudly applauded this truly Carthaginian sentiment. The "proceedings terminated," says the reporter; that is, the audience began to flock out into the street. Little Dado was taken down by his proprietors, and every one went home.

The most malodorous flowers at the May Meetings are those brought to the general posy by Anglican clergymen. Exeter Hall is very differently estimated by the Dissenters and by their "dear brethren of the Establishment." The former appear for the most part to take the whole May season as a genuine annual Pentecost. They are in great glee and good temper; they are keeping the feast; pastors and wealthy chapel-goers from the provinces rove from scene to scene of religious dissipation; their best clothes are on their backs, and there is warm brotherly glow, we believe, in their hearts. The Anglican clerics, on the contrary, who appear at these meetings evidently take the May season to be a time of fast and humiliation. They make use of it to confess the sins of their own order—that is, of all the members of that order except themselves; and they beseech their Dissenting brethren to give them absolution for belonging to that order, and all the praise they please for not being so bad as the Rationalists or the Ritualists. The Evangelical parson at a May Meeting generally begins by exhibiting the flower of his own charity to the assembled sectaries, and asking them to admire it, while he finishes by a little abuse of the Pope, a little more abuse of the Rationalist, and a very large and generous abuse of the Ritualist. This last abuse must be the flower of true charity, for how can the Dissenters doubt his love to them when he takes such pains to show them how he hates his brethren? Ex-Archdeacon Hunter, who has exchanged the comforts of North-West America for the toilsome labours and deprivations of a Bayswater church, held up this flower of "Evangelical" charity in its greatest perfection at the seventieth anniversary of the Religious Tract Society. Mr. Hunter finds even the S. P. C. K. too strong for him. But, whenever he sees the name of the Religious Tract Society in a book, he feels "that it is a guarantee for the doctrines it contains." He always says to himself, "Here I shall find nothing of Ritualism, nothing here of incense or nonsense; I shall find nothing here of Rationalism, or infidelity of any kind." It was a left-handed compliment to the Society to tell it that its books contained neither of the five things that are bad; their absence is scarcely sufficient to make a book good. We are afraid that the Sunday School children of Bayswater, whom the ex-Archdeacon is so careful to reward with prizes marked cum permissu superiorum of "the ministers and gentlemen whom he proposed as Committee for the ensuing year," will not be long in exchanging his prizes for the Young Ladies' Journal, the Boy-Pirate, and the tempting "Number One, with which Numbers 2, 3, and 4 are given gratis."

WHEELS AND WINGS.

WE do not object to velocipedes any more than we should object to a new fashion in ladies' dress. It is true that all the ladies, old and young, tall and short, thick and thin, are certain to adopt any new fashion; and if the velocipede attains equal popularity among men, we do not suppose it will do any great mischief, and indeed, if some of the thick men who practise it become thin, it may do good. The notion of supplying velocipedes to rural postmen does indeed resemble rather closely that of providing plum-cake for the poor persons who cannot get bread. We do not know whether the Government has obtained a tender for velocipedes for the public service, or whether it expects that any large reduction will be made in the prices at which they are offered by advertisers to private purchasers. But we should think that, if the Post Office is expected to work a halfpenny post by postmen mounted on velocipedes, the managers of that establishment will be reduced nearly to despair. The proposal may, of course, be considered with reference either to the postmen or to the recipients of letters. As regards the postmen, they would probably prefer to be supplied with boots, or great coats, or even with umbrellas, at the public cost. As regards the recipients of letters, it is to be feared that acceleration of delivery in fine weather will be balanced by delays in bad weather; and we would suggest that the general substitution of wheels for postmen's feet had better be deferred until there has been an improvement equally general in the construction of roads. It is, of course, no objection to this proposal to ask why it was not brought forward long ago. Nevertheless, we may observe that the present fashion of velocipedes does not prove their utility, and possibly affords some presumption the other way. To take a familiar example, the fashion of high-heeled boots has been chosen by ladies, and is perhaps liked by men. Opinions may differ as to whether this fashion is elegant, but no enthusiast will pretend that it is useful. A lady who can move about a room in a pair of boots with high and almost pointed heels, and a long train, performs an exercise of dexterity, but she would find the same costume highly inconvenient in a country walk. It does not follow, because a young and active man can learn to sit a bicycle in a fortnight, that rural postmen can reasonably be expected to acquire the same accomplishment in the intervals of their daily work. Many postmen are not young, and a man of middle-age may be active in the performance of an exercise to which he is accustomed without possessing any great facility for acquiring a new exercise. But it may be said that the postman can go on three wheels or on four, and that it is not proposed to compel him to go on two wheels, or be dismissed. We are informed on authority that it is easier to upset a tricycle than a bicycle, but still there remains, what we will venture to call in old-fashioned language, the four-wheeler available for the postman. But when the proposal is thus presented all novelty disappears. As long ago as 1830 a number of country letter-carriers in France were mounted on velocipedes, and whilst the roads continued dry and hard they worked well. But with bad weather came bad roads, and to the wet succeeded frost and snow. A little extra labour was all that was required to overcome the extra friction of the bad roads, but the wheels refused to turn on the slippery frozen surface. The country folks wanted their letters, and the wheels of the velocipedes would not move except on their own axis; so the postmen had to trudge on foot and leave their velocipedes behind them. The difficulty was probably not insuperable even in 1830, and the means of propulsion have been improved, as we understand, since that time. But so far as there has been any invention in the matter, it concerns only the reduction in the number of wheels, and we humbly think that a postman can hardly be expected to imitate successfully the young gentleman whom we see depicted in a book before us "preparing to go downhill." The most earnest advocate of speedy delivery of letters would be open to the consideration that there might possibly be an accident—we do not mean to the poor postman, but to the mail-bag. It strikes us that this proposal to supply bicycles to postmen is about as reasonable as it would have been a few years ago to propose to supply crinolines to housemaids. We quite believe what is stated in a published manual, that the preservation of the balance of the body in the saddle of a bicycle is much less difficult than it appears; and our minds are fully alive to the force of the observation that if we feel in danger of tumbling over on one side we can stand upright. The same consideration has sometimes induced men of average stature to adventure their precious limbs upon a donkey; for although this animal is difficult to ride, he cannot throw you if you put your feet upon the ground on either side of him. We have read in the Pilgrim's Progress that

> He that is down need fear no fall.

There used to be a story current at Oxford of a very tall man who was upset into shallow water in the sight of a multitude of people during the annual procession of the college boats. The very tall man had imperfect notions of swimming, and was in a great state of flurry at the peril in which he supposed himself to be of drowning. Accordingly, he began striking out promiscuously with legs and arms as for dear life, while a chorus of voices from the boats shouted to him to stand up. When at length he comprehended, and proceeded to act upon the advice, and rose to his full height out of eighteen inches of water, universal laughter was evoked by his ludicrous performance. It is a comfort to us to remember that if our bicycle becomes unmanageable we can always stand up, and we shall treat the mockery of spectators with indifference. But we cannot help thinking that if a postman started to deliver letters on a bicycle, he would be pretty much in the position of poor Power in the farce, where he used to put his head out of the window of a bottomless sedan-chair, and say that if it was not for the look of the thing he would as soon walk.

As the modern form of the velocipede originated in France, we may reasonably expect that it will receive a military application. Among ourselves a proposal to mount a corps of volunteers on bicycles would probably supply a needed stimulus to that branch of the Queen's service. Let us, at any rate, have prizes at Wimbledon to be shot for by riders on velocipedes, and let there be at least one light company on bicycles attached to each battalion, and prepared to skirmish to the front and occupy any beer which may be in the vicinity for the use and benefit of the corps. We are assured that a man may travel on a bicycle with much less expenditure of "vital force" than by walking, and this would be a highly important consideration if a man could put his spare vital force into a bottle, and keep it to another day. There is, says the same authority, a large expenditure of power in supporting the body in walking, so that a small portion only is left for actual propulsion; whereas, if you put the body on wheels, the whole of its power may be exerted in propulsion. We are far from questioning that the velocipede may afford healthful and pleasant exercise, and some persons who are too lazy to walk may be tempted to acquire the power of locomotion by the bicycle. Walking is the simplest and most easily to be obtained of all exercises, and it has the merit of bringing various muscles into play to an extent which perhaps is not equalled in the use of the velocipede. Of course, if a man objects to expending power in supporting his body in walking, he can mount upon a bicycle, or he can go to bed. It is interesting to observe the dexterity which some performers have acquired with the bicycle, but we cannot help thinking that the postmen who are to use it might just as well be asked to fly; and we are gratified to learn, from the last report of the Aeronautical Society, that very considerable progress has been made in the art of flying.

It was announced at a meeting of this Society, held more than a year ago, under the presidency of the Duke of Argyll, that "the flight of man has become a fact of the day," and that the honour of the discovery of a means of flying belonged to an Englishman and a member of the Society. It is true that traditions exist of flying having been attempted in other countries, but one experimenter broke his leg and another his neck; whereas Mr. Charles Spencer has succeeded in taking short flights of a hundred feet with a machine of his own invention and construction worked by muscular force. This machine was exhibited last summer at the Crystal Palace, and we are told that, "by a preliminary quick run, the inventor was able to take short flights." We have not indeed any distinct statement by anybody who saw Mr. Spencer taking flights, but we are told that his father was a friend of Mr. Green, the aeronaut, and his godfather was Mr. Green himself; so we venture to express the hope that Mr. Spencer is married and has children, because we think that a son of his would be likely to be even more of a goose than he is. According to the official description of Mr. Spencer's invention, the weight of the body during flight is sustained by what are called aëroplanes, which are combined with two short wings moved by the arms. A speaker at the meeting said that "geese took up their legs and flew off," and so would Mr. Spencer; but we are not informed that Mr. Spencer did. The same speaker recommended that such flying should be practised as gymnastics, without minding what the Press might say about it. We should certainly wonder that a man who did not mind the chance of breaking his limbs should fear the ridicule of a newspaper. But perhaps Mr. Spencer could not rise high enough to hurt himself in falling. The only experiment which he made in the presence of spectators was in the transept of the Crystal Palace, and then he was suspended by a long rope. The chairman of the meeting said, and everybody will say, that "we all look forward to Mr. Spencer's flying with great interest." Mr. Spencer declared his intention to practise every morning, and as this was nearly a year ago, it may be hoped that by this time he is able to soar on other wings than those of his imagination. We do not indeed know that Mr. Spencer is not at this moment in the moon, but we do rather suspect that he resembles those persons who talk in a figurative sense of doing things "like a bird." For our own part, we agree with a speaker at the meeting, that the danger of breaking bones "appears a very serious objection to the practical utility of mechanical flying." But the invention, if it be one, of flying by an Englishman may console this country for having to seek instruction in the use of the bicycle from a Frenchman. We are indeed happy to be informed that no jealousy exists between the aeronauts of France and of England, and that "the two countries are going hand in hand in the matter" of making geese of themselves. When the world has completed the progress on which it has now entered, its inhabitants will be cherubs on wheels.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

III.

THE strength of the Academy this season rests quite as much on its new building as on the works exhibited by certain of its members whom we refrain from naming. By common consent some of the worst pictures in the Exhibition are by Academicians and Associates. Of the former there are at least seven, of the latter there are at all events two, who could have little chance of a place on the walls had they to rely on merits instead of on vested rights. It is in mercy that such works, which usurp the best places and disfigure the Exhibition, are passed quietly by without notice. The President possibly hinted at some of these sad cases when he said that it might be hoped the Academy would find itself in a position to extend charitable aid to the less successful members of the profession.

Mr. Alfred Elmore, R.A., contributes seven works; he has seldom been in greater force, whether judged by the standard of quantity or of quality. His "Judith" is one of the noblest readings of the character yet given. The subject, as will readily be imagined, was seldom touched by the early and spiritual painters. Raffaelle did not include it within his Bible in the Loggia; the incident is not to be found in our National Gallery, neither can it be easily traced in books which treat of the history of religious art. But perhaps the very reasons which excluded the story from early annals might recommend it to periods of decadence. We recall figures of Judith in the galleries of Dresden, Munich, and Paris, but they are all rather late or absolutely modern, and accordingly the style is redundant and florid; indeed the treatment sometimes becomes absolutely revolting. And just because Mr. Elmore has not surrendered himself to these temptations of his theme, his "Judith" stands before us in simple dignity, the deliverer of her people. There is absence of horror, yet in the darkness lit fitfully by the moon we have mystery and the suggestion of tragedy. Calm resolve is in the brow and eye, and quivering terror in the blanched lips; to do the deed without flinching is evidently possible to that massive arm and firmly knit wrist. The type of features is southern, the skin is even swarthy; the artist may have found his model during his sojourn in Algiers. Great affluence of colour, such as Giorgione gets in shadow, has been thrown into this picture, though pitched in deepest tone. The execution is broad; there is no descent into realism, for appeal has been made, not to the eye, but through the eye to the imagination. The remaining pictures by Mr. Elmore are in like manner distinguished by deep, lustrous colour, and by elevation above common nature. Mr. Lewis, R.A., admits of interesting comparison, or rather contrast, with the painter just named. The two artists alike depict the Arab and the Turk on African soil, but most dissimilar is the treatment which they respectively adopt. Mr. Lewis, perhaps, is without parallel in Europe. Several Continental artists have taken a like line, Gérôme among the number, yet between Gérôme and Lewis, even when in Cairo, analogies are distant. Only it may be said of each that the products are sometimes more peculiar than pleasing, more clever than edifying, in any moral or intellectual sense. Few artists have so deliberately trifled with talents of first-rate order as the painter who sends to the Academy "The Money-Changer in a Cairo Bazaar," "An Intercepted Correspondence" within a harem, and "The Commentator on the Koran." Pictures, we repeat, become trifling when trivialities are dotted down to infinitude with little purpose; yet it is true that we gain the pattern of a trellis or mosaic, the texture of a silk, and the dazzle of a sunbeam. It must be admitted that these works are, as feats of a fine-pointed pencil, miracles after their kind. The harem, as might be expected, is somewhat indifferent as to morals, and withal far from unimpeachable in art. Here we encounter several of the painter's old models, familiar by this time to most Exhibition-goers; the execution is often inimitable, yet unequal, and in parts faulty; the details are more than usually scattered and incoherent, and the general ground-plan of the interior, with the figures diminishing in so-called perspective, presents absolute impossibilities. The five pictures contributed by Mr. Lewis would imply an incredible amount of labour within the twelve months, but we question whether any one among the number reaches the pitch of certain famous water-colour drawings in past years.

Academicians and others by turns ascend to historic heights and descend to the lower level of domestic genre. Thus Mr. Cope, R.A., gives his sublime thoughts to the one and surrenders his kindly affections to the other. This painter, in "The Price of Victory," invests the Duke of Wellington in wooden stolidity on a large scale; the colour is opaque, the whole treatment eminently inartistic; the work may be accepted as an historic signboard. Mr. Cope is more within his sphere in simple scenes calling forth tenderness, such as "The Domestic Chaplain." There is careful painting in this picture, though the shadows are rather black; the face of the sick girl blends suffering with resignation. Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., is another painter who varies his style with his subject. "Grinling Gibbons' first Introduction at Court" may have full much flutter of drapery and heat in colour, faults into which the artist has of late fallen; but the story, as usual, is happily told, and there is much admirable painting placed at the service especially of the ladies, who are richly endowed both at the hands of nature and of the milliner. Mr. Ward very properly becomes more grave and severe when he calls attention to "Luther's First Study of the Bible." The Reformer will be scarcely recognised robed as a monk, and still a youth of little more than twenty; moreover, the countenance and bearing have more of the subtlety of the serpent than could be looked for in this boldly-outspoken hero of the Reformation. But whatever controversy there may be as to the reading of the character, most critics will concede that the pictorial treatment is broad, bold, and vigorous. Historic works of this size and import are rare in our English school. Mr. Ward also exhibits a water-colour drawing—"Monk declaring for a Free Parliament." Here, again, he shows grasp of historic situations, power of concentration, and a shrewd eye for character. This small replica is on several accounts to be preferred to the original "Fresco in the Commons Corridor, Houses of Parliament." We may note, in passing, certain free but effective historic readings by Mr. A. Johnston—"Charlotte Corday" and the "Flight of the Queen of James II." This artist has been known not unfavourably for brilliant fancy figures, half rustic, half romantic. His style will admit of some sobering down ere it can settle into historic gravity. Like criticism might hitherto have been directed against the clever offhand manner by which Mr. Marcus Stone has been usually known, and yet assuredly the artist assumed a dignity and decorum not unbefitting history while painting that supremely clever picture, "The Princess Elizabeth obliged to attend Mass by her sister Mary." The composition is thrown off with facile felicity, and though it may threaten to fall asunder where the figures are scantiest, still the action has been kept together by connecting links, and the interest is nowhere allowed to flag through lack of incident.

The picture is lively, yet sufficiently quiet, and the historic event seems to happen naturally and, as it were, by accident; yet the artist makes his presence felt in the well-ordered marshalling of his characters and incidents. Perhaps there is something a little swellish in the bearing of the ambassadors, yet the part of the picture where these dignitaries are installed has been painted with such address that we would rather not find fault, but simply look and admire. Thus, while some of our Academicians, taking their ease, forsake the higher walks of art, and find refuge in genre, it is a hopeful sign to find that certain among our young and enterprising painters are struggling upwards into history. "The Disgrace of Cardinal Wolsey," by Mr. J. Pettie, A.R.A., shows how an artist, by giving his mind to more elevated strains of thought, may forsake trivial incidents, and betake himself to national incidents recorded by historians and dramatized by Shakspeare. Yet we do not suppose that even Mr. Pettie can hope that his picture is perfect; thus, while we look admiringly on that profound study of character given in the full face of Wolsey—every line a register of thought, craft, dismay—the question is not impertinent whence and from what data the likeness was obtained? The only portraits of the Cardinal exhibited at Kensington—namely, the one lent by the Royal College of Physicians, the other the well-known and engraved head in the possession of Christ Church, Oxford—are in profile. And, if we mistake not, no full-face of Wolsey exists, the reason assigned being that the Cardinal laboured under a defect of vision which he shrank from displaying by any full-face picture. The answer which it may be possible to give to the above query must materially affect the value of Mr. Pettie's picture as an historic transcript. The picture, as a picture, may be accepted as Mr. Pettie's master-work. Yet the style is in danger of mannerism; like the scratchy execution of Mr. Orchardson, the touch is less that of painting than of etching. As to colour, these broken greens, greys, and olives are nearer to nature north of the Tweed than to our own latitude. The artist has put the highest light upon the Cardinal's diamond ring; and verily gold and diamonds, when painted by Scotchmen, show more light and colour than the sun shining in Edinburgh.

Perhaps neither Mr. Pettie nor Mr. Orchardson has been before seen to greater advantage than now. "The Duke's Antechamber," as to execution and colour, shares the merits, together with the demerits, already assigned to Mr. Pettie in common with others in the Scotch school. But Mr. Orchardson displays traits peculiar to himself; indeed, his style has scarcely escaped eccentricity. This antechamber leads to the audience-room of a Medici or Mecænas, and in it, without sufficient reason, are congregated a motley crew, threadbare in genius—poets, players, musicians, and others—some needy and out at elbows. We will not dwell upon the clever offhand dash, upon the pointed portraiture of salient character, verging possibly on caricature, upon the expression thrown into heads and transferred to hands—all which merits will be generally conceded. But we have to observe upon the tone and morale which the artist has thought fit to assume. The scene lacks reality; the studies of character must have been made, not in the anteroom of a Duke, but in the green-room of a theatre. The characters, as the costumes, are but properties of the stage. We accept the picture as a fit measure of justice to a company of strolling players, but, instead of being a worthy portraiture of men of genius and of artists in the high sense of the word, it is a parody and caricature. We cannot but think that a painter who is himself in possession of rare artistic power should have done more honour to his vocation. He has used this well-chosen subject, primarily to produce an effective picture, with the incidental advantage of proving his own readiness and resource.

The outsiders are fighting hard for recognition, attesting their strength by well-trained work. We have already mentioned Mr. Marcus Stone; pictures by Mr. Storey, Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Wynfield, and others remain for notice. Mr. Storey contributes three works—"Sister," "Going to School: Portraits," and the "Old Soldier"; neither can be said to be quite up to the high mark of the artist's picture last year. Mr. Storey's position, however, seems secure; in the "Old Soldier" we recognise the accustomed style—refinement in feeling, grace in action, balance in composing lines, with a silvery colour and grey haze in atmosphere approaching the manner of young Mr. Leslie. Each painter will have to pray for more strength and less prettiness. Mr. J. E. Hodgson made a great effort when he painted "The Arab Storyteller," which some have mistaken for St. John preaching in the wilderness. The subject is well chosen and carefully considered; central figures, whether preaching or telling stories, always give opportunity for action, and the circle of listeners around can be made to comprise varied character and strong expression. Mr. Hodgson has turned the occasion to good account; the audience is "mixed"; the artist evidently has thrown together his stray sketches in Tangiers; men, women, and children, of colours, creeds, nationalities, classes, conditions the most diversified, here come to listen with attention and gape in wonder at the Arabian Nights' entertainment recited in their presence. Mr. Lane, in his "Modern Egyptians," devotes three chapters to "Public Recitations of Romances"; he estimates that in Cairo there were not fewer than eighty-six persons who practised this calling. We are told, and can easily believe, that "much of the entertainment derived from these recitations depends upon the talent of the mohhaddit, who often greatly improves the stories by his action, and by witty introductions of his own invention." Mr. Hodgson's delineation, if not brilliant, is true; he has gone steadily through his task; the figures have the individuality of portraits, and the accessory landscape is literal as a sketch made on the spot. The same conscientious, persevering labour Mr. Wynfield brings to bear on a very different theme, "The Rich Widow." The lady, we are told, is "young, beautiful, and a great fortune." The story, it is said, has some foundation in history, otherwise the improbability would seem great that a respectable widow should thus find herself without lady companions in the presence of a crowd of importunate men. The picture, as we have said, is careful as to composition, colour, and execution; the whole is well meant. Before quitting Gallery No. II., in which we have found Mr. Storey and Mr. Wynfield, let us direct attention to Mr. Halswell's "Roba di Roma," a work which for vigour, colour, character, recalls the Spanish pictures of the late John Phillip. We have marked also for commendation two contributions by Mr. J. B. Burgess, of "Bravo, Toro" renown. "A Spanish Monk" is quite after the Spanish school; the figure is almost worthy of Spagnoletto or of Zurbaran, the Spanish Caravaggio. While we look in admiration at this "Spanish Monk," it becomes evident whence Mr. Burgess has obtained breadth, vigour, and deep-toned colour. M. Tourrier also is allied to the Naturalisti; the somewhat comic and coarse scene taken from Michelet's Louis XI. indicates that the painter's studies have been directed to periods of decadence. The artist will injure his position if he does not curb his excesses; "La Sérénade" was not worth the hanging, but as a foreigner M. Tourrier has obtained favour which this year is denied to Englishmen. Among the most inveterate of Naturalist painters, such as formerly revelled amid rude nature in the schools of Naples and of Spain, Mr. E. Nicol, A.R.A., has taken his stand. Yet we may congratulate the artist on having mitigated what has been obnoxious about his manner, when he painted that downright and honest work, "A Disputed Boundary." Perhaps we have still a little unnecessary dirt on the boots—a touch of nature as repugnant to good taste as the foulness of feet in Murillo's beggar boys, which provoked the ire of a great purist critic. We think, too, that the scene looks as if enacted on the stage rather than simply transacted in a house; the characters are a little forced and over-drawn. These are faults too often present in cockney schools of painting; simple, rustic nature is, in a vast city, often known only through the stage. It may be further objected that the artist's handling falls into inequality; in some passages the execution is excellent, in others incomplete. Still we accept this picture as one of the marked successes of the year; it is admirable for character, for realism, and for strength.

Loud complaints are still heard, not only as to the cruel exclusion of works for which there was manifest room, but as to the favouritism shown in the pictures admitted. Much of such discontent may be taken as a matter of course; grumbling always has followed and always will follow the opening of the Academy. But we feel bound to mention one instance, cited among others, which does seem to furnish ground for a grievance. A certain "Procession in honour of Bacchus at the time of Vintage" usurps, it must be admitted, an area vastly in excess of its deserts, to the exclusion, be it remembered, of perhaps half a dozen works. We will not repeat the reasons assigned for the alleged favouritism, but simply proceed to speak of this somewhat prolonged and tedious procession according to its merits. The painter, Mr. W. B. Richmond, is the son of the Academician of that name, and a pupil, we are told, of another Academician whose début in the Academy was made by an analogous work, not a procession in honour of Bacchus, but of Cimabue. The picture of young Mr. Richmond indicates the advantages which may accrue from good parentage and tuition. Some may object that the drawing is dubious, the execution faltering, that the best passages are compilations from the classic, and that the ambition shown is in excess of power to carry the conception to completeness. Such criticisms, though a little severe, would be scarcely unfounded. Still, on the other hand, it is unfair not to give the painter credit for nobility of conception, high range of poetic thought, and manifest struggle to gain a style ideal and elevated. We certainly cannot but feel grateful to an artist who shall thus bring some relief to the literal naturalism and pretty sentimentality which now afflict the English school. We recall a picture of much beauty and promise which young Mr. Richmond exhibited four years ago in the British Institution. He has in the interim made less advance in technicalities than might have been expected; we can only hope that his hand may yet gain power to express the thoughts which his mind shall conceive.

THE ITALIAN OPERA.

THE coalition talked of some three years back has, to the surprise if not to the satisfaction of the operatic world, definitely come to pass. Messrs. Gye and Mapleson are no longer rivals but partners; and although Her Majesty's Theatre is built up again and quite ready for use, the house in Covent Garden has been selected as the arena for the exhibition of their joint enterprise. For reasons which seemed to us sufficiently obvious, we took no notice of the prospectus issued by the directors some time before the opening of the theatre. Mr. Mapleson had made over his company with so little ceremony as to warrant a belief that at least one or two of his principal singers would demand some explanations before submitting unconditionally to the new order of things. And so it happened. One of the most highly prized among them, Madlle. Christine Nilsson, protested; and thus the pledges of the official document, in so far as her name was mixed up with them, went for nothing. True Madlle. Nilsson has since come to terms; but the part she will have to play during the season is materially different from what it might have been had she not taken means to vindicate her position and her interests. Her stipulations, it is said, have been agreed to without reserve; and one of them being the production of the new opera, Hamlet, for a specified period, subscribers may look forward with something like assurance to hearing that much talked of work in the Italian language. Rumour gave out, moreover, that this sine quâ non of Madlle. Nilsson's might possibly lead to another novelty being included among the attractions of the season. If Madlle. Nilsson is to have a new opera expressly got up for her, why not Madame Adelina Patti? Such at any rate, we are informed, was the reasoning of that popular lady; and few will be disposed to deny its validity. The opera said to have been suggested by Madame Patti is the Mignon of M. Ambroise Thomas, who, we need scarcely add, is also the composer of Hamlet. But the season being already far advanced, the production of both these works seems problematical. Nor can we think it at all desirable. M. Thomas is neither an Auber nor a Meyerbeer; he is not even a Gounod.

The advantages to be derived from the amalgamation of the opera-houses remain to be shown. That nothing remarkable has yet come out of it is positive. The fusion of the companies made it necessary to discard certain members of each, inasmuch as it would be impossible to find suitable employment alike for every one of Mr. Mapleson's singers and for every one of Mr. Gye's. So that on either side we miss the names of well-deserving favourites. The directors have begun by dispensing with the greatest artist, if also one of the oldest, on the Italian lyric stage. The first operatic season without Mario will be one to remember, if with nothing else to distinguish it. To Signor Mario's failing powers as a vocalist even his warmest admirers cannot be blind; but he is the most consummate of actors in tragic as in comic opera; and there are certain works in which his loss will be felt as a calamity. Then, as if to keep Signor Mario in countenance, the services have been dispensed with of a still more important personage—no other than Mr., now Sir Michael, Costa, who since the Royal Italian Opera was instituted has been its most powerful support. Whatever the cause of difference the result is to be deplored, and the more so inasmuch as the plan is now adopted of having two conductors instead of one. The effect of this can hardly be otherwise than to confuse, if not eventually to disorganize, the orchestra. In Signor Arditi Mr. Mapleson brought to the coalition the one man by general consent regarded as competent to replace the old experienced chief. Signor Arditi had fairly earned distinction at Her Majesty's Theatre. He had not merely shown himself familiar with the ordinary routine of Italian opera, but capable of understanding and worthily producing the neglected masterpieces of classic art. To him the musical public are indebted for Fidelio, Oberon, Medea, Iphigenia in Tauride, Il Flauto Magico, Il Seraglio, and other works of the same calibre, the revival of which will make amateurs look back with regret to Mr. Mapleson's seven years of management in the Haymarket. When, therefore, the two houses became one, it was reasonable to suppose that, on the secession of Mr. Costa, Signor Arditi would have undivided possession of his seat. In place of this, however, we have Signor Arditi and Signor Li Calsi, whose method of conducting appears to differ as essentially as their ability to conduct. In other respects, although, for various causes, certain performers of known experience have retired, as they are replaced by others equally competent, the orchestra is still what it has been for twenty years and more—the first operatic orchestra in Europe.

Without further preamble, we may now briefly review what up to the present time has taken place. On the opening night (March 30) we had Norma, played, except in one important instance, exclusively by artists of Mr. Mapleson's company. Madlle. Tietjens was Norma; Madlle. Sinico, Adalgisa; Signor Mongini, Pollio; and Signor Foli, Oroveso; while Signor Arditi presided in the orchestra. These, and the new members of the chorus, who supplied a long and crying want at the Royal Italian Opera, represented Mr. Mapleson; Mr. Gye being represented by Signor Marino, in the minor part of Flavio. The performance (into particulars of which we shall hardly be expected to enter) was considered generally excellent, and the fitness of Signor Arditi to hold with credit a position which every one conversant in such matters knew had been none of his own seeking, was unanimously recognised. Bellini's hackneyed work was followed by Verdi's Rigoletto. In the cast of this opera the disparity between the resources of the two managers was less apparent, though again the director of Her Majesty's Theatre had considerably the advantage. Madlle. Vanzini, the prima donna, at any rate, was a member of the Covent Garden troop last year; and though her Gilda, compared with other Gildas we have known (not to appeal to so high a standard as the late Madame Bosio), was second-rate at the best, it was by no means devoid of merit. The other characters were allotted to Madlle. Scalchi, (Maddalena), Signor Mongini (Duke of Mantua), Signor Foli (Sparafucile), and Mr. Santley (Rigoletto)—all from the old house. That the music assigned to the Court-Jester would be admirably sung by Mr. Santley was anticipated; but few had looked for the extraordinary advance of our English baritone in the histrionic department of his art. Mr. Santley's Rigoletto was the most striking feature of the performance, although the splendid voice of Signor Mongini, now, in spite of manifest errors of taste and want of balance, foremost of Italian tenors, was heard to distinguished advantage in many parts of the opera, and especially in "La donna è mobile." The conductor on this occasion was Signor Li Calsi, Mr. Gye's former "répétiteur," under whose direction the accompaniments were given in such a manner as to make it difficult to believe that we were listening to the Covent Garden players. Thus the inexpediency of having two directors of one orchestra was early established. That the custom obtains at Berlin and elsewhere on the Continent is true; but it is bad, all the same, and has never within the memory of two generations been tolerated at the Grand Opera in Paris, where alone performances on a par with those to which we have been accustomed for so long a period at the Royal Italian Opera and Her Majesty's Theatre can be heard. With Fidelio, which came next, the case was very different. Signor Arditi again held the conductor's stick, and, from the overture (the great Leonora, No. 3) to the finale, the masterpiece of Beethoven, in so far as orchestra and chorus were concerned, was well presented. The characters on the stage, with a solitary exception, were allotted to Mr. Mapleson's singers—Madlle. Tietjens (Fidelio), (Leonora), Madlle. Sinico (Marcellina), Mr. C. Lyall (Jacquino), Signor Foli (Rocco), and Signor Bulterini (Florestan)—Mr. Gye merely contributing Signor Campi, as the Minister, who does not appear till the last scene, when the dramatic interest has culminated. The single novelty was the Florestan of Signor Bulterini, one of the worst we remember, just as Mr. C. Lyall's Jacquino is the best. Signor Bulterini has a loud voice and sings loudly—which is all we have to say of him. With Signor Mongini in the theatre, it was lamentable to hear the soliloquy of Florestan in the dungeon-scene, and the tenor part of the trio and duet, thus sacrificed. Signor Mongini, however, has, doubtless, no wish to engross the entire repertory. Immediately after Fidelio we find him singing his best as the hero of an opera that has nothing in common with Fidelio—Manrico, in Il Trovatore, about which, beyond recording that the other characters were supported by Madlle. Tietjens, Madlle. Scalchi, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley (all Mr. Mapleson's), we need say nothing. This motley lyric melodrama stands much in need of repose; and if it were laid aside for years there would be little to regret. To Verdi succeeded Donizetti—not at his liveliest, but at his dullest. When the facile Bergamese—whose comic operas (although closely modelled on Rossini's) are perfect—wrote Linda di Chamouni for Vienna, he tried hard to please the German taste, but only succeeded in proving that the sentimental drama was not his element. Its more important pieces are alike ambitious and feeble, as much so as those in Maria di Rohan, his other Viennese opera. The concerted music is of course well written; but in the airs, duets, &c., "O luce di quest' anima" allowed for, there is scarcely a fresh thought to be discovered. That strangely-gifted and eccentric Hungarian, Madlle. Ilma di Murska, nevertheless, invariably contrives to make the heroine interesting; while Antonio is one of Mr. Santley's most effective parts and in the absence of Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Madlle. Scalchi is perhaps as good a Pierotto as could now be found, with a voice as rich as that of Madlle. Grossi (Mr. Gye's contralto) and more flexible. Signor Naudin's Carlo is not remarkable; but Signor Campi's Marquis is especially remarkable both for its obtrusiveness and its utter absence of genuine humour. That King of France who said, "Je n'aime pas les bouffes qui ne me font pas rire," would hardly have liked Signor Ciampi. Once more in Linda we had a shifting of conductors, Signor L. Calsi holding the bâton, but failing to control the orchestra, which seemed either not to comprehend or not to pay attention to his "beat." Next, in due course came the Huguenots, with Madlles. Tietjens and Ilma di Murska, Signor Mongini and Mr. Santley, respectively as Valentine, the Queen, Raoul, and St. Bris. Of these, beyond the fact that the voice of Madlle. Tietjens betrayed symptoms that should forbid the too prodigal use of it in such exacting operas as those of Meyerbeer, we have nothing new to say. The other parts were sustained by Madlle. Vanzini, who, being a soprano, gave Urbain's air, "Nobil Signor," in the original key; Signor Bagagiolo, whose fine rich bass sounded well in a great deal of the music belonging to the fanatic, Marcel, but who sang without spirit and acted without intelligence; and Signor Tagliafico, still a Nevers without peer, although his resources are by no means what they used to be. Signor Arditi (happily) directed the performance; and the value of the new reinforcements of the chorus was sensibly felt throughout the opera, most of all in the noble scene of the "Benediction of the Swords."

About the performance immediately following we are able to speak in terms of almost unrestricted praise. The opera was Il Flauto Magico, the chief characters in which were represented by Madlles. Tietjens, Sinico, and Ilma di Murska (Pamina, Papagena, and the "Queen of Night"), Signors Bulterini and Foli (Tamino and Sarastro), Messrs. C. Lyall and Santley (Monostatos and Papageno). This, with one exception, Signor Bulterini vice Signor Bettini (by no means an improvement), was precisely the same cast as during the series of performances given by Mr. Mapleson at Covent Garden Theatre in the winter—a foreshadowing, as it were, of the coalition to come. So that, Signor Arditi being at the conductor's desk, though the performance was in Mr. Gye's theatre, the idea of Mr. Gye's company could scarcely once have occurred to any one, except, perhaps, when Signors Marino and Fallar, as the "two armed men," were endeavouring to sing the canto fermo, in front of the "Orrida Monte," near the end of the last act. Up to this time certainly the "coalition" had been a strange one, seeing that the most essential requirements were exclusively furnished by one of the parties coalescing. The unanimous feeling, however, seemed to be that this representation of Il Flauto Magico was calculated to raise expectations for the future. Even new scenery had been expressly painted; and though many traditional accessories to the odd fantastic story were wanting—more than when Mr. Gye produced the opera, some eighteen years since, at the old Covent Garden, more even than very recently, when it was revived under Signor Arditi at Her Majesty's Theatre—yet enough was there to show that commendable pains had been taken in getting up the work. Mozart's enchantingly melodious music was for the most part sung extremely well; and, to name but a single instance, Madlle. de Murska, by her vigorous and splendid delivery of the almost impossible air assigned to Astrifiammante in the second act, roused the audience to enthusiasm. The weak feature of the performance, in addition to the Tamino of Signor Bulterini, was the execution of the part-music allotted to the three benevolent "genii" and the three attendants on the "Queen of Night"; but even here there were redeeming points. From the overture, that unparalleled combination of fancy with erudition, to the end, the orchestra was all that could be desired.

That which Beethoven pronounced the masterpiece of German lyric drama was followed by what, although composed by an Italian, is unquestionably the masterpiece of French lyric drama—Guillaume Tell. In the earlier days of the Royal Italian Opera the appearance of this great work was always an event. But of late it has been less cared for, and there have probably been as many unsatisfactory representations of Guillaume Tell as of any opera in the repertory. With Signor Li Calsi at the head of the orchestra, in place of Mr. Costa, it is not surprising that the performance on the present occasion should for the greater part have been mediocre. Such, indeed, was the case, at least in so far as concerned the orchestra and chorus. Inexperienced a conductor as he is, nevertheless the fault did not wholly lie with Signor Li Calsi. The orchestra knew the music by heart, and with a little attention might have played it as they have often played it before; but this was not the case with the chorus, which in the grandest situation of all—the meeting of the delegates from the four Cantons (finale of Act II.)—appeared quite perplexed. Guillaume Tell, however, did not belong to the repertory of Her Majesty's Theatre; and it was unreasonable to expect that the singers drafted from that establishment should be able to learn choral music so difficult within the short period allowed them for committing it to memory. The redeeming point was the superb singing of Signor Mongini, who, with the exception of Signor Tamberlik, approaches nearer to Duprez than any other representative of Arnold we can call to mind. Signor Mongini was not well supported, Signor Graziani being by no means imposing as Guillaume Tell, and Signor Bagagiolo, despite his fine voice, by no means effective as Walter. In Madlle. Sinico, on the other hand, there was a really competent Mathilde; and notwithstanding all shortcomings, music so original and picturesque as that of Rossini could not fail to make its impression. At the same time we should like to have spoken in a tone far less discouraging about the performance of such a work at the Royal Italian Opera.

The return of Madlle. Christine Nilsson and Madame Adelina Patti, the production of Robert le Diable, and the first appearance of Signor Bottero, a new "buffo," must form the subject of a future article.

REVIEWS.

VEITCH'S MEMOIR OF SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON.*

(First Notice.)

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON'S reputation is at the present moment suffering excessive depreciation. This is to be attributed, as its immediate cause, to Mr. Mill's critical review. The more remote, but original, cause lies in the circumstance that his celebrity was, not too great, but one of indefinite attribution. In the money-market undue inflation is followed by a reaction to an equally unreasoning depreciation of all securities; indefinite credit breeding equally indefinite mistrust. So it is in literature. Sir W. Hamilton was known to the public as a "great philosopher." But no definite idea of the peculiar kind of greatness was entertained. So that when Mr. Mill's assault came, the greatness exploded, and the public "sold out" with as little reason as they had before "bought in." The crisis, however, will pass. Sir W. Hamilton will be restored, not to popular worship, but to a noble niche in the temple of fame. His place in that temple is that, not of the founder of a system, or of an innovator on established modes of thought, but that of a transmitter of what has been thought and said. As a scholar and a man of learning, his acquirements were unequalled, in this country, in our time. And a unique position is not only apprehended with difficulty, but is especially liable to misconstruction and detraction.

The present Memoir will do much towards reinstating Sir W. Hamilton in his legitimate place in general estimation. It is not very long. For though it might have been compressed, yet it contrasts favourably in this respect with the two-volume biographies in which the affection of sorrowing relatives is apt to entomb the memory of the departed. It is interesting. The writer, Professor Veitch, has succeeded in blending the domestic with the intellectual life of Sir W. Hamilton, in one graphic picture, as biographers rarely do succeed. It is in the proper key; respectful towards its subject, while free from the panegyrical and honorifical excesses into which the zeal of discipleship so frequently hurries the pen of the chronicler who is at once pupil and family friend.

Sir W. Hamilton's was not a life of incident. He was born in 1788, and died in 1856, in his sixty-eighth year. The span of life thus allotted to him was laid out with a rare consistency of pursuit. It was divided between his study and his lecture-room; between the acquisition and the dispensation of knowledge. It was not till 1830, in his forty-eighth year, that he was able to obtain the position for which he was so eminently qualified, and to which he may be said to have had a natural right—namely, a University chair. It is impossible, indeed, to read the record of his fruitless attempts to obtain a professorship, and his final success by a majority of four (eighteen to fourteen) over a very inferior competitor, without a bitter feeling of our national neglect of the interests of the higher education. Sir William was an Oxford man, a Snell Exhibitioner of Balliol, and was in the First Class in 1810. For six-and-twenty years after this he was competing unsuccessfully for poorly paid chairs in Scotland. By the time he was forty he had become widely recognised as the most learned scholar of his day in the history of philosophy. And all this while the richly-endowed chairs and headships of his own University were filled by men who neither taught nor knew any science; while fellowships—life-pensions better than many a Scotch professorship—were given away in batches to young men of five-and-twenty, whose whole stock of knowledge consisted of half a dozen Greek and Latin authors.

During these twenty-six years Hamilton, who had inherited no private fortune with the baronetcy, had to trust to the Bar for support. His professional practice was respectable, though not large. His legal acquirements were not inconsiderable, including a thorough knowledge of the civil law. His opinion in antiquarian cases, including the history of teinds, was esteemed. But while his political views, as a Whig, excluded him from any share in the numerous legal appointments at the disposal of Government, his intellectual pursuits and his scholarly repute were positive disrecommendations to the agents who have the making of the young advocate. The wearisome pacing to and fro of the Parliament House was soon abandoned, and with it the best chance of a brief, for those underground recesses in which were then stored the choice treasures of the Advocates' Library. There was open to him literature. But periodical writing was not then the regular and paying profession it has since become. And Hamilton's acquirements were of that solid kind that were not easily minted into current coin. Under compulsion he could write with great rapidity, yet he took up his pen with great reluctance, and required an outward stimulus to engage him in composition. Such a stimulus was supplied by his marriage in 1829, and, as a Whig, the Edinburgh Review was open to him. The Edinburgh occupied then a high position, being in the hands of a man of distinct literary taste, and a personal interest in questions of speculative philosophy—Mr. Macvey Napier. Mr. Napier lost no time in applying to Sir William, or rather compelling him to write, against his inclination. He even selected the subject, the Cours de Philosophie of M. Cousin, then at the head of the first philosophical movement in France after the discouragements of the Empire and the Restoration. The famous essay on "The Philosophy of the Unconditioned," which first made Continental thinkers aware that speculative knowledge was not extinct in Scotland, was hastily written under pressure from without. M. Cousin himself, of whose doctrine it was a refutation, admitted that it was a masterpiece, procured its translation into French, and commenced a correspondence which led to a warm friendship between him and Sir William.

From 1829 to 1836, Hamilton's biography is the history of his contributions to the Edinburgh. Each of them was an event. His article on Oxford, in 1831, contributed not a little to the fact of the Oxford Commission of 1852; and in one important particular determined the direction of the Report of that Commission. In 1836 came his successful attempt on the Chair of Logic. Instead of entreating his acceptance of this not very distinguished post—it had been held for some years by a Dr. Ritchie—Hamilton was under the necessity of propitiating a body of thirty-three respectable citizens of Edinburgh, chiefly engaged in trade. His testimonials, including an inflated one from Victor Cousin, were overwhelming. But they did not, it was complained by the Town Council, afford evidence of his being a religious man. He was reputed to be a great reader of "German philosophy." His philosophical style was "obscure"—to the Town Council of Edinburgh. He declined to "mendicate the votes" of the patrons by the personal solicitation either of himself or friends. It might have been thought that his candidature was as hopeless as it had been in 1820, when the author of the Noctes Ambrosianæ was preferred to him as a Professor of "Moral Philosophy." It would have been so, but that a powerful champion was raised up in the person of Adam Black, then City Treasurer. Mr. Black's indignation was roused by the attempt to make the election one of theological party, and he came to the rescue. Professor Veitch also hints that, though Sir William was unflinching in his abstinence from personal canvass, his friends were more worldly-wise.

Sir William occupied the Logic chair for twenty years. From his appointment began a new epoch, not only in the University of Edinburgh, but far beyond its limits. Fresh active thought on philosophical themes had ceased as a power in Scotland. The impetus which Hume and Reid had given to speculation, and which Dugald Stewart had propagated, was apparently spent. Logic had ceased to be taught in the chairs nominally assigned to it, and the higher problems of metaphysics were entirely strange. The aim of philosophical teaching had come to be regarded, as in the English Universities, as a discipline of the faculties by means of composition on general themes. Philosophy had died of inanition. With Sir W. Hamilton began a new life for speculation, and a fresh impulse to the students. He had the art of inspiring and impressing young minds, opening up to them new fields of thought and vision, and giving principles and convictions which passed into their intellectual and religious life, to an extent which has very rarely been equalled by any academic teacher. In class drill, or disciplinal exercises, he was surpassed by many. He did little by way of interrogation, and had not even much power of oral explanation or illustration. Formal discipline lay in an inferior sphere. Hamilton's power consisted in inspiring in the students the interest he himself felt in the problems of philosophy. The Scottish speculation of the last century, when it is considered to have been most flourishing, had been too ignorant of the past. A superficial acquaintance with Aristotle, probably gained from a Latin version, was the utmost that either Reid or Brown had possessed. In Sir W. Hamilton the relation of present to past thought found, for the first time, a living exponent. He did not select striking or favourite parts of his subject, but was able to mark out from the outset the various departments of philosophy, and to develop each branch in its due subordination to the whole. He made a strong demand on the attention of every student. But when once this was given, the listener was naturally carried on from the more elementary to the more advanced parts of the subject. Those who had an aptitude for it were roused even to enthusiasm. The style of his lectures was naturally not so condensed as that of his published writings. It was a combination of passages of precise, technical, exactly correct expositions, with interspersed passages of mingled eloquence and quotation from Plato, or Pascal, or Malebranche, from Boethius, or Sir John Davies.

But Hamilton's class were not let off with the mere passive exercise of listening. There was plenty of work for them. He did not follow the usual practice of catechetical repetition. He required each student to prepare the last lecture in such a way as to be ready, if called up, to give an abstract of any part of it which might be selected by the Professor, without the prompting of consecutive questions. They were encouraged to add of their own, on these occasions, what was called "additional information," i.e., subjects connected with the lectures. There were often several lectures in arrear, and the student had to be prepared to take up at any point. Some of the lectures contained long series of minute and extremely subtle discriminations, such as the thirty-three distinctions between mediate and immediate knowledge, and the thirty-one between the primary and secondary qualities of body. The effort of preparation for these oral examinations was a most invigorating one to those who made it, for it was impossible to remember the lectures without understanding them. The mere memoriter men were sure to break down. Besides this, essays might be sent in, extracts from which, strictly limited to five minutes, might be read before the class. Prizes for essays were also given, and awarded at the end of the session by the votes of the class.

The power of the teacher was seconded by the fascination of the man. He was unpretending, even silent, in general society. He did not shine as a talker. His manner as a lecturer was characterized by dignity, earnestness, simplicity. He did not assume the pomp of learned pedantry. His superiority was felt by the students, but not because he made it felt. Courteous and unaffected, ready to answer difficulties, he was warmly loved by pupils who never saw him but in the chair, and never exchanged more than a few unimportant words with him. During the session it was his custom to invite parties of students to his house in Great King Street. Dr. Cairns remembers one of these evenings when, assailed by successive groups of querists, he stood for hours with his back against his bookshelves, and met all comers with that unconsciousness of his greatness which was the charm of his society.

Hamilton had thus found his way, late in life, to his proper work. But the day was too far spent, and the happiness of unimpeded energy was broken up by failing power. In 1844 the strong man was struck down by paralysis. Though only in his fifty-sixth year, he had taxed his strength to the utmost, not to say abused it. His enormous accumulation of knowledge had been purchased by midnight study. At Oxford, in 1808, he had made a resolution to rise always at six. But it was not adhered to. Late hours and prolonged work at night became the rule. During session he gave three lectures a week, and each lecture was written the night before. The lecture-hour was one o'clock, and the lecturer seldom got to bed before five or six. Frequently he had to be up before nine in order to attend the Teind Court. This was too great a tax upon the strongest physique. Few students who have ventured on the practice have lived, like Leibnitz, to be seventy-eight. The seizure—hemiplegia of the right side—was sudden and severe. Though speech was rendered difficult, the mental faculties were untouched; his wonderful memory, in particular, remaining unimpaired. Though he rallied from the attack, he never became again the man he had been. Though he resumed not only the labours of the study, but the work of the classes, it was evident that the mind alone sustained the failing body in the effort. He had to be carried or assisted up the stairs to the class-room. He would have been glad to retire. But a Scotch professorship is attended with no retiring pension, and Sir William had no private means. Application was made under these circumstances to Lord Russell, and again to Lord Palmerston, to place Sir William on the list of Sir Robert Peel's fund, by which 1,200*l.* is annually granted to persons eminent in science and literature. The application was refused by both the Whig Premiers, not without circumstances of indignity. Lord Palmerston characteristically thought that novelists had a better claim to relief. Lord Russell offered Sir William 100*l.*, at the same time that he bestowed, unasked, 300*l.* on John Wilson (Christopher North), who had been a bitter enemy of the Liberal cause, and had held for five-and-twenty years a chair of Philosophy to which he never ought to have been appointed. Afterwards 100*l.* a year was obtained for Lady Hamilton, and this was all the recognition that Sir William Hamilton ever received from the country. He was accordingly compelled to drudge on with the duties of the class-room, long after he had ceased to be equal to the work they imposed. Even with the professorship, it is hard to conceive how he contrived to bring up a family, and to amass a valuable collection of books. The income of the professorship never amounted to 500*l.*, and this was burdened for the first seven years with a pension of 100*l.* to Dr. Ritchie. He was constrained to the humiliation of applying for some inferior legal office which he might unite with the professorship, such as that of Deputy Keeper of the Great Seal, or Clerk of the Court of Session. He was passed over on both occasions. He had chosen his vocation, and it was clearly enough intimated to him that he must abide by it—to know and to starve. Of barren honour he had enough. One honorary title he enjoyed, which was probably unique. Being a layman, he was a D.D. of Leyden. The fame of learning brought curious strangers. A man "engaged in trade," from South Shields, followed him from Edinburgh to Dumbartonshire, where he was spending the summer, to get him to write his name in a copy of the Discursions, and then returned without caring to visit even Loch Lomond.

In 1853 he had an accident; he fell and broke his arm, and his system received a shock from which it never completely recovered. He dragged himself painfully through the work of the session 1854-5, and spent his last summer, 1855, at Auchtertool, a retired spot in Fifeshire. The depression of health and spirits was now become sadly evident. The Memoir of Dugald Stewart, which he had engaged to write for his edition of the Works, weighed heavily on his mind. He returned to Edinburgh, and made a desperate effort to get through the work of the session. He succeeded. But the work had exhausted all his remaining force. He died on May 5, 1856, of congestion of the brain, aged sixty-eight.

Sir William Hamilton was not a sayer of good things, but characteristic traits of the man are scattered in abundance over the pages of Professor Veitch's interesting volume. Of the contributors of reminiscences the best are Dr. Cairns and Professor Spencer Baynes. Dr. Cairns suppresses, however, what we should most have liked to have had—his opinions on men and things uttered in perfect freedom. His daughter's record of his domestic habits is a most melancholy one, an account of the struggles of the vigorous mind with the prison-house of the body. To go up or down stairs was a labour to him, and he carried on his study in the room used by all the family. His power of absorption was so great that he had often to be spoken to more than once before he could be made to hear. He established himself on a sofa, with the books he required for the day within easy distance. There he made his first notes in pencil, and dictated what he wished to write afterwards to an amanuensis. The amanuensis was usually his daughter. In earlier years Lady Hamilton had alone discharged this fatiguing office. No account, however brief, of Sir William Hamilton ought to omit to pay a tribute to the devoted love and care by which he was attended, in sickness and in health, by Lady Hamilton. Without her he never would have done what he did. She had been much to him before his illness. In his helpless state she became well-nigh all to him. He did not talk on politics, though in the Crimean campaign he had the newspapers read straight through to him. Otherwise his relaxation was having novels or travels read to him. He was particularly fond of works of the imaginative type—Frankenstein, the Ancient Mariner, and Mrs. Radcliffe's novels. He was as fond of fairy tales as a child. He was easily moved by the pathetic and the comic. Even in the class-room his sense of the ludicrous sometimes overcame professorial propriety, and the fit of laughter was for the time absolutely uncontrollable. His reading had supplied him with rich bits of bathos, which he was fond of repeating with enjoyment. There was a tenderness about him which enhanced even slight words of affection. His family were devotedly attached to him, and people who stayed in the house were always fond of him. Nothing made him more angry than ill-treatment of animals; in driving, he was very careful of horses. We conclude with the odd fact that he could take laudanum in almost any quantity—500 drops—without being sensibly affected.

STEINMETZ'S HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE.*

HERE is another of the class of cram books. Strange to say, however, it does not profess to be designed for candidates in any branch of any service, civil or military. Dr. Steinmetz is "Master of Modern History and Literature in Bedford Grammar School," and his "chief object in publishing this work is to furnish his pupils with a compendium for their instruction in Modern History." He tells us also, what we do not at all doubt, that "it will be very gratifying to him if sufficient useful and valuable information should be found in this volume to lead to its introduction, not only into other schools as a Text-book, but also into private libraries as a Book of Reference." Indeed with regard to his own pupils, Dr. Steinmetz goes so far as to "trust that it will become the means of their acquiring a fair knowledge of this branch of study." Dr. Steinmetz must have singular notions as to the adaptation of means to ends. That his book may be adopted as a Text-book in schools is not at all unlikely, because the worse a book of this kind is, the more likely it is to be adopted in schools. But that anybody in Bedford School or anywhere else could ever acquire a fair knowledge of modern history from Dr. Steinmetz's handbook is a dream of the very wildest kind. Indeed the Bedford boys seem to be even worse off in the matter of history than the Uppingham boys are in the matter of grammar. Mr. Thring was at least grotesque, and we could laugh at his gambols. Dr. Steinmetz is dull as well as blundering; we cannot even laugh till just at the end, when the Doctor climbs Mount Gerizim, and blesses the present sovereigns of Europe all round, save only Spain, where, for lack of a sovereign, he is driven to bless the nation instead. The book is so very bad that one half suspects that it is made bad on purpose because bad books of this sort answer better than good ones. A clear, accurate, interesting book, which boys and girls would delight in, seems strange and puzzling to ignorant masters and mistresses, and has a poor chance against Mangnall, Markham, and Maunder. So perhaps it is in sheer worldly wisdom that Dr. Steinmetz has carefully avoided making the least use of all the light that has been thrown upon history and cognate subjects during the present generation. We conceive that Dr. Steinmetz is a German, and perhaps no German could, if he tried, be quite so ignorant as some Englishmen. But the Doctor, to do him justice, drives native industry in this matter very hard. The positive blunders are many, but what angers one in books of this class even more than the positive blunders is the utter failure to bring out any of the great points of history—the lack of so much as an attempt to group and to narrate in such a way that the pupil may be interested at the time and may remember afterwards. The whole thing, even when not positively wrong, is dull and dead. No use whatever is made of the great discoveries of the day in those matters which give life to history. Historical geography, ethnology, comparative philology, are mysteries to teachers who have to unlearn; to children, who have only to learn, they are, if properly set before them, simply fascinating. In writing Dr. Steinmitz begins his book with the Goths and the Huns. A teacher who wished to interest his pupils might cut his story of the doings of the Goths even shorter than Dr. Steinmetz does, but whatever he left out, he would not leave out the fact that these same Goths are really near kinsfolk of our own, speaking a language essentially the same as our own. Show a child a verse or two of Wulfila; show him how the long words which look so strange are really the same as the short words which he himself uses every moment, and he will listen with interest, and attach a meaning to the word Goth ever after. But to load his memory with the mere names of Hermanic and Valens and Stilicho, without any attempt to put life into the dry bones, does no good at all.

It is certainly a painful duty which is cast upon us when we have to point out, week after week, year after year, the same errors, the same misconceptions, coming over and over again in the class of books to which Dr. Steinmetz's Handbook belongs. It really looks sometimes as if the labours of so many scholars were wholly fruitless, as if accurate historical notions were making no way, as if all that could ever be hoped for was the enlightenment of a chosen few. We believe, however, that there is hope after all, that truth does gradually dribble through the hard strata of ignorance and dulness, and we must remember how very many the strata are which divide the works of a real scholar from the handbooks which have most vogue in the ordinary class of schools. The thing however must be tried; we must have books for schools, books for children, either written or at least superintended by scholars of the highest order. They would have difficulties many and great to strive against; but they would gradually make their way in here and there, and they might perhaps in the end clear the field of rubbish. It is not of the learners that we have any fear, but only of the teachers. The more truth assumes the guise of a story-book, the more likely it is to succeed, because it is the more likely to come directly under the eyes of learners. Mr. Cox's little books must have given many children, and some parents and teachers, an intelligent idea of mythology. It is perhaps not too much to hope that some day a method of the same kind may throw light and life, and, if Mr. Arnold likes, sweetness too, into popular ideas of the Wandering of the Nations and of the mediæval Empire.

As for Dr. Steinmetz and the unlucky Bedford boys, no light or life or sweetness has as yet reached them. They have still to work in the dull old rut, to have every exploded fancy of our grandmothers still handed down to them. Perhaps we should not say every exploded fancy, for the fact of Dr. Steinmetz's German birth or descent does save us from one. The Bedford boys are not taught in so many words that Charles the Great was a French Emperor reigning at Paris. Marry this is somewhat, and on these occasions we are thankful for very small mercies. But Dr. Steinmetz teaches the Bedford boys to talk about France and Frenchmen a great deal too soon for any clear view of the history of Gaul and Germany, both under Charles himself and before the appearance of the Karlings. Indeed, as he makes Pippin "introduce a system of annual assemblies or parliaments called Champs de Mars, or Mai," we are not clear that he does not fancy that Pippin talked lingua Romana. And certainly very little will be gained if the Bedford boys, instead of thinking (as Mr. G. P. R. James, who wrote a "Life of Charlemagne," did) that Charles was a modern Frenchman who conquered Germany, are led to think that Charles was a German who conquered modern France. The point is to teach the Bedford boys and everybody else that France and Frenchmen did not exist at all in those times. Till we come to the days when there was a State roughly conterminous with modern France and speaking a language which is an older form of modern French, the use of those words simply misleads. So with Switzerland, Scotland, Austria, England itself, clearness and accuracy never can be gained till people learn to forbear using the modern names before they can be used in something like the modern meaning. Here is a specimen of Dr. Steinmetz's way of dealing with such matters:—

> When the empire of Charlemagne was divided, Switzerland fell to the share of the French; but they did not long retain this country, as it was soon added to the new kingdom of Burgundy. In the beginning of the thirteenth century, on the extinction of the dukes of Zæhringen, who, under the name of regents, had governed Switzerland in the place of the German Emperors, it was joined to the Empire as an independent province. In the following century, we find the country divided into a number of petty States, both secular and ecclesiastical, such as the dominions of the Bishop of Bale, the Abbé of St. Gall, the Counts of Hapsburg, Baden, Kyburg, &c. The towns of Zurich, Bale, Bern, and some others, had the rank of free and imperial cities. A part of the inhabitants of Uri, Schwitz, and Unterwalden held directly from the Empire, and these were governed by their own magistrates; but they were afterwards placed under the jurisdiction of governors (landvœgte), who exercised supreme power in the Emperor's name.
> Such was the constitution of Switzerland when the Emperor Albrecht I., of Austria, the son of Rudolph of Hapsburg, conceived the project of extending his dominions by the annexation of this country, in which he had already had considerable possessions.

It is a small comfort that Dr. Steinmetz has heard of the kingdom of Burgundy, and his account of the condition of the Waldstätte, though not good, might have been worse. But the Bedford boys are evidently taught to think that Switzerland eo nomine existed from the ninth century. What may be meant by being "joined to the Empire as an independent province" is beyond us, and Dr. Steinmetz, as a German, ought to know that the original Switzerland was purely German ground, and that instead of Switzerland as a whole ever having been Burgundian — to talk of its being "French" is of course nonsense—a good half of the present Confederation lies within the old German boundary. Now what idea of Swiss history can the Bedford boys get from this sort of talk? Yet we cannot believe that they are so stupid that they could not understand, if any sensible person told them, how certain Germans in a corner of Germany were enabled by peculiar circumstances to become unusually independent of the Empire and still more independent of any intermediate lord, how they formed a League among themselves, how the League grew, how this League and its several members conquered certain Welsh-speaking districts, Burgundian and Italian, and how in the course of time their connexion with Germany was wholly dropped, while the conquered Burgundian and Italian districts have been raised to the rank of equal confederates with the original German States. Such a statement is no harder, but a good deal easier than the other, only it implies emancipation from that bondage to the modern map from which it would seem as if ten thousand geographical Garibaldis could not set us free.

We have seen that the fact of Dr. Steinmetz's German origin has saved him from falling quite so low into the depth on one or two points as purely insular blunderers are wont to fall. But it is strange that it has done nothing to save him from the most monstrous confusions with regard to the Empire. Sir Edward Creasy has read Mr. Bryce, but Dr. Steinmetz clearly has not. We have the vulgar talk about "German Emperor," "Emperor of Germany," and so forth throughout. And this sort of thing is all the queerer from being mixed up with stray bits of accuracy all along. For instance, Dr. Steinmetz knows that Maximilian introduced the titles of "Romanorum Imperator electus" and "Germaniæ Rex." So, to go back some centuries, Conrad the First is chosen "Emperor of Germany," and "assumes this new title." But presently, under Otto, we read:—

> Three important events especially mark his reign. Firstly, with his election as sole Emperor or King, to the total exclusion of his brothers from any share in the government, it became an established fact that Germany was to be henceforth an elective and undividable empire. Secondly, he was crowned Emperor of the Romans and King of Lombardy, titles that, for more than eight hundred years after, were united with the royal sceptre of Germany.

But a few pages further on we read:—

> Italy.—We have already had occasion to allude to the history of this country, whilst relating that of the German Empire, as after the elevation of Otho the Great to the dignity of a Roman King, the annals of the two countries were greatly interwoven. Though Italy was under the sovereignty of the German Emperors, their authority was scarcely more than nominal.

What can come of this sort of utter jumble? As for our own island, we are told that "in 449 or 450" "the Saxons and Angles founded the Saxon Heptarchy." This enlightened piece of description is immediately followed in the same paragraph by the incomprehensible remark that "Wallia was succeeded by Dietrich I. (Theodoric I.), (Derric), a prudent, brave, and noble king, and most probably a son of Alaric the Great." Here we have got back again among the Goths, but we never heard that Wallia or "Dietrich" reigned in Britain. Indeed as Dietrich we should decline all connexion with him, however much we might welcome him as Theodric. Elsewhere the early history of England is summed up in this intelligent way:—

Many battles were fought and much blood was shed, before the unfortunate Britons were driven further up the country, and their kingdom divided into seven provinces, called the Saxon Heptarchy.

The history of this period is enveloped in much obscurity, owing to the perpetual wars. We must therefore briefly notice, that during the reign of Ethelbert, King of Kent, the seven kingdoms were reduced to three. It was in the time of this monarch that Augustine introduced Christianity into Britain. After the death of Offa the Terrible, King of Mercia, and nearly four centuries from the arrival of the first German freebooters in Britain, Egbert, King of Wessex, united the three kingdoms into one, henceforth called England, after the Angles, the most powerful of the invading tribes.

Many battles were fought, but it is a little hard on the Bedford boys that Dr. Steinmetz could not strain a point to tell them of their own local battle in 571. The seven kingdoms being reduced to three is a novelty. Getting on a little further, Dr. Steinmetz tells us with all authority, "In the course of the tenth century, we consider only one king worthy of notice, and this is Athelstan." Alas for Eadward the Unconquered and Eadgar the Peaceful! Dr. Steinmetz has altogether put an extinguisher on their fame. That we get the conventional rubbish about "real heirs" and "usurpers" at all dates from the election of Ælfred to the election of John is a matter of course.

So much for Dr. Steinmetz's way of dealing with whole nations and periods. We will end by culling a few flowers in detail. The Eternal City on its capture by Alaric is thus condescendingly patted on the back:—

Thus fell Rome, a city which dated 1163 years from its foundation, and whose power had subdued and civilized a considerable part of mankind.

Augustulus in p. 16 somewhat oddly "resigns the throne and imperial title in favour of Odoacer," who is presently "obliged to surrender his empire to Theodoric." Theodoric, however, "imitates the example of Odoacer by calling himself King of Italy"—which there is not the slightest evidence that he ever did. Theodora (p. 21) was a "woman of doubtful character," "daughter of a bear-leader"—a description of her father's calling which, though not wholly inaccurate, has a very odd sound. At some time between 573 and 718 there existed a "new Lombardian [sic] Empire, over which a number of insignificant kings ruled." The Saxons and Slavonians are in p. 92 coupled together as "German tribes." At an early stage of the book we are told that "Louis Philippe had to make way for a nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte," which reminds us that we were once in a roomful of people who thought us very ignorant for maintaining that the coup d'état did not happen in 1848. But in the course of nine centuries Dr. Steinmetz learned a little better, and we get the story in its proper place. Hugh Capet, by the way, Dr. Steinmetz thinks, was "anointed at Rheims"; and Louis the Seventh was a "young and licentious king." The respectable Empress Theodora (not the bear-leader's daughter) was as "depraved" as her sister Zoe; and her uncle, the Slayer of the Bulgarians, is not worth naming, but is casually implied as one of "these warlike emperors." In 1453 "the Anglo-Saxon dominion in France was at last over," which reminds us that, according to Dr. Steinmetz, it was to "France" that William the Conqueror, from some unrecorded and inscrutable motive, went back after his coronation at Westminster. To jump on a bit, Pius the Second (p. 149) is passed by as one of "a succession of weak and worthless popes, whose actions greatly promoted the downfall of their own authority." Leo the Tenth fares better:—

This Pope played a prominent part in the affairs of Italy, and distinguished himself as an astute and energetic, but at the same time unscrupulous politician. One of his biographers writes thus: "Leo would have made a perfect Pope, if to the patronage he bestowed on learning and the fine arts, and to his own accomplishments in polite literature, he had united some knowledge in matters of religion, and a greater inclination to piety; to neither of which he appeared to pay any great attention." But even bearing in mind this important failing on his part, we must still affirm that, for a long course of years, no Pope had sat on the pontifical throne who could in any degree be compared to him.

The "important failing" in the Vicar of Christ reminds us of the words of Tate and Brady:—

> Sure wicked fools must needs suppose
> That God is but a name;
> This gross mistake their practice shows,
> Since virtue all disclaim.

Lastly, as we cannot mention everything, Dr. Steinmetz passes over the story of Duncan and Macbeth, as "being too well known, from Shakspeare's vivid but too highly coloured description, to need further comment." Directly after we come to Dr. Steinmetz's greatest achievement, the greatest historical discovery of the age:—

Malcolm III. . . married Margaret, the daughter of Edward the Confessor.

With this astounding piece of scandalum sanctorum we lay down our blushing pen.

ICELANDIC GRAMMAR.*

SELDOM has the human mind revelled in more misty and bewildering vagaries about any inhabited spot of the globe's surface than those in which it has indulged with respect to Iceland, especially as regards its language and literature. It is not much more than a hundred years ago that a scientific society of Copenhagen—the highest of all such bodies then existing in the Danish dominions—put upon record, in a pompous paper of scientific inquiries to be solved by the Master of Holar College, this query of truly Gothamite brilliance:—"How does the ice of Iceland become dry enough to be used for fuel?" And there is plenty more of such matter to be found in foreign writings, from the lucubrations of Anderson of Hamburg down to those of the Oxonian in Iceland, who, after professing an unimpeachable knowledge of the language, calmly proceeds to tell us, not that the sun shines upon the unpretending island, but that it "skins" it, or covers it in skin—"skinnar uppá."

We are saying no more than the sober truth when we assert that, with regard to Iceland, we have not been over eager to adopt the stultitia caruisse principle; and this for sufficiently obvious reasons. As a producing country it has had but few attractions to offer compared with those possessing a richer soil and a more genial clime, especially since the time when its lucrative fish trade, which in the middle ages produced wealthy cities along the whole Eastern coast of England, died away or passed into other channels. Commercial interest, therefore, gave no impulse to the study of Icelandic in this country; and where this primus motor of all modern enterprise is absent, a nation poor in marketable produce, although endowed with rich stores of literature, seems to share the great world's neglect with utterly illiterate savages. Such neglect is in our own case the less excusable, inasmuch as we know that the Icelandic language is, to a very great extent, the root of our own, and that, of all the Gothic languages, it has incomparably the most fully developed grammar, while, of all modern European languages, it has the oldest literature—one by the light of which, not only we, but the whole of Northern Europe, will some day have to read our ancient history and institutions. What could we know about our mythic ages if we had not the Eddas? How far would our knowledge of the earliest history of these realms extend if we had not the Sagas of Iceland? How many obscurities surrounding our ancient legal institutions may not be cleared up by the study of the early laws of Iceland? In speaking thus, we are not yielding to the dictates of a fond imagination or a wild enthusiasm. On this point we may fairly invoke the testimony of Dr. Dasent. In the preface to his translation of Rask's Grammar, he says:—"We shall find it [the Icelandic literature] of immense advantage, not only in tracing the rise of words and idioms, but still more in clearing up many dark points in our early history. In fact, so highly do I value it in this respect, that I cannot imagine it possible to write a satisfactory history of the Anglo-Saxon period without a thorough knowledge of the Old Norse literature."

As regards the intrinsic value of the language and its literature, apart from the service it renders to our philologists, our historians, and our antiquaries, let it suffice to adduce the testimony of Rask, the father of Icelandic, nay, of modern European philology:—"I study the language," he writes to a friend, "in order to learn from its writings how, in days of yore, men bore adversities, and broke through them. I study it in order to learn to think like a man, in order to invigorate my thought and strengthen my soul, that I may face dangers without blinking, and choose rather to quit life than to deviate from or abjure what I am fully and firmly convinced is right and true."

A main cause of the slow advance of the study of Icelandic in this country has been the want of all auxiliaries, especially of dictionaries. Björn Haldórsson's work was long the only one available, and it would be so still were it not for Egilsson's Lexicon Poeticum, which deals to a small extent only with the prose language; while the dictionaries of Eirík Jónsson and J. Fritzner are of next to no use for Englishmen, being written in Danish. Even Mobius's Altnordisches Glossar, a very accurate work as far as it goes, is too circumscribed in its scope to prove generally useful. Dietrich scarcely deserves mention by the side of these works. With such scanty auxiliaries, it is no wonder that we are advancing slowly, especially as the only creditable English work on the grammar of the language, Dasent's translation of Rask's Anvisning till Isländskan has been out of print for years, and is hardly to be procured; while Mr. Lund's Grammar, which is easily to be procured, is utterly worthless. Dr. Dasent's work, of which but few copies, we imagine, were ever printed, is not a very satisfactory one. It is, as it boasts, a faithful rendering of the original, but it is faithful to a fault. For to render an Icelandic grammar, written in Swedish and for Swedes, into exactly literal English, without even so much as attempting to adapt it to English wants, seems the reverse of judicious. What, for instance, can be more out of place, in a grammar professing to teach us Icelandic for the purpose of assisting us to understand our own language, than to explain to us how the vowels are pronounced in Swedish, and not even so much as to hint how far they can or cannot be represented by English sounds, or pronounced by English tongues? Or, again, what can be more eccentric than to devote an elaborate chapter to the "transition of words from Old Norse into Swedish," while persistently abstaining from mentioning how far the same phenomenon does or does not make itself manifest with regard to English? Such then is the state of Icelandic philology in our country at the present time. We have two Icelandic grammars to study it by—one scarcely to be had, the other scarcely worth having. And yet the interest felt in the language is increasing steadily; hardly a year going by without seeing some work translated from it into English. Is it then too much to expect that a grammar worthy of the name should soon be forthcoming to facilitate the progress of our studies? No one is likely to say that such transitions from the Icelandic into our language as Dr. Dasent has spoken of with respect to Swedish are unworthy of investigation. So much, indeed, might be said on the subject, that no chapter in the history of English grammar would be richer in its contents, or more varied in its nature, or more profoundly interesting, than a satisfactory analysis of the various phenomena which such transitions present. And we take this opportunity of saying, that by the aid of the Icelandic vowels and vowel-combinations we can lay down general principles to account for the great variety of sound or pronunciation in our own language—a variety which we are accustomed to hear branded as chaotic irregularity, but which in our opinion constitutes a great beauty of the English language. If we were not afraid of wearying our readers, we would illustrate our statement by means of examples. We must, however, content ourselves with this hint at present, in the hope that ere long we shall see the task done, and done well; and to whomsoever the lot may fall of performing it, to him English philology will be indebted for a right good service.

Unsatisfactory as is Dr. Dasent's Grammar, it is at all events not so bad as Mr. H. Lund's work entitled "A Short, Practical, and Easy Method for Learning the Old Norsk (sic) Tongue or Icelandic Language, after the Danish of Rask." The very badness of this unhappy production would have saved it from being noticed at all, if it had not decorated its unblushing front with the honoured name of Rask. Mr. Lund evidently knows nothing at all about what the language is like, nor does he seem to have any defined notion as to what any other language in the world is like. For when a man undertakes to write or translate a grammar, and proves himself so utterly ignorant of its forms as to transform the genitive case into the accusative, and the accusative into the genitive, varying this Vandalism by interchanging the dative and the genitive, and wildly carrying out these transpositions where verbs and prepositions are concerned, and all the time showing that he has no consciousness of his absurdity, he proves himself ignorant, not only of the particular language he maltreats, but of the general principles which rule all languages. On the whole, Mr. Lund's Grammar may be dismissed with the simple statement that it is far worse than useless.

Before concluding, we may as well advert to the prevalent confusion as to what name to apply to the language and the literature of Iceland. Up to the days of Snorri Sturluson, or up to A.D. 1200, the term "dönsk túnga," as an equivalent for "vor túnga" (our tongue), "íslenzkt mál" (Icelandic speech), had in Iceland the prevalence which, after this time, the term "norrœna" (Northern language) obtained, and which it maintained there, as well as in Scandinavia, or at least in Norway, all through the middle ages. In the course of this time the Scandinavians had so completely dropped the old idiom out of their living speech that they could not understand it except after laborious study; it was dead for them. The latter part of the seventeenth century witnessed an awakening interest for the old language; and, as it had once been the common patrimony of the whole North, Scandinavian students began, with various degrees of ingenuity, to invent for it such names as might convey the idea that they all had their share in it. Hence arose the term "Old-Northern," which was first adopted by the Icelander Runolf Jónsson in his "rudiments" of Icelandic grammar, A.D. 1651, and which has now obtained general acceptance throughout Denmark and Sweden. In Norway the matter stands differently. With the persistence of narrow-minded patriotism, Norwegians will listen only to the term "gammel Norsk" (Old Norse), as a general name for the Icelandic or Old-Northern tongue; but there is neither precedent nor authority for the term, which is entirely inadmissible except as a name for the language of Norway after the time when it branched off from the genuine Old-Northern tongue into a Norwegian patois; for Norse, Norsk, and Norwegian all mean one and the same thing. It is not a little astonishing that Dr. Dasent, of all men in this country, should have lent his aid to rob the land for which he has done so much of its fair and undeniable title to the literature it has produced. We are at a loss to know what possible reason he could have had for making the mistake. He surely knows well enough that Old Norse means Old Norwegian; and he also knows that not a letter of Iceland's literature belongs to that mediæval and depraved dialect. Why, then, adopt so misleading a title?

With the fullest right we apply the name Icelandic to this literature. Our point of view is neither a Dane's nor a Norwegian's; we have nothing to do with their jealousies or pilferings. We have got our Old English in contradistinction to anything but Icelandic. We know that the literature of this so-called Old-Northern language belongs to Iceland almost exclusively; for, both as regards quality and quantity, the old literature of Scandinavia bears to that of Iceland an infinitesimally small proportion. And to whom is the literature of which we are speaking due in its rise, progress, and perfection? Certainly not to Scandinavians. The language in which it is written, as yet an illiterate one, migrated to Iceland in the middle of the ninth century. It remained illiterate in Iceland for upwards of two hundred years, ere it burst into bloom in the writings of Ari the Learned, whereupon its literature rapidly grew to an amazingly vast bulk. And all that Scandinavians know about their ancient times they know from this literature of Iceland—a literature which they now study with unrivalled eagerness, and which, it is to be hoped, will soon be made the subject among us of more judicious and more exhaustive investigations than have hitherto been devoted to it.

OLDTOWN FOLKS.*

It is seventeen years since Mrs. Stowe first astonished the world by the amazing popularity of Uncle Tom's Cabin. It would be difficult to say in what degree the success of that book was due to the talents of the author, and in what degree to its fortunate adaptation to the passions of the time. Few people would doubt, we should imagine, that the last of these elements of success was a very important one, though it is difficult to account for Uncle Tom's popularity in countries lying far beyond the sphere of American politics without supposing that its intrinsic merits were also considerable. Mrs. Stowe at any rate might be pardoned for giving some faith to the more flattering hypothesis, and for attempting to follow up her first victory. We cannot, however, say that her more recent performances have done much to justify her venture. It is abundantly plain that she is a woman of talent, but it is not so obvious that she is particularly well qualified for writing stories of enduring merit. This last publication is a curious illustration of her strength and her defects. It appears in outward shape like an orthodox three-volume novel. It contains a story, or rather two or three stories, which ramble quietly through its pages, and are brought to a conclusion at the end. But our interest in the plot is at all times faint, and Mrs. Stowe is always allowing it to stagnate whilst she rambles off into more or less irrelevant discussions. No one, we may say at once, should take it up in any hope of being carried along in breathless interest after the fortunes of the imaginary actors; such readers will be speedily annoyed, and probably drop the book in disgust before discovering the fate of Tina Percival or Horace Holyoke. Mrs. Stowe, indeed, is apparently sensible of this weakness. She has, she says, an object beyond the mere telling of a story, and that object is "to interpret to the world the New England life and character in that particular time of its history which may be called the seminal period." New England, as she rather quaintly observes, has always been "a capital country to emigrate from," and the character of the American people in all the States has been largely coloured by the stream which has steadily flowed from the old Puritan settlements. In the first page of the story she further expresses her opinion—not a very original one—that "the life of any individual, however obscure, if really and vividly perceived in all its aspirations, struggles, failures, and successes, would command the interest of all others." This is very true, and for the reason, amongst others, that it would have the charm of reality. When a fictitious person tells us of all his aspirations, struggles, and so on, our interest droops simply because we know him to be fictitious. At any rate, the interest which we derive from a personal history is very distinct from that which is excited by a dissertation upon national character. A great artist is able to fuse the two into one. We learn more from Scott's portraits of Dandie Dinmont or Jeanie Deans than from pages of dissertation upon the characteristics of the border country; but we cannot honestly say that Mrs. Stowe possesses this rare power, or is able to personify in a living and moving human figure the essence of Yankee life. The two elements obstinately refuse to coalesce; and we have alternately a rather commonplace story and a description of the various social and theological types of New England. We could wish that Mrs. Stowe had not hampered herself with the conventional machinery of story-telling, but had avowedly given us anecdotes and reminiscences of the remarkable people whom she undertakes to describe.

We object, then, to the novel, that it is not a novel in any proper sense, and ought not to put on a misleading external appearance; but the book contains a great many very interesting observations, which would be all the more attractive if they were applied to real instead of imaginary characters and incidents. Many of the descriptions are obviously founded on realities very thinly disguised, and we should prefer to have the realities without the perplexing intermixture of fiction. The New England population had at least the merits of originality and vigour. It has contributed more than any other element of the American population to form the distinctive national type; and, frigid and unprepossessing as it was in some respects, it has now the charm which always gathers round objects at a certain distance; it was old-fashioned and individual enough to be picturesque after a rather grim fashion. The quiet life of villages still surrounded by primeval forests, and divided by miles of execrable roads from any large towns, was favourable to the development of peculiarities which have died out before railways and emigration. At the period of which Mrs. Stowe speaks, which is that immediately succeeding the Revolution, there still lingered customs which have disappeared as decisively as Miss Austen's phase of English society. The minister's wife was called Lady, instead of Mrs., Lothrop. The minister himself wore a cocked hat, a powdered wig, and lace ruffles, and preached the most admirable morality in Addisonian English. Indians still lurked in the woods, though no longer requiring the stern treatment of the early Puritans, and resembling the gypsies of English country life. The old Boston families held up their heads with aristocratic pride, and some ardent Tories were not afraid to declare that King George still reigned supreme within their houses. There were a few old manor-houses reflecting feebly the stateliness of their English prototypes. The social condition of the country villages, however, admitted the most perfect equality consistent with a respect for the minister, who was not yet reduced to be a mere stipendiary at will; every one was educated and tolerably comfortable, and no one was rich. People of every position met on friendly terms round the vast kitchen fires, heaped up with mighty piles of wood from the unexhausted forests, and discussed theology or family gossip without distinction of persons. The most characteristic peculiarity was the intense interest in theology which they inherited from their fathers; everybody, from the minister to the help, held the most definite creed as to election, freewill, and predestination, and was ready to define his position and defend it in the correct logical forms. Polly, for example, who is Miss Mehitable Rossiter's "help," was a decided Hopkinsian, which, it may be necessary to explain, is an American variety of Calvinist. Somebody, says Miss Mehitable, "gave Polly an Arminian tract last Sunday, entitled, 'The Apostle Paul an Arminian.' It would have done you good to hear Polly's comments. ''Postle Paul an Arminian! He's the biggest 'lectioner of 'em all.' 'That he is,' said my grandmother, warmly. 'Polly's read her Bible to some purpose.'" A farmer brings a load of wood as part of the yearly contribution to the support of his minister, and takes the opportunity of giving him a hint as to his sermons. "Ain't free agency," he says, "gettin' a little too topheavy in your preachin'? Ain't it kind o' overgrowin' sovereignty? Now, ye see, divine sovereignty hes got to be took care of as well as free agency. . . . This 'ere last revival you run along consider'ble on 'Whosoever will may come,' an' all that. Now, p'r'aps, ef you'd jest tighten up the ropes a leetle t'other side, and give 'em sovereignty, the hull load would sled easier." Parishioners of this discriminating turn of mind naturally liked strong as well as sound doctrine. "Ef I pay for strong doctrine, why I want to hev good strong doctrine," says one of them. "Ef I pays for hell-fire, I want to hev hell-fire, and hev it hot too. I don't want none of your prophesyin' smooth things. Why, look at Dr. Stern. His folks hes the very hair took off their heads 'most every Sunday, and he don't get no more'n we pay Parson Perry." A short fragment from a sermon of Dr. Stern's will show how well he earned his salary. He is arguing the question whether the heavenly hosts will rejoice in displays of vindictive justice in the punishment of the damned. His conclusion is that "all who are conscious that they cannot say 'Amen, Alleluiah' may know that they are yet sinners, and essentially different from saints, and altogether unprepared to go with the saints to heaven and join with them in praising God for the vindictive justice he displays in dooming all unholy creatures to a never-ending torment." The most popular summary of theology of this kind is summed up in a book by a certain Dr. Bellamy, of Connecticut. Amongst other inscrutable mysteries, it discusses the origin of evil, and comes to some very distinct results. The Almighty, it is said, might certainly have made a world free from sin and misery; why, then, did He not? "What will He get by it all?" The answer is, that the fall of angels and of man "will serve to give a much more lively and perfect representation of God than could have been given had there been no sin and misery."

Calvinists at this time were opposed, not only by Arminians, but by the Freethinkers, encouraged by the new French philosophy. Franklin, and many of the most conspicuous men at the time of the Revolution, set a much higher value upon Voltaire than upon President Edwards. Even in the remote parts of New England the modern modes of thought were beginning to influence the old type of theology. Mrs. Stowe, however, thinks that whilst it lasted it acted as a healthy tonic, and produced an active and vigorous-minded race, very superior to those who, like the Canadians, were kept on the less stimulating diet of a religion which excluded, instead of encouraging, inquiry. A man who believes in the harshest doctrines of Calvinism is face to face with tremendous questions which stir the very depths of his soul. He may be an unpleasant neighbour, but at least he will not be a trifler nor contemptible. It would be curious to compare from this point of view the effects of a similar creed in Scotland and New England. One result, which seems to be specially characteristic of America, was the effect of this stern theology upon a nervous and excitable race. Some of the characters in Mrs. Stowe's novel are oppressed by a constant melancholy, or driven to the verge of madness by the awful prospects which followed from their view of the future of mankind. The more comfortable and even-tempered managed to persuade themselves that as half the human race die in infancy, a large proportion would escape from the gloom which weighed upon their imaginations. Others revolted altogether, and became infidels, after the pattern of Mr. Ellery Davenport, the villain of the story, who seems to be drawn after the well-known Aaron Burr. Many escaped by the help of a kind of spiritualism; the imaginary hero is constantly seeing visions, of which he confesses that he is unable to decide whether they were anything more than waking dreams. He inclines, however, to the belief that they were real spirits who appeared and gave him comfort in various critical circumstances. When we find a school set to write essays on the problem whether it is possible to demonstrate the divine benevolence from considerations of natural theology, we may suppose that youthful minds would be violently excited, and often driven to very desperate remedies.

We have no space to dwell upon the accounts of the external life of the New England villagers, of the Thanksgiving Days, in which countless multitudes of pumpkin-pies and turkeys were consumed by jolly Puritans, of the egg-flip, which was not despised even by Calvinist ministers, and the dances, which were justified by the precedent of Mr. Ready-to-Halt and Miss Despondency in Pilgrim's Progress. There are many pleasant sketches of these and other manners and customs of the natives, and, in spite of the defects in artistic merit of the book, it is worth a glance from any one who wishes to understand a remarkable and almost extinct form of society, whose results are still important in the development of American character.

BROTHERS OF PURITY.*

THE primary aim of Professor Dowson in presenting us with a new translation of the quaint little book called Brothers of Purity is to supply a want in the ordinary educational course under his control. The Ikhwánu-s Safá is a standard Hindustáni work, which is used as a text-book by students both in India and in England. Its contents, however, are so characteristic of the proverbial wit and wisdom of the East, and reflect incidentally so much light upon the traditions, the modes of belief, and the manners of the Hindu race, as to awaken a degree of interest altogether beyond that which might attach to a mere manual of an Oriental dialect. The Hindustáni text from which the present English version was immediately drawn is not the original dress in which this curious compilation appeared, nor is Hindostan the land of its birth. From the preface of Ikrám 'Ali, the Hindu translator, we learn that the authors of the Ikhwánu-s Safá were Abú Salmán, Abú-l Hasan, Abú Ahmad, and others—ten men who dwelt in communion at Basra, and spent all their days in the investigation of scientific and religious matters. They wrote fifty-one works, chiefly upon the occult sciences. Amongst these was the present work, a moral treatise setting forth the fundamental truths or dogmas of ethics by way of dialogue or contention between men and beasts. The conclusion of the whole is to show from this contention the superiority and perfection of man. After much discussion of a varied and highly ingenious kind, the men get the best of the argument, which tends to show that "those points in which men prevail over the animals are those of the scientific or theological dogmas treated of by the writers in their fifty-one works." Thus their practical aim was that "heedless people by seeing this might have a desire to attain to those perfections." The original labours of these Arab sages have been noticed at some length by Professors Flugel and Dieterici in the Zeitschrift des Deutschen morgenlandische Gesellschaft. They form a kind of encyclopædia of the half-scientific, half-mystic lore of the East. It was upon the recommendation of Colonel John William Taylor, one of the most distinguished scholars of his time, Professor of Hindu at the Government College, Calcutta, that the translation of the Ikhwánu-s Safá into the Urdú language was entrusted, in the year 1810, to Ikrám 'Ali, then recently appointed to a subordinate post under Mr. Abraham Lockett of the Company's Civil Service. It was intended as a help to students of that dialect, and underwent sundry modifications with a view to its adaptation for that purpose. No abstruse words, the translator tells us, were to appear. Where the scientific phrases and speeches of the original text were peculiarly difficult, the pen was to be run through such passages, and only the pith of the matter was to be reproduced. The translation has been generally pronounced very pure and elegant, though a large proportion of Arabic words has been retained. The nature of the subject, as Professor Dowson pleads in extenuation, rendered the introduction of many Arabic terms of science a matter of necessity. Still foreign words, a common fault in translations of this kind, are often employed when pure vernacular words would equally have served the turn. The original Arabic work has been translated into German by Professor Dieterici of Berlin. When the project of an English version occurred to Professor Dowson, he was not aware that any such previous translation existed. There were, however, he subsequently found, three different versions in existence. One attributed to Mr. James Atkinson, the translator of parts of the Sháh-náma, was published in an Indian newspaper, and reprinted in the Asiatic Journal for 1829 (Vol. xxviii.). This version is described as spirited and accurate, but imperfect, and to all practical purpose buried. Another, published at Calcutta by Mr. T. P. Manuel in 1860, gives a fair idea of the work, but is hardly close enough to fulfil the purpose of the work now before us. A third version, by a Mahommedan gentleman, is spoken of, but has not been seen by the present translator. Professor Dowson has followed the excellent edition of the Hindustáni text published by Drs. Forbes and Rieu, as well as their arrangement of chapters and paragraphs. It has been his object to adhere as closely as possible to the original text, while rendering the English smooth and intelligible to the reader, and in this design he has been throughout successful.

In speaking of "science," it must be understood that the sages of the East put forth an unfounded claim. There never was any such thing as Arabian science in the proper sense. Such scientific knowledge of nature as the Arabs possessed was but a poor travesty of Greek science, dressed up in the half-poetic, half-mystic disguise which seems congenial to the Oriental mind. The sages of Arabia and Persia only had their day till the discovery of the Greek originals superseded their borrowed paraphrases. Of the true masters of physical science none certainly can be named of genuine Semitic blood, though, as with the Aryans, there may have been among that race the gift of mathematical or purely abstract speculation. Through the middle ages, and until the revival of Greek literature, we had, as Renan has remarked, Spaniards or Persians writing in Arabic, and nothing more. They were like the Jewish writers of the same period—interpreters and paraphrasts merely. One page of Roger Bacon contained more true philosophy than all this second-hand rubbish. It was in moral science that the Semitic genius really showed itself. The Mosaic code, and even the Koran, though cast in a different mould from the broad and philosophical results of Greek speculation, embodied pure and lofty principles of ethical and political right. Later Semitic writings, affecting more of the scientific or theoretical temper of foreign schools of thought, could but wear stiffly and uncomfortably the garb and the shackles of a genius alien to itself. In the little work now before us it is curious to see the original impulses of native thought struggling with the influences of European culture, as well as with those of rival Oriental blood and speech. There is a cumbrous graft from Greek (possibly also from Latin) cosmical and natural science upon the stock of genuine Semitic mythology. Notions of animal life, its origin and destiny, which might have come from Aristotle or even from Lucretius, pictures of the primitive life of men, of their savagery and early struggle with the brutes, drawn probably from the Greek materialists, which seem to anticipate the dawn of the hardest school of modern anthropology, blend after a heterogeneous fashion with the cosmology of Genesis and the orthodox history of the Fall. In its structure the work seems referable far more to an Iranian or Indo-Persian than to a strictly Semitic range of ideas. The parts assigned to the animals, and the easy way in which the barriers of speech and reasoning are broken down in their intercourse and rivalry with men, are like what we are accustomed to meet in the fables of the somewhat shadowy Lukman, or the still more mythical Pilpay, or in the imperfectly naturalized counterparts of Æsop or Babrius. The mixture of alien creeds and schemes of philosophy brings in a frightful jumble of dates and orders of historical succession.

The first men, we are told, were few in number, naked and defenceless. They used to run away and hide themselves in covers, through fear of the wild beasts. Afterwards taking heart, they armed and fortified themselves, and succeeded in making some of the animals their slaves, and carried on a fierce and unrelenting war against the rest. This went on till God Almighty sent Muhammad, the last of the prophets, under whom sinners were brought to righteousness, and even many Jins obtained the blessing of pardon and the faith of Islam. An age after this, Bíwarásb, the "Brave king" and sage, became monarch of the Jins. "He was so just that in his reign the tiger and the goat used to drink water at one ghât. What possibility could there then be of any thag, thief, swindler, or rogue getting to dwell in his dominions?" The island called Balásághún, situated near the Equator, was the royal residence of this just king. To his Hall of Justice, accordingly, the chief of all the animals betook themselves to tell in detail before King Bíwarásb the tale of their sufferings at the hands of men. Immediately the King issued a command, saying, "Good! let messengers be sent quickly, and let them bring the men into my presence." Thereupon seventy men of different cities and races, wise and eloquent exceedingly, appeared before the King. One among them of the race of Hazrat 'Abbás was first heard in reply to the animals' complaint. Beginning with the creation of Adam "from a single drop of water, and his being made ruler over all the land and sea, with all things therein," the orator quotes texts from the Koran:—"All animals have been created for you; take your advantage from them, eat them, and make warm clothing from their skins and hair." "On the dry land and on the sea ride upon camels and in ships." "Horses, mules, and asses were created that you might ride upon them," and again, "Ride upon their backs, and remember the bounties of God." It is also to be understood "from the Bible and Testament," that animals were made for our sakes. "In every way we are their masters, they are our slaves." To this the mule, on behalf of the animals, pleads that God Almighty made all things in the earth and in the sky subject one to another, so that they might all together derive benefit and keep off evil from each other; and that it is only fraud or calumny to contend that either is master or slave to the other. The wise King hereupon empanels a kind of jury or court of the judges and lawyers, with "all the grandees and nobles of the Jins," before whom one of the men sets forth the perfection (literally "purity") with which God Almighty has formed the persons of men and made every member thereof in exact conformity to what was needed. Man's graceful form, his stature, his sense and wisdom, by means of which he can distinguish between good and evil, and by which even he can learn and declare the facts of the skies—all prove him to be the master of those who have none of these excellent gifts. The animals in turn gnash their teeth, weep, and implore the King to deliver them from the tyranny of their oppressors. Even the doctors and sages of the Jins add their testimony against the violence and injustice of the men. The Jins have had to flee from the face of men into woods and wilds, and have hidden themselves in hills, mountains, and rivers. Through the evil conduct of men, the Jins have entirely given up visiting inhabited places. So malignant and suspicious are mankind, that if any child, woman, or man is stupid, foolish, or sick, they say directly that the evil eye or the shadow of a Jin has fallen on him. But who has ever seen a Jin kill a man or wound him, rob him of his clothes or commit a theft, break into any one's house, pick pockets, tear sleeves, break open the lock of any man's shop, slay a traveller, rebel against a king, plunder any one, or make any one captive? On the second day there are assembled "judges of the race of Jupiter, lawyers of the race of Venus, wise men of the children of Bírán, sages of the race of Lukmán, experienced persons of the children of Hámán, intelligent persons of the children of Kaiwán, and persons of common sense of the children of Bahrám." The sage of Venus is for taking a legal opinion upon the case, and if it goes against the animals, would have them bought from the men and set free. "But who is to pay the price?" asks the Sáhib-i-'azimat, the practical man. "The King," replies the lawyer. But it is felt that there is not wealth enough in the King's treasury, and, moreover, some of the men may refuse to sell. The Sáhib-i-'azimat's own advice then is, that the King should bid all the animals run away together in the night, to which His Majesty himself inclines. But a wise man of the descendants of Lukmán thinks this very much opposed to sense. How is it possible when so many of the animals are locked up all night? Then, rejoins the Sahib, "let the Jins go this night and open the doors of the prison-houses, and untie the heel ropes of the animals, and bind the guards till all have got safely away." This highly practical remedy pleases everybody till a certain Kaiwáni sage declares that it is all bosh. It is not possible, and if it were it would only bring the enmity of man twofold upon the Jins. This leads the sage into a queer dissertation upon the origin of the Jins, and the causes of men's hatred towards them. In the end it is decided to send six messengers to summon representatives respectively from the wild beasts, the birds, the birds of prey, the insects, such as the earthworm, the scarlet fly, &c., the reptiles, such as maggots, ants, snakes, scorpions, and finally aquatic animals, among whom who should turn up but our old friend the "sea-serpent" (Tinnin), in form and bulk as palpable as if drawn by Olaus Magnus himself? Each sets forward his peculiar gifts and perfections. The lion, the leopard, the horse, the crocodile, the rat, the bulbul, the owl, the bee, and the parrot are heard in turns, upon the points of strength or beauty or instinct in which they respectively surpass mankind. But the tables are artfully turned upon them by the Greek doctors, learned súfís, and holy theologians. What clenches the argument on the human side is the higher destiny of man, at least of the true believer. All tribes of the beasts will surely perish at death. "But we shall all dwell in paradise in the society of the nymphs and youths." Nothing more need be said on the side of the "Brothers of Purity." The King sees nothing for the animals but patience and submission to their lot. "Let all animals be submissive and obedient to man, and let none depart from their allegiance." With the animals being satisfied and returning in peace to their homes, there is an end to this singular little work. There is much in its quaint and characteristic humour to reward the attention even of those who take it up with no kind of desire to make a closer acquaintance with the Arabic or the Hindustáni original.

MR. SCOTT RUSSELL ON TECHNICAL EDUCATION.*

IN this volume Mr. Scott Russell re-opens the question of a general national system of technical education for Great Britain and Ireland, which was carefully considered last year by a Select Committee of the House of Commons. It may be remembered that in March, 1868, a Committee of nineteen members was appointed to inquire into the provisions existing in this country for giving scientific technical education to persons requiring it. All the great agricultural, shipping, and manufacturing interests of England, and some of those of Scotland and Ireland, were represented on this Committee. Among its nineteen members there were at least three of the most advanced educational reformers in the House, and at least two of the special champions of the interests and aspirations of the working-classes; and there was a clear majority of Liberal votes. The Report of this Committee was presented to the House in July, 1868, and was noticed at the time in our columns. It stated, as the result of the examination of many competent witnesses and of much careful deliberation, that the present pressure of foreign competition is not mainly due to the superior opportunities of acquiring technical knowledge afforded to their populations by foreign Governments, but to much wider and more potent economical agencies, such as the lower rate of wages abroad and the absence of trade disputes; that though there is in Great Britain, and particularly in the agricultural districts, a deficiency of the means of scientific technical instruction, and though it is requisite that the means of such instruction be multiplied in the different centres of industry, and that the public expenditure upon such instruction be somewhat increased in aid of local efforts, it is not desirable to imitate the centralized organizations of technical education which are to be found in some foreign States; and that it is useless to undertake measures for the spread of scientific technical instruction so long as the condition of our general elementary and secondary education remains as bad as it now is; since, for want of effective primary education, our workmen and foremen are not in a condition to profit by any opportunities of scientific instruction which might be offered to them, and for want of effective secondary education our small manufacturers, proprietors, and managers of works are similarly incapable of making good use of the means of scientific instruction which exist or might be originated for their benefit. Consequently, before all other educational reforms, it is necessary for us to elaborate a national system of good general primary and secondary education.

These conclusions—which were stated with brevity, but with systematic and masterly care, in the Report of the Select Committee—are attacked by Mr. Scott Russell in a volume of twenty-five chapters, extending over four hundred and thirty pages. This volume, though it contains much interesting matter and many valuable tabular statements, is on the whole so badly arranged, and shows such a want of continuity of plan, that it will be best, in considering its contents, to follow the order suggested by the Report of the Committee. It is absolutely impossible, without adopting some more precise and continuous train of thought than any which can be found in his book, to criticize Mr. Scott's Russell's chaotic disquisition.

The following statement, which the Minutes of the Committee show to have been written almost verbatim by its Chairman, Mr. Samuelson, to whom Mr. Scott Russell appeals as one of the highest authorities in Great Britain on the question of technical instruction, gives the conclusions of the Committee on the relation of technical education to industrial progress:—

> The industrial system of the present age is based on the substitution of mechanical for animal power; its development is due in this country to its stores of coal and of metallic ores, to our geographical position and temperate climate, and to the unrivalled energy of our population. The acquisition of scientific knowledge has been shown by the witnesses to be only one of the elements of an industrial education and of industrial progress. Indeed, there is a preponderance of evidence to show that so far as the workmen, as distinguished from the managers, are concerned, it can be considered an essential element only in certain trades, or generally as enlarging the area from which the foremen and managers may be drawn. In all cases another and an indispensable element of industrial success is the acquisition of practical experience and manipulative skill. The evidence given before your Committee places beyond all doubt the fact, that these latter acquirements are possessed in a pre-eminent degree by our manufacturing population of every grade, according to their several necessities. They are obtained in our factories, our forges, our workshops, our shipyards, and our mines, which, in their organization and appliances, are the models which, with a few special exceptions, other nations have hitherto imitated and followed, but not surpassed. Although the pressure of foreign competition, where it exists, is considered by some witnesses to be partly owing to the superior scientific attainments of foreign manufacturers, yet the general result of the evidence proves that it is to be attributed mainly to their artistic taste, to fashion, to lower wages, to the absence of trade disputes abroad, and to the greater readiness with which handicraftsmen abroad in some trades adapt themselves to new requirements.

These conclusions are challenged and contradicted by Mr. Scott Russell. He asserts that "the pressing peril of this nation in regard to manufacturing pre-eminence is due to the culpability of the educated classes and of the executive Government in not having organized, as the Governments of other countries have done, complete education in all trade crafts." The arguments on which he bases this assertion are to be found scattered about in his third, fourth, seventeenth, nineteenth, and twenty-third chapters, and they appear, so far as we have been able to collect them, to amount to this. First, à priori, it is axiomatic that, subject to the indispensable preliminaries of general elementary and secondary education, "the value of a nation's work will vary with the excellence of the national system of technical education." No one will dispute the truth of this axiom, but most Englishmen who are not technical fanatics will dispute Mr. Scott Russell's application of it. They will agree with him, that work varies with the technical skill of the workman; but they will deny that, except in a few artistic branches, the present pressure of foreign competition is due to the superior skill of foreign workmen, and they will also deny that the only, or for this country the best, national method of producing technical skill in workmen is by organizing Government instruction in all trade crafts. A complete answer to Mr. Scott Russell's application of his axiom is to be found in the words quoted above from the Report of the Select Committee, and the answer could not be better put than Mr. Samuelson has there put it. But, secondly, Mr. Scott Russell argues à posteriori, that his own experience of foreigners, the results of Government inquiries, the evidence of what has been done by such States as Wurtemberg and Zurich, and the International Exhibitions of 1857, 1862, and 1867, prove that the peril of this nation in regard to manufacturing pre-eminence is due to the lack of Government instruction in trade crafts. Here, again, it is not so much Mr. Scott Russell's premisses that are questionable, as the conclusions which he thinks fit to draw from them. Granted that the workmen in some foreign countries are more polite, more intelligent, more civilized than English workmen, does it follow that this is due to systematic technical instruction? Was the efficiency of the foreign waiter and street-porter, whose thoughtful attentions Mr. Scott Russell regards with so much gusto, caused by their having gone through a course of technical lectures on the practical arts of waiting and street-portership? Mr. Scott Russell presents us with some interesting and amusing scenes and anecdotes; but they do not always illustrate, and they seldom prove, as he seems to think they do, the conclusions at which he aims. Tabular descriptions of the technical institutions of Germany and Switzerland, and authentic statements of the rapid advances in manufacturing skill which foreign nations have recently made, are useful to us; and, if we are wise, we shall learn much from them. But they no more prove that we shall retain our old monopoly of trade and our old manufacturing pre-eminence if we imitate foreign organization of technical instruction, than Mr. Scott Russell's description of the orderly rustic demonstration at which he once assisted proves that, if we cover the country with technical colleges, we shall never hereafter have any but rose-water revolutions.

Even if Mr. Scott Russell's arguments were unanswerable, and we were convinced by them that the future prosperity of England depends on specially educating every man for the trade which he is to follow, we might demur to the details of the scheme of systematic technical Universities, colleges, and schools which he considers necessary for our industrial and commercial regeneration. In chapter 12 (which, by the way, is little more than a repetition of parts of chapters 1 and 9), in chapters 13 to 16, and also in chapter 8, he develops his conception of an English technical University which shall do for all employments current in England that which he says the existing English Universities do for the professions of the divine, the doctor, and the lawyer—namely, provide at the public expense special instruction in the best way of discharging the functions of the particular business which each man intends to follow. He has displayed considerable ingenuity in trying to enumerate and classify all the different ways whereby Englishmen nowadays get their living, and for every one of these ways he would have special instruction provided in a regular hierarchy of institutions, beginning with a central Technical University, and reaching, through fifteen local Technical Colleges, down to the thousand local Technical Schools which are to come just above the ordinary elementary schools of the country. At the Technical University, he says, "there must be professorships of the best way of dealing with matter under the particular conditions of the destiny in life of each pupil"; and he then proceeds, with all the gravity of a real believer in the virtue of his own nostrum, to enumerate every profession and occupation that he can think of. He apparently intends this list to be exhaustive; otherwise he would not have reckoned among the employments for which technical professional instruction is required, that of "men of leisure who may not propose to become members of professions, but who hope to apply their knowledge to the advancement of human society." A list of occupations in which that of a Human-Society-Advancer is included surely ought not to have left out those of an author, a journalist, and a landowner. On Mr. Scott Russell's own hypothesis, if, before he wrote this book, he had had the advantage of attending, at a central Technical University, the lectures of the Head Professor of Bookmaking, he would have produced a book free from any blemishes of style or construction, as delightful to review as it would have been easy to write. Mr. Scott Russell is not at all appalled at the number of trades and professions which his wide experience has conjured up, with their millions of incumbents all clamouring for special technical instruction. On paper he is as ingenious as he is bold. By a masterly classification he reduces to the modest number of 101 the number of different Faculties which will be required in the Technical University to teach the specialities of every occupation under the sun. This certainly seems very reasonable. Only 101 professors to teach the best practical way of doing everything! We almost fear that in these details Mr. Scott Russell may have somewhat sacrificed efficiency to thrift. In like manner, he only demands twenty-five professors for each of the fifteen Technical Colleges which are to be situated in the fifteen chief industrial centres of England, and are to give technical instruction to youths between fifteen and eighteen years old; and in the same spirit of economy he announces that from twelve to eighteen teachers will suffice in each of the Technical Schools, of which one is to be placed in every town of 20,000 inhabitants, to instruct boys from twelve to fifteen years old. What sort of work lies before these professors may be gathered from Mr. Scott Russell's description of the technical instruction which would be given in one of the local Technical Colleges to a youth intending to be a merchant. It must be remembered that the time of the pupils' attendance at one of these Colleges is only between the ages of fifteen and eighteen:—

> The enterprising merchant is a man who occupies himself in any part of the civilized world, either in discovering new wants which the home manufacturer can supply, or new substances to supply home manufacture. His knowledge, therefore, of the wants of the one, and of the nature of the other, ought to be extensive and exact. In this way the education of the merchant might advantageously partake of that of the manufacturer. But it is also necessary that the merchant should possess extensive exclusive knowledge; it is his business to deal with all nations, and therefore an acquaintance with their character, language, laws, customs, climates, productions, weights, measures, and monies is essential. To a great extent also, the British merchant has been and may still continue a shipowner; he ought in this case to be a judge of shipping, and should know the laws, usages, practices of seafaring folk. The laws of political economy, currency, exchange, banking and insurance are mixed up with the merchant's everyday business, and the more thoroughly he is acquainted with them the better he will be able to select the wiser course in the conduct of his world-wide affairs.

If science were the forte of a young merchant technically instructed on this plan, there can be little doubt what would be his foible. He would, we fear, be a Margites among merchants. The scope of the instruction to be given at the Technical University and the inferior Technical Schools is of course proportionately magnificent; and for all this superb system Mr. Scott Russell's financial estimate is very modest. If each locality will provide an adequate park, will erect a suitable edifice in the park, and will maintain that edifice, with its playground and gardens, in good order and condition, comfortably furnished, and well warmed and lighted, he estimates that in England (excluding Scotland and Ireland) everybody may be taught everything for the modest sum of one million per annum out of the Imperial taxes.

Mr. Scott Russell is of opinion that all education should be more or less technical; and he is at little pains to conceal his contempt for any education which is not specially intended to prepare a man for his profession. If he speaks with respect of Oxford and Cambridge it is because they "may be considered" technical schools for the divine, the doctor, and the lawyer. How often we miss the real virtues of things until they are pointed out to us by the keen eye of the critic! To many Oxford clergymen it is probably quite a new notion that what Oxford did for them was to prepare them for parish work; and there are perhaps not a few physicians and barristers who fancy that they were technically instructed for their professions in the great hospitals, or by special pleaders, and that Balliol or Trinity gave them only a general culture. But "any port in a storm." We shall be thankful if Oxford and Cambridge are spared by the technical fanatics, though it be under the false pretext of their being "technical for the divine, the doctor, and the lawyer." With such views, however, Mr. Scott Russell is saved the trouble of disputing the proposition of the Select Committee that it is useless to give technical instruction until we have reformed and organized our general system of education. To make education technical, and to teach everything technically, that is the reform of our national education for which he sighs. We say everything, for Mr. Scott Russell's views of what subjects can be technically and profitably taught to his students are bounded merely by the limits of an exhaustive tabular enumeration of all the sciences and all the philosophies. If any one wishes to have his respect for technical education raised, and his own vocabulary of things knowable increased, we commend him to the table in p. 257, which gives a summary of "human knowledge" as it is to be taught in the Technical University. No Athenian Sophist could ever have better demonstrated the easiness of omniscience. "A little knowledge," Mr. Scott Russell reminds us, "is a dangerous thing." And he argues from that excellent maxim, that narrowness of study is the great thing to be avoided in any system of education. We must remind him that there is another and an equally valuable application of the proverb. Many-sided superficiality is probably at least as dangerous as deep-searching narrowness. And if Mr. Scott Russell had not had his attention so exclusively fixed on that aspect of the proverb which favours the display of his theories, he might perhaps have escaped the pitfalls into which he tumbles when he ventures within the regions of Latin and Greek. It would not then have been necessary to remind him that "bi-annually" is neither good Latin nor recognised English; and we should not have had to ask him for an explanation of the following extraordinary vagary which appears in page 404:—

> There would be written over every skilled workshop the ancient Greek inscription:—
>
> Οὐδεὶς ἀ γεωμέτρητος εἰσίτω;
> No man ignorant of geometry enters here.

Mr. Scott Russell has, as he tells us, "had the triple advantage of University education in the humanities, a course of mathematical and theoretical education, and a thorough workshop training." In which part of this triple course did he miss the advantage of realizing the force of the old proverb, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam"? which, as he is no more felicitous in his translations than in his quotations of the dead languages, we will render for him into a good technical equivalent. "Don't try to be jack of all trades, or you'll be master of none!"

BLANC'S GRAMMAR OF ART.*

M. CHARLES BLANC, finding that the world in general is in a state of profound ignorance about the fine arts, has kindly resolved to teach it the rudiments of criticism. Paris, he says, fancies itself a second Athens, and yet its millionaires buy all sorts of monstrosities, and allow the works of the august sovereigns of art to pass into other countries. "So that France in the nineteenth century presents the incredible anomaly of an intelligent nation which professes to worship the fine arts, and which neither knows their principles, nor their language, nor their history, nor their true dignity, nor their veritable grace." And then he goes on to tell an anecdote about a dinner at which he met a number of eminent persons all of whom talked about art with that wildly anarchical diversity and that perfect ignorance which are usual in conversations on that subject. Every one claimed the right to extol what pleased his private fancy, on the ground that there is no disputing about tastes. Charles Blanc resisted this adage as a heresy even in gastronomy itself, and declared that the classic gastronomer, Brillat Savarin, would have revolted against it. However, the eminent guests went on gracefully enunciating absurdities, and the conversation might have ended, as such conversations do usually end, without benefit to anybody present, if a few gentlemen, more modest or more intelligent than the rest, had not inquired whether there existed a book which, without requiring too much time or labour from the reader, would give him elementary notions on the subject of art. M. Charles Blanc found on reflection that he could not recommend any such work, that in fact no such work existed in the French language, and thus the idea of this Grammaire des Arts du Dessin suggested itself to his mind.

M. Blanc observes that the education of the French public in art-matters is "complètement nulle"—that young men finish their classical studies without having the most elementary information about the arts of Greece and Rome:—

> Tel lauréat brillant et superbe achève ses études classiques sans avoir la moindre teinture des arts. Il connaît les affaires des anciens Grecs, leurs capitaines, leurs orateurs et leurs philosophes, leurs querelles intestines et leurs grandes guerres médiques; mais il ne connait ni leurs idées sublimes sur la peinture et la statuaire, ni leurs adorables dieux de marbre, ni leurs temples divins.

This is true; and it is as true of England as of France. The condition of the educated classes in Europe generally, with reference to the fine arts, is a condition of simple ignorance; and the ignorance, unfortunately, is of that kind which does not know that it is ignorant. This is due, we believe, to a very natural illusion. The fine arts do not appear to require any study whatever for their appreciation; they have an illusory legibility, and every one secretly believes that he requires no education in order to derive from them such benefit as they may be able to afford. And then this benefit seems vague and uncertain. When the artistic instincts are strong, men are drawn irresistibly towards the fine arts; but when these instincts are weak, or do not exist, it is difficult to persuade men that there can be anything in works of art to reward the devotion of their time. Greek literature is admitted to be a serious study because it is supposed to convey information; but Greek sculpture, it is believed, conveys no information, and is therefore useless. In fact, there exists all over Europe, with reference to the fine arts, a Philistinism difficult to penetrate and enlighten, a far stronger Philistinism than that which sometimes offers a feeble resistance to culture in literature. M. Charles Blanc says that in the knowledge of art the French nation is one of the most behindhand in Europe, whereas in England books which treat of the fine arts are read by every educated person. We fear that M. Blanc has here had recourse to an artifice very common in French newspapers and legislative assemblies—that of somewhat heightening the brilliance of English cultivation in order to throw a shadow on that of France; just as mothers tell their little girls how wonderfully good are those other little girls, their neighbours, without perhaps quite believing it themselves. We happen to be rather minutely acquainted with the sale of books upon art in England, and will only say that when they reach a thousand copies it is a great success. There is not a single writer on art in England, except Mr. Ruskin, who can consider himself quite sure beforehand that his books will pay. No English publisher will reprint review articles upon art; the thing has been tried once or twice, and the results have not been encouraging. In France, on the other hand, art publications of various kinds succeed better. Writers of note reprint their articles in volumes, which have a circulation of three or four thousand copies. There are periodical reviews in France devoted to art which succeed, and live, whereas our Fine Arts Quarterly, though liberally and intelligently conducted, was commercially a failure. We have not in all London such a publishing house as that of Madame Renouard, in the Rue de Tournon, where you may buy a little library upon art. And beyond this we venture to say that, although the French people are ignorant of art in the sense of having little acquired knowledge on the subject, we have generally found them open to artistic ideas, which cannot be said of our own countrymen. On the other hand, it may be said in our favour that we buy pictures more liberally; but there is a curious distinction between this kind of encouragement of art and the study of it. People go to Exhibitions to be amused, and they buy pictures in order to have the same kind of amusement in their homes, or to furnish their walls well; but this does not imply that they study art at all. Just in the same way they have coats-of-arms painted on their carriages, and crests engraved upon their plate, without taking the slightest interest in heraldry, and without even troubling themselves to learn the difference between impalement and quartering. M. Charles Blanc is old enough to have outlived the illusions of youth, and yet the publication of such a book as this proves either that the French are more studious of art than we are, or else that he is indulging illusory hopes of their teachableness. His book is a very valuable one, and does thoroughly all that it professes to do, but we doubt whether any English publisher would venture upon it.

It is odd that, when M. Charles Blanc speaks of writers on art who are generally read in England, he mentions Burke, Hume, Reid, Price, Alison, Hogarth, and Reynolds, and does not mention the writer who has been more read than all these men put together. Is it possible that Mr. Ruskin's name was passed over in simple ignorance? We believe that it is not possible, but that M. Blanc does not recognise Mr. Ruskin, and intentionally ignores him. Orthodoxy does not recognise heterodoxy, and always affects to believe that it exists, if it is to be admitted that it exists at all, in such obscurity that there is really no occasion to take note of it. Now the fact is that, whatever may be Mr. Ruskin's failings, and in spite of the prevailing fashion of speaking contemptuously concerning him, he exercised a few years ago an influence so very powerful that even if it had wholly ceased it would yet remain of greater importance in the history of art than that of Burke, Hume, Reid, Price, &c. What we most object to in M. Blanc, and in the advocates of the classical doctrine generally, is their exclusiveness; we have no objection to practical classicism in art when it is genuine, but the doctrines of the school, as stated and enunciated by the writers who have advocated it, have been too narrow to be truly philosophical. The bigotry which excludes Mr. Ruskin from a list of influential writers on art is simply ridiculous; it is like the prejudice of the Chinese mandarin who ignores the civilization of barbarians, or of the orthodox Wahabee in the heart of Arabia who either is, or affects to be, ignorant of the Empires of the West.

In truth M. Charles Blanc, though really eminent as a connoisseur, is not a great critic, and is not likely to have much sympathy with great critics. We have read everything of his that has come in our way during the last fourteen years, but cannot remember a single original idea of sufficient consequence to make itself remembered, or strong enough to beget other ideas in the general mind of humanity. He is industrious and accomplished, he possesses an immense range of acquired knowledge about art, he is deservedly respected in Paris, and everywhere else where his labours in the field of art are known, and it may be doubted whether we have a single writer or connoisseur in this country comparable to him in traditional attainment. But with all this he occupies in art rather the position of a professor who hands down old knowledge and perpetuates old prejudices than that of a true critic. He has not the critical spirit, his mind naturally submits itself to authority, and loyally defends all long-established reputations; and submission to the authority of famous names is not a virtue in the critic, any more than it is in the man of science. A critic ought to be neither a worshipper nor an iconoclast.

In saying this about M. Blanc we have no desire to lower his position; we merely attempt to define it. A man may be a good practical bishop without the critical spirit; and in the fine arts, as in religion, there is need of men who make it their business to repeat intelligently and intelligibly truths long since ascertained, even though there may be some risk of perpetuating errors along with them. A book like this Grammaire des Arts du Dessin conveys hardly any new information, suggests hardly any new thought, but it puts old knowledge and old thought into a form more compact and accessible, and, considering the general ignorance of art amongst educated people, all this will be a novelty to many, and ought to be a boon to them. The book is admirably clear, though necessarily didactic; it avoids with great tact and judgment every approach to unpleasant dogmatism or tediousness. The tone throughout is that of a man of high culture, conveying truths which he believes to be valuable, but does not pretend to have discovered. There is, indeed, a certain advantage in feeling oneself quite free from the necessity of combating received ideas. A man who writes what nobody is likely to contradict is delivered from the irritations of antagonism, and easily preserves that dignity of manner and that suavity of tone which are so often imperilled by the earnestness and eagerness of the neologist.

The Grammar of the Arts of Design is the development, in more than seven hundred copious pages, with many illustrations, of a set of propositions which form the headings of its chapters. First, we have eight chapters on the great principles of art, and then come three books—the first on architecture, with a supplement on gardens; the second, on sculpture, with a supplement on gem and medal engraving; the third, on painting, with a supplement on line-engraving, etching, mezzotint, aquatint, woodcutting, and lithography. The headings of chapters form in themselves, when read consecutively, a complete essay upon art, marked of course by an extreme brevity, and yet not so laconic as Goethe's Essay on Dilettantism, which was probably written in the same way with the intention of subsequent development:—

> Architecture is the art of constructing according to the principles of the beautiful. Beauty in architecture answers to an idea of duty. Two other indispensable qualities are bound up with the beauty of architecture—namely, suitableness and strength. To these three terms, suitableness, strength, and beauty, correspond three operations of the architect, the plan, the section, and the elevation. Sublimity in architecture belongs to three essential conditions—size, simplicity of surface, straightness and continuity of line. The sacrifice of one of the three dimensions is an element of grandeur in architecture. Different sentiments are attached to grandeur in the different dimensions of architecture. Different races, according to their genius, have marked in architecture their preference for one or the other of the three dimensions.

These may be taken as specimens of M. Charles Blanc's propositions. Let us see how he develops one of them; for example, the proposition that the sacrifice of one of the three dimensions is an element of grandeur in architecture:—

> Tous ceux qui ont visité cette basilique fameuse par ses dimensions, Saint-Pierre de Rome, se rappellent le désappointement qu'ils ont éprouvé en y entrant pour la première fois. Ce qu'ils s'attendaient à trouver immense, ils ont trouvé presqu' ordinaire, et l'architecture les frappant au rebours des intentions de l'architecte, ils ont été surpris de n'être pas étonnés. Les Romains, il est vrai, assurent à chaque voyageur que l'émotion viendra plus tard et mesure petit > averti par un commencement de lassitude que le monument est colossal; si l'on compare le prêtre à l'autel où il officie, on finit par se convaincre que les piliers sont prodigieusement énormes et hauts, que la coupole est une œuvre gigantesque; mais ce n'est qu'après bien des calculs, des comparaisons, des rapprochements, que le visiteur en vient à saisir par la pensée l'incroyable grandeur de Saint-Pierre, car tout semble conspirer d'abord à déjouer son admiration, et même lorsque ce visiteur désenchanté essaye, le lendemain, de retrouver l'enthousiasme qu'il s'était promis de ressentir, il retombe sous l'empire des mêmes causes, et la déception du regard résiste à la certitude de l'esprit. Où est le secret d'une erreur aussi décevante? Il est surtout dans la parfaite concordance des trois dimensions. La hauteur étant très-haute, la largeur très-large et la profondeur très-profonde, ces trois grandeurs se rachètent l'une l'autre et se neutralisent. Si la nef, par exemple, était beaucoup plus étroite, aussitôt l'élévation paraîtrait démesurée et la profondeur étonnante. Sacrifier une dimension pour agrandir les deux autres était ici un artifice infaillible, et, chose admirable! ce mensonge eût servi au triomphe de la vérité, puisqu'il aurait favorisé l'impression vraie, celle d'une incommensurable grandeur.
> Combien différentes les illusions qu'avaient su produire nos architectes du moyen âge! Guidés par le sentiment religieux, ils avaient sacrifié les largeurs aux élancements de l'ogive et aux profondeurs du sanctuaire; ils avaient donné à leurs dimensions des apparences merveilleuses et grandi outre mesure des cathédrales qui, dans Saint-Pierre de Rome, ne seraient guère que des chapelles. C'est ainsi qu'avec moins de matière ils émurent plus fortement l'esprit. Ils trompèrent nos yeux dans l'intérêt de notre âme.

The illustrations on wood are given liberally when necessary to the elucidation of the author's ideas, and have been chosen purely with regard to their utility in instructing the reader, not to make the volume pretty and attractive. The difference between the abstraction of antique animal sculpture and the realism of the modern is well illustrated by two figures, one of an antique lion, and the other of the well-known group by Barye—"Tiger devouring a Crocodile." So, again, the difference between a study and a picture is made clear to every intelligent reader by the engraving from a Virgin and Child by Raffaelle, and one from the study from nature by which Raffaelle prepared himself for his task. Again, there is a study by Filippino Lippi for a Saint Michael, from an exceedingly meagre and poor model, showing the need of the ideal. We have not space to enter into any minute discussion of the art doctrines advocated here, to do which adequately would require a volume as large as the one before us; but although M. Blanc is more strictly orthodox than we may claim to be upon art matters, we have no hesitation in very warmly recommending his book. It is full of information, it is most carefully and conscientiously written, it is perfectly clear and intelligible to any generally educated reader, and it fully accomplishes its design. If everybody knew as much about art as this book can teach him, the task of the art critic and the labours of the artist would be relieved to a great extent from the profound discouragement which is due to the feeling that so few are educated enough in art to understand them. We earnestly hope for the day when some copious and valuable text-book like this may be used in the ordinary training of gentlemen.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

It hardly falls within the purpose and purview of an article like this to notice anything in the nature of an almanac or annual, however meritorious. The work which induces us to stretch our usual rule in order to include it is one of a somewhat unusual character, as well as of very exceptional value. The American Year-book * is unquestionably an almanac; it contains everything that is to be found in the most elaborate and in the least pretentious of the books which, under that name, are sold at every stationer's shop in England, and of which every town, and almost every bookseller of any importance, publishes an edition of his own. It unites the contents of an ordinary business calendar, of the less professional astronomical almanac, and of the most perfect political annuals. It is in the last capacity that it claims our notice, and in this character it can be compared with no work of our acquaintance so properly as with Mr. Martin's excellent Statesman's Year-book. Even to that it is in many respects superior; or rather its scope is wider, and its size so much greater that it has space for a much more ample collection of details than the smaller and handier manual can afford. But, besides this, it is a very complete almanac of the more ordinary kind. The business man will find in it every regulation of the law or of the administration that it concerns him to know, and will be enabled on most occasions to dispense with the use of a banking directory. The amateur astronomer will find the situations of the planets given in the manner most serviceable to him—designated, that is, not by their relation to points only to be ascertained by elaborate instruments and mathematical calculation, but by their places among the constellations with which every one who has given the least attention to the face of the heavens is familiar. The political student will find the Constitutions of every State in the Union, not set forth in full, so as to render the mastery of their provisions and their differences a work of dry and tedious labour, but briefly and practically explained. The professional man will find the name and general functions of every State and Federal Court, from Oregon to Florida, and from Maine to California, set forth in its proper place, with the names and residences of its judges and officers. The persons forming the Government of every State are named in order; the periods of their tenure of office, and the times of election, are given; the political, financial, and general statistics of each State are very carefully recorded; all that the Almanac de Gotha does for European monarchies and principalities, and all that Mr. Martin has done for the Governments of separate nations, is done by the American Year-book for the States composing the Union, and for the various Governments of North and South America, Europe, and Asia. The political history of the past year is also given; the finances of the United States are the subject of elaborate explanation and of complete statistical tables; in short, there is no public fact respecting the recent course of American politics that the reader may not learn from some page or other of this volume. A more complete and ample work of reference could hardly be desired, and we certainly do not know of any existing work equally comprehensive and convenient. A good deal of valuable statistical and general information regarding the recent fortunes of the South may be gathered from those parts of the volume which deal with the late Confederate States. It is sufficiently clear from these pages how great and general has been the ruin effected, less by the war than by the subjugation of the country, and its utter disorganization under the rule of adventurers at home and fanatics at Washington. Land, always cheap, has lost one-half of its value. Property of every kind is depreciated. Of the population there are no recent returns; but the state of the country, as shown by other facts, leaves little doubt that the numbers of the people have been reduced, and their industrial and productive power diminished in even greater proportion. For some reason or other, the cotton crops since 1860 are not generally stated—probably because they are very imperfectly known; but wherever a comparison is possible, the falling-off in every species of produce, and especially in the characteristic crops of the country, the chief source of its wealth, is terrible and surprising. Agricultural countries generally recover, for obvious reasons, easily and rapidly from the havoc of war. Economists make only one exception to this rule—where the population has been seriously diminished. The example of the South will introduce a new proviso into future treatises on this point. A country may recover quickly from the mere ravages of war, provided her people are neither killed nor starved, nor yet demoralized and disorganized. The white men of the South are broken-hearted: the negroes are thoroughly demoralized, and, even when they will work at all, are not to be relied on for that kind of steady and constant work which the peculiar agriculture of the South demands. Hence the exports of the country have fallen into comparative insignificance; the number of acres in cultivation is diminishing; the assessments show a general fall in the value of property; three dollars in paper is a fair price in 1869 for land which in 1859 fetched five or seven dollars in gold; and the whole tale of reports, statistics, and political observations is a tale of impoverishment, deterioration, ruin, and despair.

We have received the third and last volume of Lossing's History of the Civil War.* This work may no doubt be counted among those from which the future historian of the great Confederate struggle for independence will derive his materials; but it will certainly help him as little as any book of equal size and pretensions that we have seen. It is not merely bitter and unfair in its tone and biassed in its statement of facts; it repeats calumnies which have long since been abandoned in silence by every Republican who had any regard for his own character, and openly repudiated by all who had an honourable respect for truth and decency. The infamous proclamation by Mr. Stanton, imputing to the Confederate Government and its servants complicity in the murder of President Lincoln, is recorded, not only without a word of censure, but in language which implies that it was founded upon at least plausible evidence; while not a hint is given of the fact that the whole of the evidence was afterwards made public, and that the witnesses were convicted of the grossest perjury. In a similar manner the pitiful insinuation against Mr. Davis, that he was taken while attempting to escape in female clothing, is repeated, as if it had not long since been refuted and given up by every one except the persons who first circulated the falsehood. The story of Mr. Davis's last interview with General Johnstone is so perverted as to represent the conduct of both parties in a light exactly the opposite of the truth. The fact is that General Johnstone wished the President to secure his safety by taking command of the army, and capitulating as Commander-in-Chief, and that Mr. Davis refused, because he was trying to escape across the Mississippi and continue the war in Texas. It was for this purpose that he carried with him the remains of the Confederate funds; on which fact Mr. Lossing, without a tittle of evidence, founds a charge against him and his Ministers of intending to escape into Mexico with the treasures of the fallen Government. There is something unspeakably shameful in charges like these preferred against a man like Mr. Davis—notorious for an almost puritanical virtue both in public and in private life—after he has retired, with health ruined by the cruelty of his enemies, and heart-broken by the calamities of his country, into exile and obscurity.

A volume on American Fishing †, by one who is not only a practical angler, but has evidently given a good deal of attention to the habits and nature of fish, will have a good deal of interest for a large circle of English readers. Angling in America evidently differs in many respects from the sport as practised in this country. The fish most prized and most frequently caught in the more frequented waters are of a different kind. The bait and tackle used are peculiar, and the fashions of sportsmen are not quite the same as in England. But the observations of the writer on the structure, instincts, and senses of fish, and particularly on their powers of sight and hearing, are applicable as much to English as to American waters, and are by no means devoid of interest. He maintains that fishes can hear, which some authorities deny, but which an unlearned observer who has seen a shoal of minnows start from the shore as soon as a foot was placed on the pebbles some yards distant will be inclined to believe; though more scientific folks may tell him that it is the slight vibration of the ground, communicated to the water, which the creatures feel. He affirms that, like all creatures with convex eyes, and notably deer, fish are near-sighted, and distinguish motion more easily than form. To the latter, indeed, their eyes must be very insensible if they really mistake the artificial fly for the real one, as most readers will agree after looking at the drawings of both as they stand contrasted on our author's page.

*American Chess Nuts is a somewhat eccentric title for a collection of problems, arranged according to the number of moves required to give checkmate, which fills a large octavo volume, with six problems on each page. A skilful chessplayer condemned to a lonely sickbed or to solitary confinement might find in this volume occupation for many months. The ordinary reader will probably recoil before the mere number of the puzzles which confront him, page after page, and which it would take him a lifetime to solve.

Another volume†, of more general interest, instructs the reader who has a talent for sleight of hand in the performance of a great variety of tricks with cards. Most of these require considerable skill in manipulation. A large proportion, for instance, depend upon the performance in the first instance of the trick called "forcing a card"—a trick against which most choosers are on their guard, and which, therefore, only a very clever manipulator can successfully accomplish. Some, however, and these not the least entertaining, depend merely on arrangement and calculation; and one or two of these bring out a result so unexpected, that it seems absolutely startling at first, and the spectator, even when the process is explained, finds it scarcely more credible than before. Tricks of this kind merely require care and attention and ordinary intelligence; the greater number demand a special skill and dexterity, and no book can teach an average card-player to perform them successfully.

The Great Metropolis ‡ is a descriptive account of New York, its business, its pleasures, and its appearance, its railways and tramways, its theatres and churches, prisons and hospitals, its traffic by day and by night, by street-car and by steamer, written by a man with sufficient graphic power to produce a very readable article, but without sufficient versatility or tact to prevent the article, when prolonged, repeated, and expanded to the dimensions of a book, from becoming wearisome. The work also contains notices of many of the notabilities of "the Empire City," written with that Republican freedom and unreserve which seems so strange to English readers, who can see no reason why a considerable fortune, a romantic career, a successful stroke in business, or a reputation not acquired in a public capacity, should render a man the common property of every penny-a-liner in the community, should deprive him of copyright in his own daily life, and give the public a right of way through the most private recesses of his mercantile and domestic relations. At the same time, the author is one of the most moderate of offenders in this direction; and his castigation of more unpardonable sinners, and of the "Jenkinses" of the New York press and the newspaper accounts of fashionable weddings, may well atone for his small share in an almost universal practice.

Of the notorieties of the "great metropolis," § none is, in his sphere, better known than the Rev. H. W. Beecher, the occupant of "Plymouth Pulpit", from whence proceeds a volume of sermons much less marked by the peculiarities of the preacher—by political declamation, and by levities which, in their close juxtaposition with sacred things, appear profane—than we could have hoped. It is evident that Mr. Beecher has been impressed by the effective homeliness of the earlier Protestant and Puritan preachers, and has striven to imitate it, without remembering that it was effective precisely because it was earnest and natural, while his imitation of it is awkward and offensive; first, because it is affected, and next, because it is addressed to an audience who are so unused to illustrate the highest interests of life by reference to the lowest, that the attempt produces in their minds a sense of incongruity and absurdity—they are amused and not impressed. There is, too, a lamentable want of reverence and gravity—not of earnestness—in the tone of the preacher. He speaks as a sincere rather than as a devout man, as a man in earnest, but in earnest as men are earnest about daily concerns and material objects, not about those which inspire them with profound awe and solemn veneration—feelings which, we suspect, Mr. Beecher is quite incapable of realizing.

The Annual of Scientific Discovery * contains a good deal of useful, of interesting, and of curious information, consisting of matter partly original, partly compiled from more elaborate and detailed accounts, partly clipped from scientific journals; information of the progress made during the past twelve months in every branch of science and every department of mechanical industry; of the victories of the spectroscope, and the results of the expeditions sent out to watch the great eclipse of 1868; of the new theories and discoveries in chemistry; of the multitude of inventions to which these have given rise; and of the achievements in machinery which are the wonder and the boast of the age, and the peculiar pride of America. It is a somewhat rough and fragmentary, but a convenient record of the net results of scientific labour during the past year, necessarily imperfect, and serving rather as an index to the fuller information to be found in the archives of the Patent Office, in the scientific journals, and in the papers of the great Societies, than as a complete account of any of the vast number of new facts and theories which it notices; but interesting even to the unlearned, as showing how wide, how various, and how rapid is the progress of human knowledge and power, of man's insight into the secrets and mastery of the forces of nature.

A work by Mr. Parton, the eulogist of General Butler, which we noticed some months ago, denouncing the use of stimulants, and assailing the use of alcohol and tobacco, in the intemperate language and style which universally characterize the advocates of "Temperance," has called forth a very clever and entertaining reply † by a writer who appears to have taken pains to acquire what his antagonist wanted—a real comprehension of the facts and principles affecting his argument—and who has exposed with great force and clearness the inaccuracy of some of the favourite allegations of the Total Abstinence party, and the futility of the experiments on which they chiefly rely. He asserts that all the alleged evidences of the useless and noxious character of alcohol, derived from scientific experience, are vitiated by the radical error of inattention to the influence of quantity. Alcohol in large amounts, like thein in similar doses, is a narcotic poison, and, if given in such amounts, undoubtedly paralyses the digestive and other organs, and fails to be assimilated by them. Alcohol in small doses quickens the nutritive processes, strengthens the nerves, restores their powers when exhausted by fatigue, and in many cases has been proved beyond reasonable doubt to serve as food. Tobacco, again, in excess, or acting on an empty stomach, is a purely poisonous and narcotic agent; taken moderately and after a meal, it is shown to be in principle, as every smoker knows it to be in practice, a promoter of digestion. Both are useful aids to the nervous system in a state of life in which it is liable to be frequently and severely overtaxed. Such is M. Fiske's argument, supported by a careful record of facts, and a long list of eminent authorities. The work is interesting, at all events, as a spirited and effective attempt to turn the tables upon teetotallers, and to overthrow the formidable array of ugly-looking facts and misquoted statements by which they have perplexed the timid and imposed upon the ignorant.

How to Make Money ‡ is a sensible little volume, treating in a practical and homely form of some of the simple principles of political economy and commercial prudence, and may perhaps convey some elementary instruction in those principles to many on whom a more elaborate and scientific mode of treatment would be thrown away.

How a Bride was Won § is the title of another of Mr. Gerstäcker's splendid American tales of adventure, which, if they fall far behind the novels of Cooper in popularity as in merit, have yet never failed to please the insatiable appetite of boyhood for stories of enterprise and daring, and sketches of savage or half-savage life.

Gardening for the South ‖ is pretty accurately described by its title. It is a full and careful treatise on the care and management of a kitchen garden and orchard, adapted to the special conditions imposed by the soil and climate of the Southern and Middle States.

The Blameless Prince * is the story of a Queen who marries and gives her whole heart to a Prince who sustains a high character in the sight of the people, and retains to the last the affection and reverence of his wife, but is induced by the charms, personal and intellectual, of a lady whom he accidentally encounters at a distance from the Court to break his marriage-vow and deceive his trusting wife. The secret is well kept, until, after making up his mind finally to part with his mistress, the Prince is killed by the fall of a tree on his ride home. The mourning Queen and the desperate mistress meet at his tomb, and the latter betrays her secret. The Queen's heart is broken, and one day, at the unveiling of a statue erected to her husband's memory, the terrible conflict of feeling overpowers her, and she falls lifeless. It is impossible not to remark on the close resemblance of one-half of this story to a reality so recent and so impressive that it is sure to be present to the reader's thoughts at every page of the fiction; a resemblance which is rendered objectionable and offensive by the character of that half of the tale which is purely fictitious. There is much true poetry of thought and feeling both in this and some of the minor pieces; but hampered by a defective power of expression and command of versification which mar the effect.

A series of American school-books †, to which our attention is particularly called, carry the pupil, by a regular series of "spellers" and "readers," from the alphabet to a kind of anthology of moral, historical, and scientific lessons, original and selected, well suited to the higher classes of an elementary school. Our own idea is, we own, that the later volumes of the series are useless; that when a child can once read with ease, it is best to put into his hands books valuable for their own sake, and to make these the text of such further instruction in grammar, composition, and the meaning of words as may be afforded. For those who think otherwise Harper's Series seems to be well arranged, and it is decidedly superior to most works of the kind.

THE IRISH PROTESTANTS AND THE LORDS.

THE Irish Protestants have determined to use all their efforts to induce the Lords to reject the Irish Church Bill on the second reading. They are preparing monster petitions, in which their passionate wishes, their horror, and their fears are to find utterance. To us in England it seems odd that any one can believe that such petitions will have any practical effect; but the truth is, that the excited, alarmed, despairing friends of Protestant ascendency do not think of practical effects or practical anything. They want a ray of comfort and hope, and the only ray they can get to shine on them streams from the Peers. They do not stop to ask how the government of the country could be carried on if the Lords thwarted the strongest majority of the House of Commons that has been known in recent times. They clutch eagerly at the bare legal right of the Peers to do as they please. They cannot and will not believe it possible that the Lords, their great, powerful, steadfast friends, should be able to do nothing for them. The Peers, they say to themselves, may not perhaps be quite the masters of the British Government, but they must be able to exercise some influence. In fact, the Irish Protestants are going through the process, so familiar in domestic life, of "getting the missis to speak for them." When, in the stern discharge of duty, the head of the household thinks it necessary to dismiss offending servants, the erring domestics not unfrequently think they have a means of getting the sentence reversed. There is some one with more tenderness and less reasoning, whose power is always great, and the greatness of whose power in the last resort is unknown and may be unbounded, and who may easily be induced to be a friend. If the missis will speak for them all may be well. They do not stop to consider, and they trust their kind protectress will not stop to consider, how the household is to be ruled, how order is to be preserved, how good examples are to be upheld, if certain offences are overlooked. They only cling blindly to the hope that missis can put things straight for them, and will get them out of their trouble if they leave everything to her. Happy is the nation where a second Chamber can inspire such a feeling, and where an hereditary aristocracy is looked on as the friend of the friendless. That the Lords cannot do the petitioners any conceivable good only makes their confidence in the Lords more touching. It will soften the blow which these disheartened Irish Protestants are destined to suffer if they can but think that "missis" spoke for them, did not desert them in the hour of need, was kind and true to them, and did her ineffectual best in their behalf. This is the programme for the rest of the Session, which, so far as the routine business of the Commons goes, promises to be dull enough. All the political interest of the day centres in the Lords. "Missis" is going to speak for the Irish Church. We know the end of her speaking as well as she does, as well as in the bottom of their hearts they also know for whom she is to raise her voice. We can no longer carry on the government of the British Empire with Protestant ascendency maintained in Ireland. The less must yield to the greater; that which is first in our thoughts and in the line of our duties must take precedence over that which is but second. Still there is a great interest, pathetic, dramatic, and social, if not political, attaching to the pleading of the Lords for the Irish Church, and to the whole behaviour of the Upper House under circumstances so delicate and so critical.

It is often said that the English system of government has eminent advantage over other forms. It is so much more plastic, and expresses and carries out so much more quickly the wishes of the people. If the country is not suited exactly to its mind, it can get what it wants in a few days or weeks. Nothing more is necessary than a change of Ministry, or, at worst, a change of Ministry accompanied by a general election. In despotic Governments the despot has to be convinced that a change is necessary, and it is very difficult to change the convictions of a mind nursed in prejudices and inflamed with the long use of power. In any republican system, although the people are sure in the course of time to get what they want, yet it is only after the efflux of a considerable time that a new President, or a new Senate or Congress, can be invested with power. This is all quite true; but the peculiarity of this view of the English Constitution is that it entirely leaves the House of Lords out of consideration. It takes for granted that the Lords will always do whatever the Ministry of the day may ask them. Far from being peculiarly plastic, the English Constitution would be one of the most rigid and wooden schemes of government possible if a body of hereditary nobles exercised a perpetual veto over the decisions at which successive Ministries, supported by successive majorities in the Commons, arrived. There is always some hope of convincing a single man; it is possible to induce him to think of his family and of his successors, and to make him act so that his dynasty may endure. It is always conceivable that a new set of advisers may get access to him, or that calamity and disappointment may teach him wisdom; but it is hopeless to think of convincing personally the majority of such an assembly as the House of Lords. In a republic there is always something to work for, even if the prospect of success is not very immediate. The time must come when a new President, or a new Senate, or a new Congress, will have to be elected, and to influence the opinion of the majority is, in the long run, to control the action of the country. But an hereditary assembly is open to no changes of this sort, and if it will not yield, it can only be made to yield by a destruction of its political character and power. Ordinarily the House of Lords yields quite enough to make it true that the voice of the people, expressed by the Ministry of the day, determines with the utmost celerity what course the nation shall take. And the House of Lords usually yields so quietly and imperceptibly that no one knows that it is yielding. But every now and then an occasion arrives like the present, when, if it yields, it must do so avowedly under compulsion. It must do what it extremely dislikes doing, simply because it cannot help itself. This open conquest of one part of the constitutional body seems to us, in theory at least, an evil which, when different forms of government are compared, ought to be noticed. When the Emperor of AUSTRIA yielded after Sadowa, and set himself to reconcile Hungary to his rule, the change was a change hidden in the breast of an individual, and the Emperor of AUSTRIA still remained all that he had been, although with new purposes and views. A Republican President is now in harmony with a Republican Senate and Congress in the United States, and things are much changed from what they were last year, when a President was impeached. But the change has been brought about in the ordinary course of things, and the position of the President, and of the Senate and of the House of Representatives is exactly as good as it ever was. But in England things do not go on so quietly and softly. The House of Lords must yield openly and avowedly, and no political body can yield under compulsion without some new element of weakness inhering in it. The only question is, How can the House of Lords yield so as to do itself least harm? We cannot doubt that the answer is to be found in the distinct recognition of its position. As Lord SALISBURY said last year, an hereditary body is debarred by its very nature from setting itself up to judge what is best for the nation, when the nation has pronounced its judgment for itself. This is the key to the whole position. The triumph over the Lords will be deprived of almost all its sting, almost all its danger, if the Lords themselves regard it not as a triumph at all, but as a necessary part of the constitutional system. The best thing that can happen in the interests of the Upper House is, that the Lords should distinctly admit the principle that when a general election has been held to decide a point, and the decision has been recorded in a Bill adopted by incontestable majorities in the Commons, the function of the Lords is mainly reduced to explaining why, although they pass the Bill without hesitation, they protest against it and disapprove of it, and throw the whole responsibility of its consequences on the Ministry and on the other House.

Obviously, under such circumstances, very much will depend on the course taken by individuals. Whether the Peers adopt a dignified and courageous course, and avert the imputation of defeat by recognising that it is not for them to struggle, or whether they grow angry and rush into ill-considered and ineffectual opposition, will in a great degree depend on the tone given to their debates by the principal speakers. There are, we believe, good grounds for hoping that the leaders of the House will show wisdom, tact, and moderation. The three principal leaders of the majority, if Lord DERBY does not think fit to take an active part, are Lord CAIRNS, Lord SALISBURY, and Lord CARNARVON. Of these three peers, Lord CARNARVON actually voted last year for the Suspensory Bill, and Lord SALISBURY enunciated the doctrine that an hereditary assembly ought not to set itself against the clearly recorded decision of the whole nation. Lord CAIRNS will of course hold the leading brief for the Irish Church, and he will make an excellent advocate's speech, full of statements tolerably accurate, and of arguments tolerably plausible. But Lord CAIRNS is not at all likely to separate himself from Mr. DISRAELI. He will not be able, when he speaks of rejecting the Bill to rid himself of the anxious thought whether its rejection would really suit Mr. DISRAELI and Mr. DISRAELI's Chancellor. Now what Mr. DISRAELI must think of the Irish Church Bill is perfectly plain. He must long to get it out of the way, and to have done with a question which arrays against him a majority so compact and so overwhelming that all his spirit is taken out of him, until he does not even think it worth while to propose important amendments of which he has given formal notice. The task of Lord CAIRNS will not be to stop the Bill, but to convince the Irish Protestants that he is still their own Lord CAIRNS, that he has done his very best for them, and that if he could not help them it was because no one could. The Bishops will naturally do all they can for the cause they have made their own; but they will speak under the great disadvantage that every one will know that they are but taking a line which it is necessary they should take, and that, as the successful men of a profession, they are saying what the profession wishes should be said. The mild virtues of the CHANCELLOR and the seductive good-humour of Lord GRANVILLE will do all that is possible to soften that victory of a minority which must always ruffle the feelings of a majority. A brilliant hope, too, plays before the vision of the friends of the Bill and of the Government, and, half in amusement, half in triumph, they catch up and repeat the rumour that the real champion of the Irish Church, the really bitter and vigorous adversary of the Ministry, is to be revealed in Lord WESTBURY. The cause of the Irish Church is long past being damaged, but, if it could be damaged, its ruin could not have been more surely confided to any advocacy than that of a man whose every argument in its favour will provoke the reflection how very much better an argument he would have found against it if he had but been Chancellor. Some outbursts of bitterness there will be of course; some mooning dissertations on the Coronation Oath; some whisperings of panic-stricken Orange peers. But if the leaders on both sides keep their tempers, and from the outset insist on the true Constitutional position of the Lords, the Bill may not only pass, but may so pass that its passing shall not be regarded by the Upper House or by the public as a defeat of the Lords.

SPAIN.

THE restoration or continuance of monarchical government in Spain is settled, as far as the question can be decided by a vote. The election of members to the Cortes turned on the issue between a Kingdom and a Republic, in the same manner in which the majority of the present House of Commons was returned for the purpose of destroying the Irish Establishment. It is not improbable that within two or three months the Republic may have acquired some new adherents; but it may be presumed that the Cortes, who have resolved by three to one in favour of a monarchy, know the present wishes of their constituencies. The decision possesses whatever validity may attach to the modern and questionable ordeal of universal suffrage. The only disqualification imposed at the polling-booths was founded on immaturity of age; and, although republican enthusiasm is a passion incident to youth, it can scarcely be supposed that the result of the elections would have been materially affected if the age of voters had been fixed rather at twenty-one than twenty-five. The late division is the more significant because the preponderance of eloquence, if not of argument, remained with the defeated party. It appears that in Mr. CASTELAR the Spaniards possess an orator of extraordinary genius, whose very defects of logic, as well as his brilliant ability, suit the national taste. An historical attack on the successive heads of the House of ORLEANS may have borne but indirectly on the pretensions of the Duke of MONTPENSIER, but it tended to aggravate the prejudice which prevails against the probable successor of ISABELLA II. In a skilful anti-climax CASTELAR declared that, if the hereditary crown had been of gold, the elective crown of MONTPENSIER would be of silver, and that the circlet or badge of a Regency would be only of tin; and when he called upon the designated Regent to refuse the ignoble symbol, SERRANO himself, either by momentary impulse or of deliberate purpose, answered the appeal by an approving cheer. More than one ominous incident proved, before the debate was concluded, that the ostensible accord among the members of the Provisional Government is on the point of dissolution. Admiral TOPETE, who first gave the signal of insurrection in September, disclaimed the personal devotion to the cause of the Duke of MONTPENSIER which he had been supposed to entertain, and also in some degree exonerated the Duke and the Duchess from the imputation of having conspired against Queen ISABELLA. He added that the Cortes would understand him when he warned them against the possible settlement of the constitutional dispute by the violent act of some daring man. It was universally understood that TOPETE spoke of PRIM, who happened at the moment to be absent from the Chamber. It cannot be supposed that his suspicions of his colleague were merely founded on general character. As a member of the Government Admiral TOPETE must, if he is to be acquitted of inexcusable levity, have obtained information of the existence of treasonable or dangerous designs. It seems impossible that PRIM can remain silent in the presence of such a charge, or that the present Government can endure without considerable changes. At a later period of the sitting, Mr. AYALA, a member of the Cabinet, caused great irritation by asserting that the Republicans had taken no share in the overthrow of the late Government. Although the offence was given only to a minority consisting of one-fourth of the Cortes, AYALA thought it necessary to expiate his imprudence by resigning. As the decisive vote followed after all the untoward events which occurred during the debate, it appears that the resolution of the majority is irrevocably fixed.

If SERRANO has determined on refusing the Regency which he had at one time consented to accept, it may be presumed that he shares the distrust of PRIM which was more openly expressed by TOPETE. It was understood that the project of a Regency was intended as a compromise between the pretensions of the two chief members of the Government. SERRANO was to content himself with precedence, and with the ostensible control of the administration, while PRIM would retain, in the command of the army, the substance of power. It has often been suspected that PRIM, who has always been opposed to the candidature of MONTPENSIER, was not disinclined to form a political alliance with the Republicans; but the compliments which were lavished on SERRANO by CASTELAR seem to show that if any such intrigues have been commenced, they have not resulted in a treaty of union. The Republican orator, speaking apparently in the name of his party, offered SERRANO the Presidency as a reward for refusing the title of Regent; and the proposal, although it was impossible that it should be accepted, virtually involved a declaration of hostility to PRIM. The Republicans are probably well-advised in preferring a moderate and indolent opponent to a rival who, either as their ally or their antagonist, would seek to be their master. Every Spaniard who sincerely cares for liberty wishes to throw off the military supremacy which has outlasted several revolutions. If PRIM is less favourable to royalty than SERRANO and TOPETE, he is essentially a political soldier. The definitive refusal of the Regency by PRIM would render it necessary to adopt some alternative plan, for the majority will not concur in the appointment of ESPARTERO to the post which he held many years ago. If the dissensions of the Generals are patched up, there is no reason why the present mode of Government should not be continued until the monarchy is actually constituted; nor, indeed, would it be easy to justify any further delay in the election of a King. The Cortes rejected an amendment to the Constitution by which the choice would have been referred to the people, and they will never be more competent than now to apply to practice the principle which they have approved by their vote. If any interval should be necessary, Ministers may administer as easily as a Regent the vacant prerogative. The Cortes might easily provide for the discharge of all formal functions; and the executive authority has never been suspended. A Regency or Provisional Government prolonged for another year would provide the Republicans with a forcible argument, as well as with an excuse, for renewing the contest. A nation determined to be governed by a King, and incapable of finding an incumbent of the office, would present to the world a ridiculous spectacle.

Although the refusal of the crown by King FERDINAND of Portugal was unfortunate, the Duke of MONTPENSIER, who, by a natural process of elimination, is becoming the only possible candidate, probably wants no quality except the gift of popularity which is necessary to a constitutional King. The prejudices against him which strengthen the Republican party are probably founded on his position, rather than on his personal character. Like his former competitors, he is a foreigner, and the advantage of long residence as a naturalized Spaniard is barely a set-off against the defect that he is a Frenchman. It is scarcely his own fault that he owes his chance of elevation to the discreditable plot of his father and his father's Minister against the happiness and morality of an unoffending girl. The doubt whether the Duke of MONTPENSIER conspired against his sister-in-law may perhaps as well remain unsolved. The merit of patriotism might be obscured by the accompanying breach of domestic loyalty; but, when Mr. CASTELAR denounces the crime of profiting by the misfortunes of a near relation, he refers to a moral code which has seldom regulated the actions of princes. When the misconduct of a King is punished by dethronement, his subjects have a right to the services of the remaining members of his family. In the model Revolution which was contrived and managed exclusively by statesmen, a nephew and two daughters in succession occupied the throne which had become vacant through the misconduct of a false and fanatical King. It is not understood that the Duke of MONTPENSIER owes any special gratitude to a Queen who had always regarded him with natural suspicion. If he ultimately takes her place, he will be careful to avoid her conspicuous faults of private irregularity and of subserviency to priests. The House of ORLEANS has generally been respectable, and its principal members have inclined to anti-clerical Liberalism. The second Duke indeed, better known as Regent of France, carried to unusual excess the fashionable profligacy of the time; but he was a soldier and a statesman, and he despised the bigotry which disgraced the later years of LOUIS XIV. After an interval of fifty or sixty years, another Duke of ORLEANS emerged from obscurity by a display of revolutionary zeal which proved the activity of his ambition, if not the sincerity of his professions. LOUIS PHILIPPE rose far above the average level of princes, only falling short of greatness through the absence of chivalrous sentiment from his character. His descendants have maintained their dignity and acquired a great reputation under the most unfavourable circumstances. Nor is there any reason to believe that the Duke of MONTPENSIER is inferior in ability or in conduct to the other members of the family. If he becomes the founder of a dynasty, he or his children will be thorough Spaniards; and if their Government succeeds, they will enjoy all the advantages of the impression which royalty makes on the popular imagination; yet it seems that, in the first instance, the future King will be compelled to support the splendour of the Crown from his private resources. The Budget which has been submitted to the Cortes, while it exhibits a considerable deficiency, includes no provision of a Civil List. An additional expenditure for the express purpose of maintaining a Court would supply the Republicans with a plausible ground for agitation. In England a dignified and ill-paid ecclesiastical benefice is sometimes almost unavoidably bestowed on the owner of a private fortune. It would be an odd recommendation to a candidate for the Spanish Crown that he had accumulated a large property by judicious economy in a private station.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS.

THE prediction that the electoral contest in France would really lie between different sections of the Opposition has been signally verified. The Government will again command an immense majority in the Corps Législatif; it is in the composition of the minority that the revolution effected by the elections will be chiefly seen. In returning, as will certainly be the case, nine Opposition deputies, Paris has done no more than it did in 1863. Then, as now, the Government was beaten in every circumscription. But these two equally compact phalanxes are made up of very different elements. Of the men who represented Paris in the late Chamber only three will certainly represent it in the new. MM. ERNEST PICARD, JULES SIMON, and ERNEST PELLETAN alone among the old members command the undiminished confidence of the electors. MM. THIERS, JULES FAVRE, and GARNIER PAGÈS have failed to obtain an absolute majority. M. GAMBETTA has beaten M. CARNOT by upwards of 12,000, M. BANCEL has beaten M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER by exactly 10,000, and, out of the 30,385 voters in the Sixth Circumscription, only 4,851 were found to support M. GUÉROULT. It is impossible to mistake the significance of these changes. The three deputies who retain their seats were the most democratic of the former representatives. The partial failure of M. THIERS and M. JULES FAVRE shows that neither Parliamentary eminence nor reputation for statesmanship counts for so much, with the citizens of Paris, as extreme political opinions. The retirement of M. D'ALTON-SHEE makes the return of M. THIERS almost a certainty; but, if M. CANTAGREL succeeds in transferring his 7,437 votes to M. HENRI ROCHEFORT, M. JULES FAVRE has no chance of maintaining his position at the head of the Opposition candidates. M. GUÉROULT's ignominious defeat in the Sixth Circumscription, where in 1863 he obtained 17,492 votes, is attributed to his intimate relations with Prince NAPOLEON. The new Opposition is of a type which repudiates all connexion with the family of BONAPARTE, even where the name is supposed not to exclude a certain infusion of Democratic principles. This same antagonism has mainly contributed to the success of MM. GAMBETTA and BANCEL, and to the probable success of M. ROCHEFORT. The first of the three was an unknown man until his speech at the BAUDIN subscription trial last winter. His victory marks the preference of the electors for violent anti-Napoleonic oratory over the moderate Republicanism which laid up for itself so large a store of Socialist hatred in June, 1848. M. ÉMILE OLLIVIER's defeat gives striking testimony to the fact that a willingness to make the best of the Empire is the very worst passport to the heart of a Paris elector. "To vote for me," he declared in his address, "is to vote for constitutional opposition and against "irreconcilable opposition. Irreconcilable opposition would "lead you to disasters; constitutional opposition will lead you "to liberty." His late constituents accepted his account of the situation, and have declared unmistakeably that they prefer the threatened disasters to such liberty as can be enjoyed with NAPOLEON III. upon the throne. M. ROCHEFORT, if he enters the Chamber, will do so with no other claim than that of having lampooned the EMPEROR. If the choice of the electors in these three instances says little for their political philosophy, it leaves no doubt as to their political tastes. The voting at Lyons and Marseilles tells the same story. Lyons will have nothing to say to M. JULES FAVRE or M. HENON, and has returned MM. RASPAIL and BANCEL. If the latter should also be victorious at Paris, their places will probably be supplied by other deputies of equally extreme views. At Marseilles a second ballot will be necessary for both seats; but as M. GAMBETTA has secured 8,600 votes against 3,500 given to M. THIERS, it is to him, or to some one possessing similar recommendations, that the honour of defeating M. DE LESSEPS will fall. The circumstances of this election give it peculiar importance. The Government was so much alarmed at M. GAMBETTA's candidature that they took unusual pains to provide him with an opponent possessing strong claims on a commercial city. In M. DE LESSEPS, with the honours of the Suez Canal still fresh about him, they might have thought they had found what they were in search of. Nor was he by any means unwilling to accommodate himself to the supposed tastes of the citizens of Marseilles. He presented himself as "the energetic defender of all "liberties," and offered to take his "inspirations" from the "sentiments" of his constituents. The electors have apparently preferred a candidate whose "inspirations" are less conveniently flexible. In the other circumscription, the Government candidate is at the head of the poll, but as the united votes of the Opposition amount to 20,500 against his 14,000, his chances in the second ballot are extremely scanty.

The comment which has been frequently made in England upon these facts is, that France desires reform, not revolution. It is not easy to discover in what part of the returns the writers in question have found this moral inscribed. That a large majority of Frenchmen do not wish for a revolution is evident enough. It is true, indeed, that out of 7,301,941 votes, 3,248,885 have been given to the Opposition candidates, but that the judgment of the departments in this matter is as unmistakeable as ever, is a fact which admits of no question. Still this does but establish the negative half of the statement; as to the positive wishes of the departments, it gives us no information. As to the positive wishes of Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles, on the other hand, we are not left in any uncertainty. The great cities desire revolution, not reform. Nowhere is there a trace, on anything like a large scale, of the reasonable and constitutional aspirations which have been gratuitously attributed to the French people. Indeed, to judge from the defeats sustained by almost all the leading members of the moderate Opposition, the wish for reform, as such, can scarcely be said to exist in the constituencies. At Nantes, for example, out of more than 30,000 votes, not 2,000 were one given to M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL; and yet, if there be any man more than another who embodies the principle which is alleged to have triumphed this week, it is the brilliant antagonist of Personal Government. M. HERVÉ has equally failed to secure the seat to which his services to the cause of constitutional freedom in the Journal de Paris gave him so good a title. These are not the only Liberal journalists who have been rejected; and if it be supposed that France has taken a sudden dislike to the profession which has hitherto played so large a part in her political history, we may draw the same conclusion from the defeat of such men as M. ALBERT DE BROGLIE and M. DE FALLOUX. So far as we have yet seen, there is nothing to be set against these facts except the success of M. OLLIVIER in the Var. But, as it suited M. ROCHEFORT's purpose to ensure his rejection in Paris by the hint that he was the official candidate, it was impossible to oppose him elsewhere. Consequently, there is nothing to show whether it was in the capacity of a friend of the EMPEROR, or of the member of the "Third Party," that he found 16,000 electors to vote for him.

The supporters of the Government in the press declare themselves thoroughly satisfied with the turn that affairs have taken. They argue that the issue between the Empire and revolution has now been plainly stated, and they anticipate that the alarm which will thus be excited will greatly strengthen the hold of the Government on the conservative feeling of the country. That there is considerable truth in this view of the situation is undeniable. There is no longer any substantial grievance weighing on the French peasant from which he can hope to escape by a general overturn. His debts are heavy, but they are due to men of his own class, or only a little removed from it, and he knows that no political changes would alter his neighbour's determination to get his interest on the money he has lent him. Indeed, if he has any dreams of a possible improvement in his condition, they are more likely to be connected with the Empire which has given him railways, and promises to give him roads, than with a Republic which is traditionally associated in his mind with foreign wars, forced contributions, and neglect of tillage. The victories of the Revolution have hitherto been gained over very inadequate resistance, and if the departments are determined to support the EMPEROR, they are not likely to find the position betrayed beforehand by timidity or irresolution at Paris. It must not be forgotten, however, that this is only one side of the picture. The other side is, that the Empire is at length face to face with a foe with whom it is impossible to compromise, and that this foe has gained a great accession of strength within the last year or two. That Paris is hopelessly hostile can ever be a pleasant reflection to a ruler of France, and there is too much reason to fear that the day when concession can be of much avail has passed away. The EMPEROR has refused to conciliate the constitutional Opposition when it was in his power to do so, and things seem now to have come to a pass at which any step he may take in this direction will be no longer worth the sacrifice it would involve. He would be forced to quarrel with his own friends in order to gain the support of a party which the elections have shown to be practically powerless in France. The satisfaction of the Imperialist writers at the result of the elections may perhaps be attributed to their perception of this fact. To them no revolution could be more disastrous than a reconciliation of their master with the Parliamentary Liberals. With the concession of a responsible Ministry their occupation would be gone, and in the withdrawal of the principal inducement to such an experiment they may see a legitimate cause for rejoicing. It does not follow that the EMPEROR has equal reason to congratulate himself on the work of the week.

ENGLISH POLICY IN CHINA.

SOME China Correspondence which has recently been issued, while it shows that there are two sides to the questions which have lately been discussed in Parliament, on the whole fully justifies Lord CLARENDON's stringent instructions. A general monotony, including much variety of detail, characterizes the numerous quarrels between the inhabitants of the country and their unwelcome guests. When a merchant or a missionary has contracted for the purchase of premises, it sometimes happens that, with or without the connivance of the vendor and the local authorities, a mob prevents the purchaser from taking possession of his property. Occasionally goods belonging to English owners are stopped in transit, notwithstanding the production of all proper documents; or a trader passing near a village is pelted or assaulted by natives who are as hostile to strangers as if they lived in the Midland counties. The Consular agent on the spot at once adopts the cause of his countrymen; and if a gunboat is within reach he requests the aid of the officer in command, who is only too happy to find exercise for the energies of himself and his crew. At the outset it would seem that the Chinese are for the most part in the wrong; but if the Correspondence accurately represents the state of affairs, there is no foundation for the charges which have been made against the upper classes. The gentry or literary graduates, who were lately denounced in Parliament, have had little or nothing to do with the outrages which have furnished an excuse for retaliation. In the only instance in which one of their body had instigated a riot, the culprit, when he was arrested in compliance with the demands of the Vice-Consul, was found to be a half-witted man of seventy, who was, even in the opinion of his accusers, scarcely a proper object of punishment. The officers of the Government, although they may probably not be disinclined to screen delinquents, almost always reply to the reclamations of the Consuls with courteous professions and promises; but experience shows that both the mandarins and the population are most deferential when a zealous lieutenant, with a Vice-Consul at his back, has taken a fort, or fired a few volleys of musketry among an armed village rabble. A petition from the inhabitants of a place called Tang-tun, which had been punished with lawless severity for some irregularity of the kind, is touching in the helplessness which it indicates. The villagers say that "on the 8th of this month some children, seeing your great "country's war-boats passing, were much frightened, and, run-"ning away, foolishly excited our people to attack them; for "which the great army has entered our village and punished us. "We repent our fault fully, and, prostrating ourselves, beg "undeserved that mercy may be shown us, and promise that, "men and women, we will one and all live peaceably and "quietly for coming generations under your favour. Trusting "that the great Consul will hear our prayers, &c." In this case, which is the worst recorded in the Correspondence, Commodore OLIVER JONES, acting apparently under the orders of Sir H. KEPPEL, the Commander-in-Chief, had burnt part of a village, and almost destroyed a town of 7,000 inhabitants, in consequence of some shots which had been fired on the boats of the gunboat Cockchafer. Admiral KEPPEL will perhaps hereafter be able to explain a seeming breach of faith with the VICEROY, who had undertaken himself to punish the offenders, receiving the promise of the Admiral to abstain from independent action. It is due to the Consul, Mr. ROBERTSON, to record his open disapprobation of Commodore JONES's unfortunate exploit.

In the vast Empire of China there are wide differences of character and civilization. Some of the collisions reported in the Correspondence occurred in the island of Formosa, where an aboriginal population under Chinese rulers is still so deficient in refinement as to practise cannibalism. It is not surprising that in such a country missionaries should be exposed to inconvenience; and the religious difficulty is aggravated by quarrels between English merchants and Chinese traders who formerly possessed a monopoly of the staple commodity of camphor. In consequence of various grievances for which no redress could be obtained, Mr. GIBSON, the Acting Consul, induced Lieutenant GURDON to seize a town and a fort as a security for the concession of a string of demands. The operation was effected with laudable skill and courage; but it is satisfactory to find that the civil and military officers have been sharply reprimanded, and that Lord CLARENDON has both removed Mr. GIBSON from his post, and instructed the English Ambassador to express his regret to the Chinese Government. Sir H. KEPPEL had previously directed the return of a large sum of money which had been exacted from the local authorities, but in other respects he approved of Lieutenant GURDON's conduct. It is perhaps desirable that pugnacity should be tolerated in sailors; but the naval Commander-in-Chief has shown, on more than one occasion, an imperfect apprehension of the rights which belong even to the Chinese. The English Government, in concluding the Treaty of Tientsin, insisted on the residence of an Envoy at the Court of Pekin, for the express purpose of avoiding the necessity of collision with the provincial authorities. It was thought expedient, as well as just, to support the Imperial Government by recognising its paramount right and duty of enforcing order. When Consuls and naval officers take the law into their own hands, they furnish the Chinese Government with unanswerable grounds of complaint. It is probably true that local action secures speedier redress, and Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK expatiates in an elaborate despatch on the difficulty of applying European rules of conduct to dealings with a nation which acknowledges a different standard of law and morals; yet, on the whole, it is impossible to justify systematic violation of the Treaty. The English Envoy, though he hesitates between two inconsistent lines of policy, has the merit of having strongly condemned the acts of Mr. GIBSON and Lieutenant GURDON. Prince KUNG addressed to him an indignant protest, concluding with the intimation that he might hereafter be induced to apply directly, through the Chinese Ambassador, to the English Government. As Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK remarks, "they are evidently making progress in their diplomatic education"; and he admits that, if the Minister on the spot will not do the Chinese Government justice, "they "are perfectly entitled to refer the matter in question "direct by their own mission to the Home Government, "and to notify to other Courts the steps taken"; yet, in his argumentative despatch to Lord STANLEY, Sir R. ALCOCK expresses a doubt whether the method of settling difficulties by local action is not preferable. The plan of direct application to the Central Government is, he says, "more consonant "with treaty relations and international law, but it is also "more damaging to the EMPEROR's power to govern the "Empire, and more costly to the foreign Power resorting to "it." According to his statement, the Imperial Government is almost always unwilling or unable to correct distant abuses; and he contends that the local authorities must be taught "to respect treaty obligations for their own sake, if they care "nothing for treaties or for the orders of their own Government." "Experience," he adds, "leads infallibly to the "conclusion that, where treaties have been imposed by force "on an unwilling Government, as all with China, they can "only be upheld by similar means." It is proper to state that Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK condemns in the strongest language the action of Consuls and naval officers without the direct orders of the Minister. Lord CLARENDON has expressed his readiness to extend the powers of the Minister, if he requires additional facilities for restraining his subordinates; and it cannot be doubted that the Admiral will be cautioned against the too ready indulgence of his professional instincts.

In diplomatic decorum and dignity the chief statesmen of China stand on a European level. In his interview with Sir H. KEPPEL, the Viceroy of CANTON bore himself like a polished gentleman, while the policy which he announced was equally prudent and vigorous. He had, he said, already ordered 4,000 troops to march against the village which had fired on the man-of-war's boats, and he trusted that the operation would have the happiest effect. In answer to some apologetic language of Sir H. KEPPEL, he remarked that officers would sometimes make mistakes, and that he had found it so with his own. "On taking leave the VICEROY renewed in the most "impressive manner his expressions of esteem and regard for "Sir H. KEPPEL, and trusted that on his next visit to Canton "His Excellency would do him the honour of dining with "him." On the following morning the VICEROY sent his card, with his farewell wishes, to the Admiral. It was in the course of the same day that Commodore JONES attacked the villages, in obedience to orders which had perhaps been issued before the interview. It is absurd and impossible to treat courtly magnates, who argue with the closeness of accomplished lawyers, as irresponsible barbarians; but the laxity of Chinese administration, and perhaps the latent dislike towards foreigners, will probably lead to the practical adoption of Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK's policy. For the present the experiment of exclusive reliance on the Imperial Government ought to be fully tried; and, if it is necessary to recur to occasional local pressure, all the Treaty Powers should, if possible, be induced to adopt one common mode of action. There is perhaps no part of the world in which the representatives of the great civilized Governments act so much in harmony. During one of the Consular combats with the Chinese, an American gunboat was present, for the purpose of countenancing the English demands. Any privilege which might be withdrawn from any one of the trading communities would be immediately refused to all foreigners. In the less civilized parts of the Empire it is consolatory to observe that Protestant and Roman Catholic missionaries are equally liable to persecution. The relations between Europe and China will ultimately be determined rather by necessity or convenience than by deliberate policy. It has apparently not yet occurred to any Chinese diplomatist to demand satisfaction for the ill-treatment of the EMPEROR's subjects in Australia or California. A hundredth part of the injustice which has been inflicted on harmless and useful Chinese gold-diggers would, if it had been perpetrated at the expense of English or American traders in China, have been long since avenged with the aid of irresistible gunboats.

THE END OF THE ELECTION PETITIONS.

THE last of the Election Petitions is over, and the storm of justice which came in like a lion has gone out like a lamb. A petition with results more mild and gentle than that of the North Norfolk election can scarcely be imagined. The whole of the evidence was at last boiled down to the two simple accusations that Sir E. LACON had given too many pounds of beef on a certain day at lunch, and that Mrs. FELLOWES, the wife of a Conservative member, had, during the days of canvassing, expressed her intention to buy none but Conservative cloth. With lady politicians we have generally little sympathy. They may, as Mr. MILL says, be the regenerators of the politics of the future, but in our own days we observe that they almost always do harm when they interfere in politics; they are such fierce, such bitter, such unscrupulous partisans. But we cannot help having a sympathy with a lady who proclaimed a fancy for Conservative cloth, if Conservative cloth might be interpreted to mean cloth something like what cloth used to be. What a real comfort it would be to get any cloth that was not mere shoddy with a beautiful gloss on it! The beef question was surely one of the smallest ever submitted to a legal tribunal. The case of the petitioners resolved itself into an allegation that there was at least half a sirloin and a couple of ribs too much. The petition was dismissed with costs, and the great electioneering assizes of 1869 were over. What has been the general result of these assizes? Speaking briefly, and in round numbers, we may say that the seats attacked by petitions have been little over a hundred, that four-tenths of the petitions have been unsuccessful, four-tenths have been withdrawn, and two-tenths have ended in victory. Thirteen Conservatives and nine Liberals have been unseated on petition. This is all. The Judges have done no more than declare one seat out of every five attacked to have been attacked successfully. As a rule, petitions have been a gross failure. The petitioners have been lured on, hoping that their evidence might turn out better than it seemed, believing that at the last moment new evidence might be forthcoming, striving to persuade themselves that some queer point of law might be ruled in their favour. But they have learnt wisdom by bitter experience. It is, in language which we trust is appropriate in a Derby week, at least four to one against a petitioner. It is scarcely possible to conceive that henceforth petitioners will be forthcoming. The costs will be found to be very heavy, and the prospect of unseating a member very slight. The whole drift of the decisions is in favour of sitting members. They have been regarded as holders of a primâ facie title in fee simple, which it would need something very extraordinary indeed to override. There are, indeed, dangers which candidates are apt to run, but the Judges have, with great kindness and foresight, pointed out almost every danger a candidate need fear, and taught him how to guard against it. If an election were held again this year, candidates would profit by the decisions of the Judges, and would show that they knew exactly what is permissible and what is not. The main success achieved by the Judges is, that they have made it perfectly clear what may be done and what may not be done. Money must not be given to buy votes; meat and drink must not be given on the condition or understanding that the person who eats or drinks shall vote in a particular way; and voters must not be threatened with physical harm, or with immediate loss of employment, if they vote as they wish. If these simple rules are kept in mind, candidates may do very much what they like.

The tribunal which has thus ended its first session has in many respects fully answered the high expectations that were formed of it. Justice has been dealt out in a summary, striking, and effective way; the cost of petitions has probably been reduced, and in each locality an impression has been produced that the best result at which the law could arrive has been attained. Nor has there as yet been any sign of the evil which the judges themselves feared, any indication that the unsullied probity of the Bench has been lowered in popular estimation, or that even the most wrongheaded believe that the judges have been guided by feelings of political partisanship. Nor is it at all fair to measure the good effects of the new system by the amount of bribery and intimidation which it has detected and punished. It ought also to be credited with the vast amount of corrupt practices which the mere dread of it prevented. There were hundreds of evil-minded and corrupt electioneering agents who were simply restrained from pouring out money and beer like water by the thought of the judges who would come down to the scene of corruption, and detect and expose the offenders. So far as the trials of these petitions have shown, there was not much direct bribery, or flagrant intimidation, or open treating at the last election; and there can be no doubt that the absence of these evils was in a great measure due to the fear which the judges inspired. At the next election, the lessons now set will not be forgotten, and in all probability there will be no bribery like the bribery of Dublin, of Norwich, or of Bridgewater, no wholesale treating like that of Bradford, no coarse tyranny of intimidation like that at Westbury. All this good has sprung and will spring from the new system; and, if we are to judge it fairly, we must acknowledge how excellent some of its immediate effects have been. On the other hand, we have no doubt that its general result is not to make money and beer and tyranny less powerful than they have been, but, on the contrary, to make them much more powerful, if only they are in the hands of those who will condescend to use discretion. The rich man may spend thousands and thousands of pounds in a borough, he may cheer the hearts of all supporters with good food and good drink, and he may make it understood that to vote for him means ease for the poor man, and to vote against him means ruin, and yet that to bring an election petition against him would be quite hopeless. This is the weak point of the position in which we now find ourselves. The check on corrupt practices is the presentation of petitions; but the law has been so interpreted as to make it mere folly to present petitions. Even under present circumstances, when it was not known how the judges would decide, and when inveterate habits of corruption were so strong in some boroughs that no apprehension of detection could arrest the proceedings of the old managers of bribes, only one seat in five of those attacked has been attacked successfully. For the future, when electioneering agents have studied the decisions, and seen exactly what they may do and what they may not do, either no petitions will be presented, or not one in ten will succeed, and petitioners will not like running the risk of costs, and going through the odium and the very dirty practices in the purchase of evidence which are found necessary, merely to be defeated after all. Petitions will, we may guess, be very sparingly presented, and then the check supplied by the judges will be removed, or very much mitigated in its effect. Corruption and intimidation will become a little more audacious each time, until at last good cases for petitions are discovered. There will then be some successful petitions, and a warning will be given. The evil for a time will diminish until again, as vigilance is relaxed, it begins to grow, and so the cycle will be repeated. We know tolerably well now what the system of trying petitions by Common-Law judges will do for purity of elections and what it will not, and if we come to the conclusion that its effects, excellent up to a point, are very limited in their operation, we must be prepared to rely on other agencies, and to seek for aids to electoral innocence either in new legislation or in the gradual improvement of the standard of political morality in the country.

The judges are not in any way to be blamed for the disappointment which their decisions have undoubtedly caused, although it is undeniable that at first they were inclined to regard the cases submitted to them from a point of view much more favourable to petitioners than that which they ultimately adopted. At the outset they were, without question, disposed to consider themselves as persons having it in charge to suppress evil practices at elections. They surveyed election practitioners from a moral elevation, and wished to put down bribery and treating and intimidation. As time wore on, they entirely gave up any notions of the sort. They ceased to act as agents of the public, or as representatives of electoral purity, and merely appeared as persons whose business it was to confirm a sitting member in his seat, unless a clear legal case could be made out against him. This is entirely in keeping with the province of the judge as known to English law. He exists to protect every one in possession, except those against whose possession a better title can be made out. It is no part of the duties of a judge to help society, or to improve morals, or to supplement legislation. He is simply a person taking 5,000*l.* a year to keep A. comfortable, until B. can show a clear legal right to make him uncomfortable. The judges protected the sitting member, unless the petitioners could clearly make out an undeniable case against him. The public have been disappointed at this, for they thought that the judges would do something more, and that they would help the investigation in the interests of the public, so that evil practices might be detected and punished. But the judges, after some hesitation, declined this function. It is contrary to all the traditions of English law for the judge to turn himself into counsel for either side. He is to wait and see how the game is played, and what forces and what skill each party brings into the contest. It is not in any way the business of an English judge to see that justice is done. He believes that he would lose all his influence and usefulness if he attempted anything of the sort. He is merely authorized to pronounce whether the plaintiff has made out his case against the defendant. That the recent decisions of the three Election Judges have been sound in law is beyond question; but the public did not understand exactly the grounds on which they were given, and so were disheartened at finding that corruption was not to be put down as much as was hoped. And it must be owned that this feeling was in a large measure justified by some of the earlier decisions, in which the judges had assumed a different position, and had appeared to countenance the notion that they were performing a moral duty in the interests of society. There is an undeniable discrepancy between the earlier and the later decisions; and although this is exactly what must happen in every department of law which is in course of formation, it naturally awakens some feelings of surprise and disappointment. In the early days of these election petitions, for example, Baron MARTIN laid down, at Bradford, that the mere expenditure of a very large and totally unnecessary sum of money in a borough threw a taint of evil practices on a candidate. This was a view quite inconsistent with the notion subsequently adopted, that a candidate might spend any number of thousands of pounds he pleased, so long as the petitioner could not fix on a particular act of bribery, or prove that when a man ate a sandwich he ate it, and was meant to eat it, with an intention to let his vote depend on it. The Bradford decision was reversed in the cases of Youghal and Westminster. A candidate is now held to be entitled to spend exactly as much as he likes in legitimate expenses, and everything is legitimate which is not demonstrably corrupt. Rich men may read the general conclusions to be drawn from the decisions with the utmost satisfaction; and they will soon be brought to believe that not only is money as powerful as it ever was, but that the judges have taught apt scholars exactly how to spend it. Whether we try to do something more for purity of election by fresh legislation is another question, but at any rate it is a good beginning for fresh legislation that it should have been proved conclusively what the new system of trying petitions will do and what it will not do. It will secure the cheap, speedy, and notorious punishment of specific acts of gross bribery, intimidation, and treating, if detected; and it will protect the sitting member if he has spent thousands and thousands of pounds, and has treated and intimidated, provided he remembers a few simple rules which the judges have laid down. This is the upshot of the decisions, and those who lament the poverty, as they term it, of the result may ask themselves what more the judges could have done unless they were to assume the novel character, not of arbiters between disputants, but of moral censors and ministers of public justice.

MR. FORSTER ON ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

MR. FORSTER, in his late speech at Bradford, expressed a natural hope that his defence of his country against the charges preferred by Mr. SUMNER might reach a portion of the American people. To those Englishmen who, from the commencement of the civil war to its end, thought it becoming to maintain an absolute neutrality in word as well as in act, it is satisfactory to find that an able and earnest partisan of the Northern cause refutes by arguments which, proceeding from such a quarter, almost amount to evidence, the wantonly unjust imputations by which the politicians of the United States seek to fasten a quarrel upon England. That Mr. FORSTER's speech should affect public opinion, or the expression of public opinion, in America, is in the highest degree improbable. The timidity or gregarious unanimity which seems to be a result of popular sovereignty has in this instance, as on other occasions, absolutely silenced dissent. Only three months ago, when it was reported on good authority that General GRANT held the opinions which have since been announced by Mr. SUMNER, the moderate Republican papers pointed out the impropriety of preferring demands which led by a logical, if not a practical, necessity to war; yet Mr. SUMNER'S extravagant appeal to popular prejudice was immediately adopted by all parties and all political writers as an authoritative statement of the national claims. It is true that there has since been a perceptible reaction on the part of journalists who feel that they have compromised their intellectual character and self-respect; but little attempt has been made to correct the wildest popular misconceptions. Mr. FORSTER'S speech will be searched, if it is noticed at all, for admissions to be used in the controversy against England. Mr. SUMNER'S speech was studded with quotations from Mr. COBDEN, Mr. BRIGHT, and Mr. FORSTER himself, as zealous friends of America who had employed all their argumentative and rhetorical powers to vindicate the Northern cause. The references to English testimony were as secure from retaliation as they were characteristically ungenerous. The closest research would fail to disclose a single friendly expression towards England uttered since 1861 by any American except Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, whose after-dinner speeches are not likely to be quoted. The New York Herald, which Mr. FORSTER mentions as a journal hostile to England, was not more habitually insulting or bitter in its language, from the very commencement of the war, than the principal Republican journals. The vituperation which was professedly provoked by the ravages of the Alabama had reached its loudest before a plank of the vessel was laid. When the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Federal House of Representatives applauded Captain WILKES for insulting the English flag, the utmost pettifogging audacity would have been puzzled to invent a claim for damages incurred by the act or default of the English Government. The unofficial leaning to the South of which Mr. SUMNER childishly complains was in a great measure caused by the incessant abuse directed by Republican writers and speakers against England. During the whole course of the war, no motion unfriendly to the United States was carried in either House of Parliament, and the leaders of both parties discouraged to the utmost of their power all discussion on the subject. The Lower House of Congress has more than once passed, without a dissenting voice, resolutions which had no possible object except to serve as affronts to England.

Mr. FORSTER'S account of his own exertions to procure the issue of the Proclamation of Neutrality might almost extract a retractation from Mr. SUMNER himself, if he were subject to the European weakness of shame. That a measure urgently promoted by the friends of the North was an unwarrantable concession to the South, is a proposition which is refuted as soon as it is stated. Mr. SUMNER'S distinction between war on land and war at sea would be entirely inapplicable to the circumstances, even if it were not an arbitrary novelty in international jurisprudence. Belligerents on land are necessarily at war on the sea; nor is it possible in a declaration of neutrality to distinguish between two fields of hostility. It might be contended with equal plausibility that during a mountain campaign cavalry were not entitled to belligerent rights, because they could only be used in the open country. As a matter of fact, the Confederacy possessed a coast line of two thousand miles, including numerous ports which would have remained open if they had not been excluded from intercourse with the outward world by a formal exercise of the rights of war. If the Southern ports had not been blockaded, the Proclamation of Neutrality would have been highly beneficial to the North; and the blockade which was actually enforced furnished a conclusive proof of belligerency. As Mr. FORSTER truly states, his own argument against interference with the Federal blockade was necessarily founded on the proof that it was efficiently maintained. No tribunal or writer on international law has ever alleged that a Government is liable for the private enterprise of its subjects who at their own risk attempt to break a blockade. The Proclamation of Neutrality, exclusively addressed to English subjects, operated as a warning that, in disregarding a lawful blockade, they would forfeit the protection to which they would have been entitled if their Government had refused to recognise a state of war.

The demands which are founded on the Proclamation of Neutrality, even if they had been otherwise admissible, cannot be preferred in good faith unless they are addressed to France as well as to England. The recognition of belligerent rights by Russia herself was equally comprehensive, and it was issued only three or four weeks after the declaration of England and France. The excuse that the English Proclamation was especially obnoxious because the Confederates afterwards derived resources from England involves the assumption that the Proclamation was not in itself a substantial grievance. It is true that arms were imported from England, and not from France, into the Confederate territory, and that English merchant-vessels attempted, with varying success, to elude the blockade; but if French makers of military stores could have undersold their English competitors, they would have commanded a preference in the Southern market; and it happened that the North was supplied, far more largely than the South, from English workshops. Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS once declared that it was only with the aid of supplies procured from England that the Government of Washington had been able to conquer the South; and his assertion, if not strictly accurate, was nearer the truth than Mr. SUMNER'S counter-statement. The profitable though hazardous business of blockade-running necessarily fell into the hands of a population accustomed to maritime enterprise. The stoppage of the supply of American cotton had inflicted exceptional damage on English industry, and the enormous profits to be obtained from occasional cargoes of cotton formed an irresistible attraction to adventurous traders. The escape of the Alabama from the Mersey forms the only plausible ground of complaint during a four years' war which paralysed the principal English manufacture. In the subsequent admission of the Alabama to the privileges ordinarily accorded to ships of war, England once more occupied the same position with France. If the ship had been, according to law as well as in popular American phraseology, a pirate, France, as well as England, would have committed a wrong against the United States in affording hospitality to a corsair; yet it is notorious that the Alabama sailed from the port of Cherbourg on the evening before her final conflict with the Kearsarge. If Mr. FORSTER is accurately informed, the Emperor of the FRENCH urged in vain upon the English Government a proposal to recognise the independence of the Confederacy. It is at least certain that he would gladly have shared with England a policy which would have saved him from the mortification of a compulsory retreat from Mexico.

But for the discouraging result of long and uninterrupted experience, it might be hoped that the American people would reconsider demands which are absolutely without reasonable pretext. The unanimity of all parties in England on the question since the delivery of Mr. SUMNER'S discreditable speech has a significance which is perhaps imperfectly appreciated in Washington or in New York. In this country no feeling of ill-will has ever been entertained to the United States, nor have the strong sympathies with America of a large section of the community been concealed or overborne. Many of those who are most firmly resolved to decline both humiliation and the payment of Mr. SUMNER'S two or three hundred millions have, during and after the civil war, been considered by their opponents as violent American partisans; yet even the silly fable of a Cabinet discussion which imposed on Mr. SUMNER represented Mr. BRIGHT as opposed to extravagant and impossible pretensions. Mr. FORSTER, as might be expected, still addresses complimentary language to a personal friend who is the most prominent enemy of England. There is no harm in good-humour or in courteous words, but respect for a man or a nation is not less clearly shown by argumentative confutation and by protests against ostentatious injustice. It is admitted that Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S professions, and even the civil expressions which were elicited in turn, furnished natural causes of irritation to a community conscious of opposite feelings. No similar excuse would exist if offence were taken at the indignant rejection of a demand which must have been intended as an insult. The adjournment of the controversy, although previous postponements have only tended to aggravate hostile feelings, seems at present to afford the only chance of avoiding a rupture.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

MR. CHILDERS' experiment of giving the Naval Volunteers a taste of salt-water discipline aboard the fleet is success in more ways than one, and he has shown the importance he attaches to it by accompanying the men on their cruise. The Naval Reserve had become so much of a mystery that scarcely any one knew what materials it was made of, or what reliance could be placed on it. For some years after its first formation there was a general sense of relief from the anxiety which had always before been felt when there was occasion to man a fleet. Sir CHARLES NAPIER's tinkers and tailors, cabmen and roughs, with whom he eked out the narrow complement of Coastguard men for his Baltic crews during the Russian war, gave us a specimen of what the old system inevitably led to. Independently of the Reserve, the difficulty has since been greatly diminished by the increased popularity of the naval service, but the establishment of blue jackets has to be so rapidly augmented on the outbreak of war that nothing but a trustworthy Reserve can ever fill the gap. But is the Reserve trustworthy? Are they good men and true, up to their work when afloat, and safe not to shirk when called upon? This question has of late been asked in a tone of suspicion which there were no definite facts to justify, and unfortunately it is one that can never be conclusively answered until the pinch is felt. All that can be done in peace time is to get opportunities of meeting the men face to face, and judging whether they come from the right class, to test their readiness by asking them to volunteer for service a little beyond the letter of their bond, and to ascertain from their discipline and alacrity on board ship whether they have entered into their engagements heartily and frankly with a disposition to fulfil their obligations to the utmost, or have merely accepted their retaining fee as a boon, with only a very hazy idea of performing their part of the contract. The experimental cruise with the Channel Fleet is, of course, not a conclusive test of the tone of the Reserve; but, so far as can be judged, every indication leads one to rely on the force as a really trustworthy source of strength.

The strength required to complete (together with the Coastguard contingent) the manning of the squadron was about 1,700; not much more than a tenth of the whole number on the register, though of course a very much larger proportion of those who are at any one time in England. Probably, as specially enthusiastic volunteers, they may be the cream of the force; but, considering the various engagements of the men, there may be enough behind to man many such fleets, ready if occasion should require it. If they were anything like a fair sample of the whole body, the reports are most encouraging. It seems universally agreed that they were as fine a lot of seamen as need be gathered on a man-of-war's deck, and though they had not, and could not have, all the smartness which a thoroughly-trained navy crew exhibits after a year or so in commission, there is no suggestion of any lack either of zeal or capability. The rapidity and intelligence with which they are said to have mastered the new drill with 12-ton guns is a sign that their hearts were in their work; and it is no disparagement to them to say that, after they had been some time at sea in one of HER MAJESTY's ships, they would learn to get in a reef in about half the time which it took them to accomplish the task. By no means the least important part of the experiment was that it was the first trial of the Reserve officers in the duties of the fleet, and it does not seem that the handling of the ships was much the worse for the substitution of the officers of merchantmen for the regular naval staff. Mr. CHILDERS will probably have something to say in Parliament about the experience he has gained, and, whatever it may be, it can scarcely be otherwise than encouraging, unless the reports from the fleet are singularly inaccurate. So far as it goes, this trial trip seems to establish the soundness of the Reserve organization. If every man could be found when wanted, or within a few months of the summons, we might man half-a-dozen such fleets as that which put to sea on this occasion with the Reserve alone; and even after every allowance for possible defaulters, the enormous strength gained by the system can scarcely be too highly estimated. The power to add a dozen or a score of ironclads to our active fleet immediately after the declaration of war might in many cases ensure an almost immediate triumph, and instead of waiting weary months for the men to make up the complement of a single ship, our only difficulty, if the Reserve is to be relied on, will be to find ships for the men at our disposal. And even this may indirectly be facilitated by the existence of the Reserve. One great cause of our slow progress in shipbuilding has been the enormous expense of keeping in commission at all times a fleet sufficient in itself to make a respectable show at a moment's notice. With a large body of men always available to meet any emergency, it may not be necessary to maintain the peace strength of the navy at so high a standard as has been required when there were no assured means of rapid recruiting. If this outlay were diminished, there would be something more than a poor ten or fifteen per cent. of the Navy Estimates available for the building of new ships; and with an ample supply of first-class vessels, of which only a few were in commission, and a reserve of men behind, we might be much stronger than with a larger force afloat, and neither ships nor men ready to increase its strength.

Except as a trial of the Reserve, the cruise does not seem to have done much to extend our very defective system of naval evolutions, and with scratch crews, got together at short notice, most of whom trod the deck of a man-of-war for the first time in their lives, it would have been out of place to experiment upon the manœuvres which the modern class of ships seems to call for. Indeed, almost all the work was done under sail, and the tactical evolutions which were practised under steam were of the simplest kind. From line abreast to column, from divisions to sub-divisions, and the like, were the only movements, and the echellon and other formations which have been proposed for the handling of a steam fleet in action were wholly omitted from the programme. What was done, however, is favourably reported of; and if the Admiral has as much to say for his crews as the representatives of the press who accompanied him, we may take it as settled, at any rate, that a first-class crew may be got out of the Reserve which it has been a little the fashion of late to disparage. If the cruise suffices only to check the professional carpers at a force which is half commercial and half naval, it will justify Mr. CHILDERS' policy, for carping in such cases is as mischievous as genuine criticism is useful. There is always a certain element, in any body of professional fighters, distinguished by its prejudices against anything like civilian intrusion. Neither in the army nor the navy is it a large or influential section, and the navy may be congratulated on reproducing the obnoxious type even more rarely than the army does. It is a pity that our Volunteer soldiers cannot be taken out on an expedition analogous to this cruise of the Reserve. A fortnight's march would perhaps teach them and their critics a great deal which both are now in need of learning, and we have no doubt that the broad result would be as creditable to the civilian soldiers as the recent cruise has been to civilian sailors. We hope, now that the plan has once been successfully tried, that it will be part of the annual programme of the Admiralty, and that in the course of a few years nearly the whole of the Reserve force will have been passed under review, and taught a practical lesson in the duties which they have undertaken.

THE BELFAST MEETING.

ONE is almost disposed to think that the recent translation of O'CONNELL's mortal relics has been accompanied by a transmigration of his spirit. In nova fert animus; we must chronicle a metempsychosis; and Mr. JOHNSTON, the Ulster Orangeman, is, according to his friends and audience, going to revive not only the last great agitator, but something more considerable and ancient, and, what is more to the purpose, more successful. The Rev. HENRY HENDERSON, at the late Orange meeting at Belfast over which Mr. JOHNSTON presided, sees in the occasion a necessity for reviving the old Scottish Covenant, and, while remarking that Protestants were loyal, he ballasted the avowal with a hint that loyalty has its limits. This indirect and clerical suggestion of rebellion was expanded by a bolder voice, that of an anonymous layman, who exclaimed, "We will make "JOHNSTON another CROMWELL, and kick out the Parliament." The Rev. Dr. BAYLEE blesses by anticipation the coming rebellion, and does not scruple to take a good thing, though it comes from the Devil's hands. Some liberated Fenian, it appears, in the pretty grateful way of his kind, had said that "many of the battle-trained children of Ireland"—trained, if anywhere, in SMITH O'BRIEN's cabbage garden—"would rise up and strike down another foe," meaning England. "GOD grant it!" piously ejaculated the Rev. Dr. BAYLEE of Monaghan. With the exception of Major-General DOBBS—who, being a soldier, perhaps knows what civil war is, and therefore said nothing about fighting—a very bellicose feeling was generally displayed by the orators at Belfast. If Mr. ENGLISH invoked "the principles of Derry, "Aughrim, Enniskillen, and the Boyne," Mr. MACRORY, who did credit to his sonorous name, goes further to the root of the matter, and appeals to the more substantial sieges and battles and blood of those sweet memories. The Repeal of the Union, it seemed to be assumed, would and ought to follow —and one of the resolutions declared this openly—as a matter of course, from the passing of Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill. The existing disaffection of the South is to be helped by a future and complementary disaffection of the North; and, as far as we can make head or tail out of the Belfast programme, it seems to hint at an understanding, if not a union, between Fenians and Orangemen, and a common cause against the integrity of the British Empire.

There is nothing much to be surprised at in all this. It is Dean McNEILE's talk about the Canon Law translated into the language of the stump. Much the same violent sentiment, though not in language quite so offensive, was delivered by Lord HARROWBY at Birmingham a day or two ago. In England it is the old No Popery howl; in Ireland it is the last shriek of Protestant ascendency. The Ulster meeting, with its eighty, or a hundred, thousand of auditors, represents the thing, the system, which the Government measure means to put down. And on both sides the significance of the occasion is understood. One of the speakers was explicit enough on the only point worth his or anybody else's consideration. "They "would not profess themselves satisfied with any tinkering of "the Bill. They did not propose the acceptance of terms to "the House of Lords. Nothing but the absolute rejec- "tion of the Bill would satisfy them." Nor, in fact, would this satisfy them. The repeal of the Emancipation Act, and the revival of the old Reign of Terror and proscription, is what the Ulster Protestants want. And nothing short of this ought to satisfy them. Glebe houses and glebe lands they pronounce to be a shallow bribe. The two things, Protestantism and Romanism, cannot stand side by side. If one is up, the other must be down. They demand a new "crusade"; it is their own word. They forecast on the authority of some ancient prophesy, dating in the year '99, a blessed era when Protestantism is to overrun the land. Ulster was colonized to extirpate Popery; the whole of Ireland must be Ulsterized, and of course by the same good old means. This is good, sound, orthodox Orangeism, though at this time of day it suggests rather a sucked orange than any other condition of the historical fruit. It is not our business to remind the Belfast orators that all this is to play into Mr. GLADSTONE's hands. This is precisely what he wants. The PREMIER's argument is that Protestant ascendency and the dear delight of trampling down an enemy is not dead, and those who cheer Mr. JOHNSTON, and look forward to another Cromwellian raid, go very far to justify him. Lord HARROWBY even goes so far as to complain indirectly of the interference of the magistrates with MURPHY's mobs. Now, it is not our affair to point out how irretrievably this sort of menace and bluster damages the policy, supposing that a policy has been arrived at by the Opposition, which in some form or other must be attempted in the House of Lords. The last declaration of the intentions of the Lords, announced in what, for lack of another, we must style the Opposition organ, will be very displeasing to the Belfast Protestants. It is neither "expected nor desired that the Lords should reject the Bill." Its principle has been decided by an invincible and overwhelming majority of the constituencies. Even the Standard admits this, and then goes on to argue that "An overwhelm- "ing majority of the Lower House, and the antecedent ap- "proval of the country," these are not things to be opposed, and "in the end the Lords must yield to the pronounced "will of the nation." Even the second reading must be permitted; but, then, what the nation has pronounced about is the simple, single fact of "disestablishment and disendowment of "such parts of its revenues as the Irish Church holds in virtue "of its establishment." And it is added, we suppose on authority, that there are some amendments not essential to the principles of the Bill which the Lords must insist on. We may as well name them. The bonus left to the disestablished Church must be capitalized. This is the first point; and the second is, that the glebes of Ulster cannot be left to the Church, for a very curious reason, because these lands were given "to "the Church not as the Church of the State, but as the Church "of the Protestant settlers, and given on conditions which have "been fulfilled to the uttermost"—that is to say, that Protestantism has persecuted with all its powers as long as it could, and is quite ready and willing to persecute again, if the men of Ulster can get the chance. And, further, the disestablished body ought to have the same unlimited right of holding land with the Romanists. We shall not discuss these amendments; but, speaking summarily, it seems that the fight in the Lords is to turn upon what is meant by private endowments, and into an historical and archæological inquiry into the precise date at which the Irish Church as it is assumed its present character and esse—an inquiry precisely as futile as the date of the Reformation. Why for once we quote the Standard as a political organ, is to show that the Belfast decisions are directly in the teeth of the proposed policy of the Opposition. And this, at any rate, removes one difficulty. Lord DERBY and Lord CAIRNS cannot gird themselves to battle on the details of the Bill with much heart, when they are so very plainly assured by the only strong Irish party worth considering, that they will get no thanks or gratitude for their pains. It will be, or ought to be, once more a case of the traitor STANLEY, if Irish Protestantism will "not be satisfied with any tinkering of the Bill." The Bill will be passed tinkered or untinkered; but in either case, the Ulster Protestants will occupy precisely the same position towards the British Empire. This they have announced at Belfast. They have been robbed; they have been spoiled; their compact of union has been unjustly broken; henceforth they owe no allegiance to the Imperial Government other than Poland owes to Russia, or Venetia owed to Austria. Indeed, the Irish wrong is greater, because it is not only a political, but a religious, outrage and robbery. "A state of "irremediable chronic rebellion"—these are their own words —is what the Ulster men say must come of the passing of the Bill in any shape. And the Standard assures us that the Bill must be passed in some shape or other.

Had we not had some experience of the vanity of Irish talk, and did not some of us remember that precisely the same threats of rebellion, wars, and rumours of rising were used in nearly the same language at the passing of the Emancipation Act, we should say that there was something serious in this bluster and menace. And in a sense there is. To be sure neither the heads of the Irish Church nor the leaders of the forlorn hope in the Commons adopt this language, and every one of them was conspicuous by his absence from Belfast last Saturday. But with all this important abatement from the importance of the meeting, it shows that there are materials in the North of Ireland which may, if the right sort of demagogue can be developed by the present fermentation and seething, lead, not to anything so intelligible as an insurrection, but to a vast amount of ill-feeling. At present Government has got an argument, we do not say the strongest of arguments, but an argument to meet in the undoubted fact that the pacificatory measure does not seem likely to lead to peace. This is urged as to the present. But then as to the future, the Belfast meeting announces worse woes, and Ministers are met by the assurance that the pacificatory measure will only raise up Fenians of another description. The lesser and immediate evil the Government will say they can afford to disregard, and they will not be slow to avail themselves of the argument for passing the Bill whole and undiluted, that after all it is only opposed on principle by those who make no scruple of avowing their inchoate treason. A menace, however wild, of dismembering the Empire, and a threat, however tumid, uttered by a hundred thousand men, who can, and not after dinner, lick their lips at the thought of a state of irremediable chronic rebellion, is just the thing to set our backs up. The apparent apathy of the Irish Protestants helped Mr. GLADSTONE much, but even this apathy admitted of two constructions. This last and sudden outbreak of Orangeism will help him much more, for it can have but one meaning.

THE COURSE OF EMIGRATION TO AMERICA.

WE are frequently treated to speculations upon the probable future of the population of America. Will the United States break to pieces sooner or later under their own weight, or will they spread north and south till they include everything from the Polar regions to the Isthmus of Panama? What will be the character and the political institutions of the vast population which in all probability will fill what is still known as the West, but will soon be the central region of North America? Prophecy on such matters is notoriously as unsatisfactory as it is tempting. Everybody likes to have an opinion as to what will happen a century or so hence, because there is no chance of his being confuted at present, and very little chance that any one will take the trouble to confute him after he is dead. The future supplies an unlimited fund of consolation for all who have stumbled in their calculations as to the present. We would by no means deter any one from so harmless an amusement. Americans derive infinite pleasure from calculating the numbers of the vast multitudes who for uncounted centuries are to listen to Fourth of July orations in the broad valley of the Mississippi, whilst their detractors may count up the many obstacles that oppose the realization of such a dream. Others may be content with a humbler task, which is not without its pleasures—that, namely, of showing that nobody knows very much about the matter. When we can't blow bubbles for ourselves it affords a gentle amusement to puncture those raised by our friends. It is indeed easy to prove that many elements must be taken into account in forming the horoscope of America, upon which it is simply impossible to arrive at any accurate judgment. One of these is the future of the emigration from Europe. No one can tell with any approach to certainty what will be its character or its influence. Will the Americans of the future descend chiefly from an English, an Irish, or a German parentage? Will the negro survive and multiply, or will he have to struggle, not only against the American, but against a Chinese population? Can the native population hold its own, and is there any, and what, truth in the allegations that have been made of its stationary or even declining powers of reproduction in comparison with the incoming races? Will the national type of the different constituents of the population be preserved or blended into one, and will they gravitate towards different centres or interpenetrate each other throughout the country? To all these and many similar questions we can only answer, that nobody can speak with any confidence, and that a very large experience will be necessary before any degree of certainty is reached.

Thus, for example, some curious results have been lately stated in regard to emigration. It is generally said that the New England population, up to the time of the Declaration of Independence, were almost as pure a race as the inhabitants of the Mother-country. Indeed Americans, who do not often fail on the side of moderation of statement, occasionally declare that they not only spoke better English, but were more genuine Englishmen. However this may have been, the tables have been strangly turned. Up to the time of the war the immigration was reckoned at about 5,000,000, half of which came from the British islands—the great majority of this half being Irishmen, and the larger proportion of the remainder from Germany. The immigrants, together with their descendants, formed at least a quarter of the whole white population. The war only acted as a very slight check upon the influx of foreigners, which has since continued with unabated energy. There is, however, a marked change in the character of the immigration. The year 1854 was the first in which the German immigrants exceeded the Irish, and they maintained their superiority for some years. During the war the Germans fell off and the Irish increased; since that time it seems that the German element has again taken the lead. Last year, according to the most recent statement we have seen, the Germans formed about half, and the Irish only a quarter, of the whole; and, which is also worth noticing, the great majority came from Protestant districts. The Scandinavian races send a considerable contingent, and the English immigration has also increased. Any one who is acquainted accurately with all the statistics, and accurately appreciates the political, economical, and social condition of the various European races, possesses the materials from which some estimate may be made of the probable future of emigration. He will be able to say which of the rival constituents of the American population has the largest reserves to draw upon; whether Irishmen are likely to transport themselves, though not their island, some three thousand miles to the West, whether English artisans, as we might be disposed to infer from some recent manifestations at Preston and other manufacturing districts, are likely to follow the example of Irish peasants; and whether Hans Breitmann is likely to be reinforced by some millions of devotees of lager-bier and the Infinite; and, on the other hand, whether American principles of commerce and taxation may prove to exercise a deterrent influence. It is remarkable, indeed, that these zealous Protectionists are resolved, in the interest of the labouring classes, to protect everything except labour. In order, as they declare, to prevent the American labourer from sinking to the level of his depressed brother in Europe, they hamper their own power of production, and allow any amount of paupers to be imported. This intelligent policy may ultimately check emigration by diminishing the demand for labour; but it is scarcely possible that the most perverse ingenuity can permanently injure the attractions of their vast natural resources. In all probability, a great immigration will continue, though it is more difficult to guess at its composition, or to determine its effect upon the American character. One or two points, however, may be worth noticing.

In the first place, the rapidity with which Americans have developed a distinctive national type is a very remarkable phenomenon. If the New England population was really as homogeneous as is said—and it certainly appears, on their own showing, that every true Yankee had an ancestor on board the Mayflower, who also left a piece of furniture to his descendants by way of ocular proof of the fact—this is far from holding good of the population of the other States. Dutch and Swedes and Germans and Huguenots have mixed with every variety of British subject to form the groundwork of the population. Yet, in spite of many minor differences, there is no more pronounced national type than the American. We recognise him at a glance in any European country with a certainty which is scarcely so great in the case of any other people. If his outward appearance is not sufficiently distinctive, a few words are enough to betray him. It is singular, indeed, that a people drawn from such heterogeneous sources should have, as its characteristic weakness, a want of individuality, and a too close resemblance among the different units of the mass. It seems to imply that the circumstances in which a people is placed may have more influence than their hereditary peculiarities. Some eccentric theorists have imagined that the imported population derives a certain local colour from the soil, and that the Americans show certain symptoms of conforming to the Red Indian type. It may be said with more plausibility that the climate has a great influence in producing that peculiar variety of lanky and sallow humanity which our caricaturists delight in picturing. Undoubtedly the ruddy and succulent Englishman or German is rapidly parched into a different being by the extremes of American climate. Many moral causes, however, conspire in the same direction. Many of the Western States have received, if not the mass of their population, at least the most intelligent and active part of it, from New England. The infusion has leavened the whole mass, and the descendants of the Puritans have acted as the schoolmasters and political teachers of the rising generation. The enormous emigration of the last twenty years has, however, altered the conditions. In such towns as New York and Philadelphia there are huge lumps of a foreign population which has not as yet been melted down. Rural districts are to be found where the inhabitants are exclusively German or Swedish or Welsh. In many of the Western towns the German traveller may walk down whole streets, and fancy himself back in Fatherland. Is the assimilating power of the native population sufficient to absorb these foreign elements without being materially altered in the process? The better part of the German emigration consists of a singularly tenacious and plodding race, who take a very firm root in the land. Is it not possible that they may act upon the more vivacious and volatile Yankee at least as forcibly as he acts upon them? To add a strong infusion of the Teutonic element would remind one of pouring beer into a gin cocktail. The result of such an experiment is being tried on a large scale; and to all appearance it is likely to be continued for some time to come. When the emigrants were scattered widely over a large surface, they would easily conform to the manners and customs of the natives. Now that they form large isolated masses, it is scarcely possible that they should not produce a more marked influence. At the same time, the population of the States is now so large, and has assumed so marked a character, that a much greater immigration than formerly would be required to produce an equal effect. The inflowing stream bears a constantly decreasing proportion to the reservoir into which it is poured. Some of the large towns are to a great extent swamped by the Irish population; but the predominant element of the nation is as unmistakeably as ever the native American.

Another curious influence of the emigration is upon the religions of the country. The city government of New York is so exclusively under Irish and Roman Catholic control, that it gives away land to Roman Catholic churches, and favours the attempts of the priests to interfere with the system of education. It has even been asserted, with some appearance of truth, that the next great difficulty ahead will be a religious quarrel; and that the parties, instead of being Free-trade and Protectionist, or divided by their views of slavery, will be distinguished by their sympathies with different religious sects. The separation of Church and State has hitherto prevented any such disputes from affecting politics; but it does not follow that such antagonistic elements will not contrive to find some battle-ground for their natural animosities. The recent change in the character of the emigration, if it continues, would deprive the Roman Catholics of the principal source from which they have hitherto drawn fresh recruits, and would tend to postpone the anticipated difficulty. Germans, for the most part, take such matters pretty easily; and it is said that there are whole districts in the West, inhabited by Germans, where the population is respectable, quiet, and well-educated, but which have simply no churches or clergy of any description whatever. To pronounce any distinct opinion upon the probable religious future of the United States would be to claim the gift of prophecy; but any one would write a singularly interesting book who should do what Mr. Hepworth Dixon failed to do, and, instead of giving us the eccentricities of a few isolated communities, give us some real information as to the growth and relative influence of the great religious bodies amongst which America is divided.

The influence of emigration upon these and other questions opens many curious subjects of speculation, at which we cannot even hint. Meanwhile it may serve to remind us how many important changes are going on, as it were, surreptitiously, to which our attention is seldom called, and whose real influence it is almost impossible to unravel. We hear a great deal about the ups and downs of party struggles, and the rival merits of successive Presidents; but the silent action of the great movements of the population may be producing changes in comparison with which the temporary ascendency of Republicans or Democrats is a matter of little importance. To mention only one other circumstance, there is much to be said of the possible influence of the new Pacific Railway. The Chinese, it is said, are so frugal and hardworking as to cut out all rival populations. China contains, as we constantly say in figures whose significance we seldom realize, a third of the population of the globe. It is now brought close to the greatest field for labour in the world. Who can say what the consequences may be?

SPHINXES.

THERE are people to whom mystery is the very breath of life, the main element of their existence; without which they are mere insignificant nothings, while by its aid they are magnified into vague and awful potentialities. They are people who take the Sphinx for their model, and, like her, speak darkly and in parables; making secrets of every-day matters patent to the whole world in their simplicity, but which, by the magic of enigmatic handling, become riddles which the curious would give their lives to unravel. Nothing with these people is confessed and above board, and nothing is shown openly so that you may look at it all round, and judge for yourself what it is like and what it is worth.

The utmost they do is to uncover just a corner of something they keep back in the bulk, tantalizing you with glimpses that bewilder and mislead; or they will dangle before you the end of a clue which they want you to take up and follow, making you believe that you will be guided thereby into the very heart of a mystery, and that you will find a treasure hidden in the centre of the maze which will abundantly repay you for the trouble of hunting it out. Nine times out of ten you will find nothing but a scarecrow of no more value than the rags of which it is composed—if even you find that. They are people who repeat to you the most trivial things you may have said years ago, and who remind you of the most unimportant events, all of which you have totally forgotten; but they will speak of them in a mysterious manner, as if they had been matters of vital meaning at the time—things which would open, if followed up, a page in your private history that it were better should be forgotten. As it is a question of memory, you cannot deny point-blank what they affirm; and as we all have pages of private history which we would rather not have read aloud at the market-cross, you are obliged to accept their highly suggestive recollections with a queer feeling of helplessness and being somehow in their power, not knowing how much they are really acquainted with your secret affairs, or whether the signal they have flashed before your eyes is a feint or a revelation. Of the same sort, with a difference, are those who are always going to tell you something some day—people burdened with a perennial mystery which never sees the light. You are for ever tormented with these folks' possibilities of knowledge. You turn over in your own mind every circumstance that you think they could have got hold of; you cunningly subject all your common friends to crafty cross-examination; you go, link by link, through the whole chain connecting you with them; but you can find nothing that leads to the mere outskirts of the mystery—you can make nothing of it; and your sphinx goes on to the end promising some day to tell you something which dies with him untold. Your only consolation is the inner conviction that there was nothing to tell after all.

Then there are sphinxes of a more personal kind—people who keep their affairs a profound secret from every one, who wash all their dirty linen scrupulously at home, and double-lock the door of the cupboard where the family skeleton lives. They are dungeons of silence, unfathomable abysses of reserve. You never know more of them, mind or estate, than what you can learn from the merest outside of things. Look back, and you cannot recollect that you have ever heard them speak of their family or of their early days; and you are not acquainted with a living soul with whom they are connected. You may visit them for years without knowing that such and such a friend is their cousin, or maybe their sister. If they are unmarried men, they have no address save at their club; and neither you nor their most intimate friends have an idea of where they sleep. For all you know to the contrary they may be married, with a fine flourishing family snugly stowed away in some suburban villa, where perhaps they live under another name, or with the omission or addition of a title that effectually masks their real individuality. If this is their special manifestation of sphinxhood, they take as many precautions against being identified as a savage would do when out on a scouting expedition. They obliterate all traces of themselves as soon as they leave their office in the City, and take it as a terrible misfortune if the truth is ever discovered; though there is nothing disgraceful in their circumstances, and their wives and children are healthy and presentable. Most of us have been startled by the sudden discovery, in our own circle of friends, of the wife and children of some member of our society hitherto supposed to be a bachelor and unshackled. All the time that we have been joking him on his celibacy, and introducing him to various young ladies likely to make good wives if properly taught, he has been living in the holy estate a little way out of town, where he is at last stumbled on by some Œdipus who tells the secret to all the world, and blows the mystery to the winds. We may be very sure that the officious Œdipus in question gets no thanks for his pains, and that the sphinx he has unmasked would rather have gone on living in congenial secrecy with his unacknowledged family in that remote suburban villa, than be forced into publicity and recognition; that leading two lives and personating two men, the one as imagined by his friends, the other as known to his belongings, was a kind of existence he liked infinitely better than the commonplace respectability of being en evidence throughout. With certain sphinxes, no one but the officials concerned ever knows what they have done, where they have served, or what laurels they have gained. It comes out quite by accident that they were in the Crimea, where, like Jack Poyntz in School, they were heroes in their own way, though they don't talk about it; or that they performed prodigies of valour in the Indian Mutiny and obtained the Victoria Cross, which they never wear. This kind has at least the merit of being unboastful, keeping their virtues hidden, like the temple which the sphinx held between her paws, and to which only those had access who knew the secret of the way. But though it is hateful to hear a man blowing his own trumpet in season and out of season, yet it is pleasant to know the good deeds of one's neighbours, and to have the power of admiring what is worthy of admiration. Besides, modesty and mystery are not the same things, and there is a mean to be found between the secrecy of a sphinx making riddles of the most commonplace matters, and the cackle of a hen when she has laid an egg for the baby's breakfast.

The monetary or financial sphinx is one of the oddest of the whole tribe, and quite one of the most mysterious. There are people who live on notoriously small incomes; such as the widows, say, of naval or military men, whose pensions are printed in blue-books, and of whose yearly receipts therefore the world can take exact cognisance; yet who dress in velvet and satin, and go about perpetually in cabs and hired carriages, and are never without money to spend, though always complaining of poverty. How these financial sphinxes manage surpasses the understanding of every one; and by what royal road they arrive at the power of making two do the work of four is hidden from the ordinary believers in Cocker. You know their ostensible income; indeed, they themselves put it at so much; but they keep up a magnificent appearance on a less sum than that on which you go shabby and dilapidated. When you ask them how it is done, they answer, "by management." Anything can be done by management, they say, by those who have the gift; which you feel to be the utterance of the sphinx—a dark saying to which you have not the key. You calculate to the best of your ability, and you know that you are sound in your arithmetic; but, do what you will, you can never come to the rule by which five hundred a year can be made to compass the expenditure of a thousand. If you whisper secret supplies, concealed resources, your sphinx will not so much as wink her eyelid. How she contrives to make her ostensible five hundred do the work of a thousand, how she gets velvet and satin for the value of cotton and stuff, and, though always complaining of poverty, keeps unfailingly flush of cash—how all this is done is her secret, and she holds it sacred; and you may be quite sure of one thing—it is a secret she will never share with you or any one else.

The rapidly-working littérateur is another sphinx worth studying as a curiosity—we might say, indeed, a living miracle. There he stands, a jovial, self-indulgent, and enjoying man, out in society every night in the week; by no means abstinent from champagne, and as little given to early rising as he is to consumption of the midnight oil. But he gets through a mass of work which would be respectable in a mere copyist, and which is little less than miraculous in an original producer. How he thinks, when he finds time to make up his plots, to work out his characters, even to correct his proofs, are riddles unanswerable to all his friends. He must write faster than any living man has ever been known to write, taking the mere mechanical act alone, to get through all that goes under his name. And when is it done? Literary sphinxes of this kind go about unchallenged; indeed, they are very much about, and to be beheld everywhere; and one looks at them with respect, not knowing of what material they are made, or of what mysterious gifts they are the possessors. Novels, plays, essays, poems, come pouring forth in never slackening supply; the railway stations and all hoardings are made gorgeous by the announcement of their feats set out in red and blue and yellow; no sooner has one blaze of triumph burnt itself out than another blaze of triumph flares up; and nothing but death or a rich inheritance seems likely to stop their mysterious fecundity. How is it done? That is the secret of the literary sphinx, to which the admiring and amazed brotherhood is anxiously seeking some clue, but up to the present hour it has been kept jealously guarded, and no solution has been arrived at. There is another form of the literary sphinx in the "Nobodies" and "Anons" who speak from out the darkness, and let no man see whence the voice proceeds. They are generally tracked to their lair sooner or later, and the sphinx's head turns out to be only a pasteboard mask, behind which they hid themselves for a while, working much amazement among the wondering crowd while the clasps held good, but losing something of their fervid worship when the reality became known. Others, again, have kept their true abode hidden and their name a mystery still, though there be some who swear they have traced the footsteps, and know exactly where the sphinx lives, and what is the name upon his frontlet, and of what race and complexion he is without his mask. It may be so; but as every discoverer has a track of his own and a name of his own, and as each swears that his sphinx is the real one, and no other, the choice among so many becomes a service of difficulty; and perhaps the wisest thing to do is to suspend judgment until the sphinx of the day chooses to reveal himself by the prosaic means of a title-page, with his name as author printed thereon, and his place of abode jotted down at the foot of the preface.

THE VICEROY OF EGYPT'S VISIT.

THE Viceroy of Egypt must be extremely fond of travelling, or extremely forgetful of slights. He is again making a tour among the great capitals of Europe, and his experience of 1867 has not induced him to omit London from his list of stopping-places. Englishmen, it may be hoped, will have longer memories, and will recall how the inattention of those charged with dispensing the hospitality of the nation, and the almost contemporaneous arrival of his nominal suzerain, combined to reduce his visit to a level of melancholy commonplace. Nothing but the intervention of an accidental peer saved us from the disgrace of allowing our guest to go to an inn, like a traveller who has neither friends nor interests in the people among which he finds himself. His reception at Windsor, though it was so far superior to that accorded to the Sultan that he was provided with a dinner and a bed, whereas the Sultan had to content himself with a luncheon, was entirely devoid of all the pomp and circumstance which befits an occasion of this sort. The loan of a royal carriage or two did save him the necessity of paying his own cab-hire during his stay, and, when this has been said, the catalogue of our national courtesies is pretty well exhausted. He was caught, of course, by the enterprising conductors of the Crystal Palace, and used as a decoy to resuscitate the waning glories of the Dramatic College Fête, and this was perhaps the nearest approach that was made to anything like a public welcome. It is some satisfaction to remember that our shortcomings in this respect awoke some little shame in us even at the time. And lately, when the Viceroy has been entertaining the Prince of Wales after such a very different fashion, Englishmen have probably looked back with real regret to the opportunity which was missed two years ago. Feelings of this kind, however, are extremely evanescent, and unless some care is taken to fix them, June, 1869, may give rise to just as many regrets as July, 1867. If it does, we shall not have a third chance afforded us. The most long-suffering of guests will hardly care to be snubbed three times running.

It is probably useless to hope that Her Majesty will remember on this occasion that she is Queen of England as well as the widow of the Prince Consort. And yet, if the fact that she bears this twofold character could by any means be brought home to her, it might really exercise an appreciable influence on the reputation of this country abroad. From various causes, foreigners have almost ceased to remember that there is such a Power as Great Britain. England still counts for a good deal in mercantile calculations, but, except in houses of business, it is difficult to give any reason why its existence should be kept in mind. The theories of foreign policy which English statesmen have persistently preached for some years have led Continental politicians to treat with entire indifference the opinion of this country on questions of peace and war; and the state of suspended animation in which the Court has been living has been fatal to that pageantry which sometimes creates in the multitude the respect and consideration which statesmanship procured from the wiser few. Ordinarily speaking, a nation can only assert itself through its Sovereign. Royal hospitalities have a corporate character which attaches to no substitute; and, however active the Prince of Wales may show himself in supplying the Queen's place, England cannot be represented to the same extent by the heir as by the occupant of the throne. A theory was started, at the time of the Sultan's visit, that the warmth of his welcome by the populace was in some sort a compensation for the cold comfort vouchsafed to him at the palace, and it is by no means improbable that the cheers which greeted him wherever he appeared in public were intended, consciously or unconsciously, to discharge this function. But a makeshift of this kind is open to one serious objection. It is very apt to be taken as meaning a great deal more than it does. The courtesies of crowned heads are of a strictly formal character. They are measured by rule and compass, and they commit those who offer them to nothing beyond. The significance of a popular demonstration cannot be thus rigidly determined, and consequently there is always a danger that the object of it may hereafter be tempted to rely upon the material support of the nation which has given him a tumultuous and spontaneous welcome. If the Sultan left England under no delusion of this kind, it certainly was not the fault of the daily newspapers. It follows from all this, that the absence of the Queen from London on the occasion of a foreign Sovereign's visit is a loss which, whether it be great or little, does not admit of being repaired. We have never cared to swell the wail of regret which is annually raised by a few fashionable tradesmen because Her Majesty does not make it her first concern that they should have every opportunity of swelling their customers' bills. But entertainment of such visitors as the Viceroy of Egypt is as distinctly a part of her position as presiding at meetings of the Privy Council, or affixing her signature to State papers. It is one of those representative acts which can only be adequately performed by the Sovereign. We are aware, of course, that physical inability to do what is required has been pleaded on Her Majesty's behalf, and certainly no one would be so unreasonable as to desire the Queen to injure her health or seriously to interfere with her comfort. But it is not necessary that a hostess should be more with her visitors than is consistent with due regard to both these considerations. One or two ceremonial entertainments, from which the Queen might retire as soon as she felt inclined, would be sufficient to mark the fact that the Viceroy of Egypt was really her guest. There is all the difference in the world between staying at a house when the owner is at the other end of the island, and staying at a house when the host is obliged to go to his own room directly after dinner.

Supposing that the Queen does not herself bear any part in the reception of the Viceroy, we may still hope that something more will be done than it was thought necessary to attempt last time. A ball can hardly possess much interest for a Sovereign who does not dance, but the spectacle which was got up at the India House in honour of the Sultan was so unusually creditable to English taste that we could hardly do better than repeat it in honour of his great vassal. It will not be necessary to reproduce that singular chain of reasoning by which the Mahommedanism of the guest was adduced as a ground for saddling the revenues of India with the cost. The routine of State hospitality must always be wanting in variety, and, so far as a visitor can be enabled to consult his own tastes, with as little parade as possible, it will be only civil to allow him to do so. The needless multiplication of addresses and presentations is eminently productive of weariness in the victim, while, at the same time, it is wholly wanting in that ceremonial magnificence which is the fitting accompaniment of national displays. Where this last element can be introduced at all, the authorities will do well to be careful that it is introduced in proper proportion. The too common error of English pageants is that a very little splendour is made to go such a very long way. Nor is it desirable that the Viceroy should be too much left to the mercy of private entertainers. The ordinary hospitality of the palace may be appropriately supplemented by a few high officials; and if these are provided in sufficient abundance, there will be no need again to make him an advertisement for a very superior music-hall.

It may be objected, perhaps, that all this will be nothing better than so much unnecessary trouble. If the Viceroy of Egypt chooses to come to London, why should he not be allowed to do so without any further preparation than is involved in setting aside an empty house for his accommodation? We have already given an incidental answer to this inquiry. No Power can afford to disregard the good opinion of its neighbours, and, if it is not to do so, it must pay some attention to outside show. No doubt, it is not the highest way in which national greatness can be made manifest to the world, but so long as it is kept within due bounds, it has a place and purpose of its own. Something of the position which France has attained under Napoleon III. must be attributed to the care with which he has kept this fact in mind, and though an ancient monarchy may obtain a similar result on very much easier terms than an upstart Empire, it cannot afford entirely to despise such expedients. Some regard to the proprieties of life is required from nations as well as from individuals. In the present case there are special reasons which point in the same direction. No man is insensible to the fact that his host is treating him with all the respect he has it in his power to show, and an Oriental is not likely to be less alive to this fact than a European. He is accustomed to see hospitality very accurately measured out, and he will be sure to draw his conclusion as to the estimate in which he is held by England from the amount of respect which is shown him by the English Government. At Paris, where the Viceroy will stay before coming on to London, this natural tendency will be carefully taken into account. He is probably too shrewd a politician not to be aware that France has her own ends to promote in Egypt, and that the courtesies shown him will be far from being wholly disinterested. But every day's experience may teach us that men are largely influenced by attentions which, theoretically, they are quite sharp enough to see through. There is no need for us to disguise either from ourselves or from our guest that the goodwill of the ruler of Egypt is an object of considerable importance to Great Britain, as well on political as on commercial grounds.

THE COUNCIL OF DEANS.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has been holding an assembly which we believe has no parallel in ecclesiastical history. For that reason it has no title in ecclesiastical law; but we conceive that our forefathers would have called it a Decanagemót. He gathered together all the Deans that could be conveniently got together, to discuss matters interesting at once to present Deans and to an Archbishop who once was a Dean. Now in the popular mind there is something mysterious in the nature and office of Dean, and it is therefore not wonderful that a sevenfold degree of such mystery should attach to a body of Deans gathered together into one place. The Deans met; the Deans took counsel; but what sort of counsel did they take? We trust that it was rede and not unrede; but we do not know. Several newspapers reported their proceedings—as we are talking of an ecclesiastical Council, we suppose we should say their Acts—but no two newspapers reported them in the same way; one paper writes to contradict another, and Dean after Dean writes to contradict them all. What happened, then, we do not know, but we know what ought to have happened. And from the character of some of the party assembled we can fairly guess what did happen. There were Deans there who ought to be Deans, and Deans who ought not; Deans who understand the capitular system, and Deans who do not; Deans who are anxious for reform, and Deans to whom dignity and abuses are precious. The Dean of Canterbury writes to say that he did not say what the newspapers said that he said, but he does not tell us exactly what he did say. But if he said only what he said some time back in the Contemporary Review, it is much the same as when Bishop Berkeley said there was no matter—in other words, 'twas no matter what he said. These last questions, however, would seem rather to come under the province of the Dean of Saint Paul's, and may account for the overwhelming amount of labour under which Dr. Mansel—so the newspapers say—professed to be labouring. To explore the Final Cause of Cardinals, or to set forth the Objective Existence of Archetypal Residentiaries, would be worthy of the philosopher who so easily turned at Lord Derby's bidding from the exposition of heathen to that of Christian morals. The Dean of Westminster too was there, perhaps to persuade his brethren that his collegiate church is really a "metropolitan cathedral." Some of the order indeed shone by their absence. Carlisle sent its capitular chief; but his fellow of Ripon was no doubt more seriously occupied for the public good. Some other absentees might be regretted. A voice from Lincoln or from Wells might not have been useless to explain the practical working of that overflowing energy which seeks rest only in the alternation of labour, and which contrives, no doubt effectively, to discharge accumulated duties which to men of less superhuman vigour might seem incompatible. But we should seriously like to know what was said by men who really knew what they were talking of, men who know their duty in theory and who carry it out in practice, who have shown that an English cathedral need not be a dead and lifeless institution nor its chief stall a mischievous sinecure. We should like to know what the Deans of Chichester and Ely found to say to their assembled brethren. As we do not know what they did say, we can only take up our parable a bit for ourselves. Though we know of no reason to suppose that any such measure as is said to have been talked of is really designed by the present Government, yet the Deans do well to set their houses in order, as one can hardly doubt that further legislation on the subject of cathedral establishments must come sooner or later. No party can be satisfied with things as they are. The Act of thirty years back did not go far enough in the way of mere havoc and revolution for the lovers of mere havoc and revolution. And for those who seek not havoc or revolution, but to reform institutions according to their original principles, that Act gave hardly more comfort; indeed it gave positive dissatisfaction. A few abuses it did reform; others it only made worse. Speaking roughly, it reformed the Deans, but did very little to reform the Canons. A Dean now can very seldom contrive to be a non-resident pluralist keeping away from his cathedral. The thing may be done if a man tries hard, but it needs a twisting of the law and a defiance of public opinion of which but few men are capable. The character of ecclesiastical dignitaries has certainly risen; it is only now and then that we find Deans shameless enough to pervert the trust of capitular patronage to their own enrichment, or ingenious enough to turn each of several incongruous offices into excuses for neglecting the others. Such relics of a past state of things must gradually die off. A Dean who has any respect for law and decency cannot now repeat the scandalous tricks of other days. The law in fact is not much to be blamed. What is wanted is greater care in those who make Deans. As it is, a Dean is seldom appointed because he is likely to make a good Dean. A conscientious Minister uses the post as a reward for a man who has done some good service in some other way. An unconscientious Minister uses it to satisfy some electioneering agent, some brawling partisan, some kinsman of a man in power. Neither looks out for a man who is really likely to discharge this particular office effectively. Some of our Deans turn out exceedingly well; but they turn out well by haphazard. But, to make sure of having all our Deans like the better members of the order, they ought to be chosen, not because of the services which they have done in some other way, but because of the services which they are likely to do in this particular way.

With regard, then, to the Deans themselves there is little need for legislation. With regard to the residentiary Canons and to the general constitution of the Chapters there is great need. First and foremost, every residentiary Canon must be forbidden to hold any other benefice with his Canonry; and if his Canonry is not of sufficient value to get the highest available capacity, it ought to be made so. The three months' residence prescribed by law is simply absurd. A man who comes for three months only had better stay away altogether. He has time to do a good deal of mischief, but he has time to do very little good. He cannot identify himself with the cathedral or devote himself thoroughly to its peculiar duties. His residence is a mere interruption to, or relaxation from, other duties elsewhere. As for the present numbers of the residentiaries, we do not see the need for any reduction. We believe that five clergymen of the character of which a Dean and residentiary Canons ought to be could easily be found for every cathedral in England. But if we had to choose between twelve, six, or four men keeping sham residence, and three, two, or one keeping real residence, we should choose the latter without a moment's doubt.

The question of income ought to be no difficulty. The incomes of residentiary stalls vary greatly in different churches. It is possible that it might be well to increase the income in some churches and to decrease it in others. But the incomes of Residentiaries everywhere range with those of the richer and not the poorer parochial benefices. A clergyman commonly thinks himself lucky if he gets a living ranging from 500*l.* to 1,000*l.* a year, which, with a few exceptions each way, is the range of residentiary incomes. If the foolish notion about "dignity" and such like be cast aside, there is no reason why a residentiary Canon should be richer than a Rector.

Let Canons only be chosen well; let them be men of zeal, men of learning, men so chosen that each capitular body can supply every want in the way of preaching, of ecclesiastical knowledge, of help in every diocesan object, that the city and diocese can need, and people will learn that their offices are not useless. A body of this kind, a body of clergymen of a superior class, forming a centre of enlightenment to the diocese, and keeping up the mother Church as the model for all others, as the ecclesiastical home of every man in the diocese, is undoubtedly worth keeping up. But then, in order to keep it up, it must be understood that in appointing to a residentiary stall a Bishop or a Minister is not simply putting a thousand a year, or whatever it may be, into the pocket of some friend or supporter, but that he is appointing to an office of real moment to the diocese and to the Church in general. The shameless appointments made by Mr. Disraeli were enough to bring the whole thing into discredit. Stalls at Worcester and Westminster, instead of being given to men of learning or men likely to make themselves useful in any way, were wasted on Oxford Heads, men of no sort of distinction and already gorged with preferment, as mere wages of electioneering services. Mr. Gladstone acted on quite another principle when he placed so profound a theologian as Mr. Mozley in a stall at Worcester. But a profound theologian in a stall at Worcester can be of little use if he has other conflicting duties in a distant diocese. And nothing but the lowest form of Court favour can account for the appointment of a clergyman prominent only in the Court Calendar to a late vacancy at Westminster.

In all cases, again, the cathedral must be delivered from the strange state of isolation or independence, or whatever it is to be called, into which our capitular bodies have gradually drifted. Our cathedrals have too often sunk into the private chapels of a small body of clergymen. They must stand out again, as in many places they are beginning to stand out, as the ecclesiastical centres of each diocese. The cathedral must again be the church of the Bishop and the church of his flock. The anomaly must be removed which in many places makes the Bishop less at home and vested with less authority in what is technically his own church than in any other church in his diocese. In the Old Foundations the non-residentiary Canons, a most valuable body of men, must, as we have often said, be restored to the position out of which they have been gradually driven. And we should say that the Honorary Canons of the New Foundation should be raised to something like the same position, instead of the utterly anomalous position which they hold now.

Lastly, in any legislation it must be remembered that each cathedral and collegiate church is an institution with an origin, a history, and a constitution of its own, and that no legislation can be good for anything which is not based on previous inquiry into the state of each church separately. Like the Colleges in Oxford and Cambridge, some general principles apply to all, but each church has its own peculiarities, which must be borne in mind in legislating for it. The reforms in points of detail which are needed in one place are not always the same as those which are needed in another. The great fault of the former legislation on the subject was that it was done by men who had the very best intentions, but who were utterly ignorant of the history and objects of the bodies for which they were legislating.

THE MORAL OF EPSOM.

A DEAF man at a theatre or an opera is believed to have a not unpleasant, if peculiar, satisfaction in witnessing what to him must be, in the strictest sense of the word, the spectacle. Something of a kindred sensation may well be credited to a looker-on at the Derby—not at the race itself, but on things in general connected with what the newspaper writers call our Isthmian game, our national festival and holiday, the flower of May, and all the rest of it. In the abstract there is nothing very remarkable about a horse-race in itself, nor, indeed, about a very first-rate horse-race in particular. A trial of speed between two or more four-footed beasts is but a natural and ordinary thing. There is, as those philosophers who like going into the root of the matter might say, a naturalness and à priori fitness in racing, be it of men, camels, or horses. Speed being an excellency of the animal, it is right and proper to develop speed, and all that belongs to speed, by every art of training. And human nature is so constituted that a struggle between fine natural powers, improved by skill, gives a real and by no means despicable pleasure to man. Horse-racing, as such, because it excites a natural emotion, is not unworthy of commendation. Admitting—which, by the way, is often admitted without much examination of the matter—that horse-racing has a manifest tendency to improve the breed of horses, we must be cynics or fanatics to make wry faces at the Derby. And if the Derby were a mere trial between some score of horses who since their noble birth had had a vast amount of pains and money spent on their education, who could complain? Then again we are not at all disposed to wax superbly moral on what those ingenious artists who do Epsom for the daily newspapers serve us up next morning as the Road, Race, the "Exodus," as they very oddly term it, after the race, and the humours of the course. The only fault to be found is the intolerable dulness and staleness of the whole funny story. It is so very vapid, so tediously monotonous, so extremely suggestive of the coldest of the second day's boiled cabbage. No fault, of course, in the ingenious artist who labours in his vocation; nothing to complain of in any contributor to the comic literature of the day, whether an hebdomadal or, as in this case, an annual joker of jokes. He pulls his face, and we laugh if we can. But somehow we can't laugh quite cheerily at Epsom. The horse-play of the day, like metaphorical horse-play, has an ugly suspicion of seriousness, and just a touch of hatred, malice, uncharitableness, and many another evil passion about it. The crowd, and the dust, and the irrepressible girls' school at Balham, and the excitements of Sutton, and the police in Epsom town, and Dorling's card, and the sea of heads, and the unavoidable dog, and the saddling, and the glint of colours, and Tattenham Corner, and the furze-bushes—it is all precisely as interesting as reading a page of logarithms, or repeating a recurring decimal a hundred times. All very true, very picturesque, very accurate, but overpoweringly dull. The favourite wins, though the more knowing ones wanted some other brute to win. Behold the triumph of skill, judgment, and tact! Or the favourite does not win. Behold the vanity of science and of human wishes; and see how fickle fortune delights to confound the wisdom of the wise, the knowingness of the knowing! Very trite, not to say philosophical, preaching, whichever way the race goes. But this is not all, nor half of all. This year we are congratulated, as though some strange thing had happened to the Turf, that the owner of the winning animal, and several other owners, too, are genuine sportsmen. As the Turf organs say, it was not a bookmakers' race; and then we hear of pronounced eulogiums on one owner's honest intentions, and of another owner's fairness in giving outsiders a chance. And there are contrasts between Mr. A.'s habit of scratching and Sir X.'s, another owner's, book, perhaps against himself, and this or that confederacy, and some late Lord's exceptional, and perhaps diseased idiosyncrasy, in not betting at all. And then, as bystanders, we feel not exactly puzzled, but, like the deaf man at the play, very intent indeed on what we see.

And what we see has its drawbacks. The Derby, we believe, is a mere shadow and phantom and show; the real thing is somewhere else. Pars minima est ipsa puella sui. The race itself is the least part of the real business. Supposing it to be a genuine bonâ fide affair—as it was, so everybody says, this year—we know nothing about its real significance by the mere fact that Pretender kept his head one yard in advance of some other fiery-footed steed. We hear of trials, and then we are told that those trials were, and that they are not always, genuine trials. And then we hear the results of these trials oozing out. Only the result is differently reported. And then we hear—some years, at least, we hear—of scratchings on the very eve of the race; that is to say, of withdrawing a horse, not because his chances are hopeless, but for the very reverse reason, because he may be, and often is, very likely to win; and also of private interest as against public interest; and of sales of favourites and non-favourites, judiciously, if sometimes unpleasantly, timed; and of prejudices against this or that horse, and of mysterious rises and falls in what is called the market; and over and above all towers the dim, impalpable, but most influential presence of something awful and impressive, called the leviathan book-maker, about whom we wonder in dull, stupid amazement, chequered with some regret and astonishment as we ask ourselves what that respectable beast mentioned in the Book of Job has ever done that he should be connected with a human being who looks, so far as we are favoured with any acquaintance with the calling, to be only a stupendous swindler and mere vulgar trader on the ignorance and stupid credulity of his kind.

And then comes the reckoning or settling day, and it is occasionally made a great boast that defaulters are not very numerous, or again, it is taken as a matter of course at Tattersall's, that this or that party was hard hit, or that such and such a confederacy were landed heavy winners, and so on. And then there are rumours, too often reduced to a certainty, of some noble house irretrievably ruined—some great historic name scandalously compromised—some Norman blood or Plantagenet peerage made a name of scorn, or contemptuous pity. Or, descending lower in the social scale, the police courts and Basinghall Street have their annals of the Derby, only they come out in the unpoetical form of embezzlement, and even robbing the till. This very day we are told of some poor devil of a coachman who cut his throat on Thursday because he could not pay his losings on Wednesday. While, at the same time, as though to complete the ugly process of disillusionizing, the very Dii majorum gentium, the Olympians of the Jockey Club, are at the direst feud on the most fundamental and cardinal point, the very essence of horse-racing—namely, whether racing as it is, is not only ruining the horse, by running raw and immature animals, but whether the whole thing is not a device for making money in the shortest possible time at the least possible risk to the producer of a mere marketable and venal commodity; that is to say, whether racing as it is, is not a commonplace sordid trade, even when not dishonourably engaged in, while it is notoriously a dishonest gambling as practised by what is called the Ring and the Turf.

These are not pleasant speculations, and they are calculated to take off some of the gloss of the Derby Day, and to dissipate something of the golden haze which conventionally gilds and glorifies the great national holiday. And it is not quite a sedative to these gloomy thoughts, to be told that these things are not necessary to racing, that time was when they were not, that racing and betting have no natural connexion. All which is quite true; but the fact is, that these things are, and that every year the thing goes on from bad to worse Sporting papers—for by a grim irony the thing still goes by the name of sport—increase, and so do sporting men; and so does the whole vast congeries of book-making, tips, prophets, welshers, sweeps, betting-houses, confederacies, parties, associates, agents, and investors, and Deptford Specs. A large—perhaps even a sensible—element of society is habitually and irretrievably demoralized by racing as it is, whatever racing as it ought to be, or racing as it might be, may be in the imagination of theorists. And so we are assured, and there are facts enough to prove it, that if a gentleman goes on the Turf—that is, engages in betting and book-making—it is simply impossible that he should escape without certain loss, and probable ruin—and for the best of reasons, because he is a gentleman; the arts of the Ring are reduced to a science and a law, but of this science the elements are, to a gentleman and an honourable man, simply impossible. He plays, and plays fairly and honestly; but the dice are loaded against him. This is, we fear, the real moral of the Derby. And though it is all very well to write affable hints to the crowds who throng the Epsom Downs not to be quite so drunken, brutal, indecent, cruel, vulgar, insolent, and rowdyish as they usually are, after all this is but scratching the very surface of the evil. The Derby day has more to answer for than the coarseness and license of the mob—the mob in mail phaetons, or the mob of cads and costers. It comes to this, that we have very nearly got to this stage of the matter, that a great national race, even the Derby or the St. Leger, can scarcely be separated in its results from a national disgrace and a social reproach.

THE ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the Royal Geographical Society suggests the remark that the sea is now better known than the land. The water has been so perseveringly explored that the President has nothing to say about maritime discoveries accomplished or anticipated, except in the Arctic Ocean, whereas the African expeditions of Baker, Grant, and Livingstone are discussed year after year with unfailing interest. It is rather more than four centuries ago that Portuguese ships began to feel their way slowly and cautiously along the western coast of Africa. Every bay and headland of Africa has been long since surveyed and mapped, but of the interior we knew until lately little more than the Portuguese did when they found the Cape called by them of Good Hope. And in capability of extending our knowledge we do not greatly surpass them, for they marched through Abyssinia without the elaborate preparation which we deemed necessary. It is, indeed, rather surprising to find that the Portuguese are credited, not only with boldness in exploring, but also with accuracy in making maps. The expectation is now abandoned of seeing Livingstone emerge on the east coast of Africa, but Sir R. Murchison looks for him on the west coast. He supposes him to have followed the waters which flow from the western side of the Lake Tanganyika to the sea, and he refers to a Portuguese map of the sixteenth century in proof that there are such waters. This map was undoubtedly constructed from information which Portuguese settlers on the coast derived, or supposed themselves to have derived, from native travellers. It corresponds more exactly than might have been expected with recent discoveries as to the position and magnitude of the great lakes of Africa, but we hope that the probability of Livingstone's return does not depend upon the truth of the representation in this map of a connexion between the river Congo, or Zaire, and the great lakes. The map, however, deserves the particular attention of geographers, for it shows the position of two lakes on the Equator, corresponding to the Victoria Nyanza and Albert Nyanza recently discovered, and also the position of another lake to the south, which may well serve for Lake Tanganyika. The book which contains this map was published at Rome in 1591, and it was founded on information supplied to the author by Duarte Lopes, a Portuguese who had resided several years in Congo. The interest of this book and its accompanying map, to the Geographical Society, is more easy to understand than its connexion with the question of the probable route of Livingstone.

As this country has ceased to send forth Arctic expeditions, the Geographical Society bestows the highest honour in its gift on Sweden. An expedition of last year attained the latitude 81° 42', the highest ever yet authentically recorded as attained by any ship. The Swedes are animated by the resolve to make further efforts, and if it be given to man to determine the real nature of the area around the North Pole, they are likely to achieve this honour. A scheme which was vainly pressed upon our Government has been undertaken by a member of the Society, who departed last month from the Clyde in a steam-yacht, with the intention of approaching nearer, if possible, to the North Pole than those who have preceded him. The gentleman who has gone on this adventurous cruise was a member of the last Parliament, and perhaps he may find the Arctic seas more agreeable than the House of Commons during a debate on the Irish Church. But it is hardly to be expected that an amateur will persevere so resolutely under hardships as to rival the great exploits of our professional seamen in Arctic waters. The determination to expend no more of the money of the nation upon Arctic enterprises is hardly likely to be altered while Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe are guardians of the Exchequer. But there will arise within a few years almost a necessity for Antarctic voyaging, in order to make preparation for observing the transits of Venus in 1874 and 1882 amid the difficult and comparatively unknown seas of the Southern Polar region. The advance which has been made in knowledge of the ocean generally within a century may be measured by the fact that an expedition sent into the Pacific to observe the transit of Venus in 1769 "has," in the words of the Astronomer-Royal, "been ever since esteemed one of the highest scientific glories of England in the last century." We cannot now get glory by sailing into the Pacific, but we can get that which is more profitable, guano. Groups of islands lying between America and Asia, thousands of miles from either continent, are now visited in the guano season by correspondents of the New York journals. It is not much more than a hundred years ago that Anson's voyage round Cape Horn to China was looked upon as wonderful, and now Chinamen cross the Pacific by thousands to settle in California. Lately, too, the completion of a railway across the continent of North America has made the shores of the Pacific accessible to London tourists. There still remain vast regions of South America unexplored, but, speaking generally, discovery is now possible only on land and in the Old World. The interior of Asia has lately become better known to Europeans through the combined operation of political and commercial causes. The frontier of China has retired, while that of Russia has advanced, and at the same time British trade has penetrated into countries hitherto inaccessible. A British tea-planter from Kangra has traversed the mountain-passes north of Leh, or Ladak, and has carried his caravan of merchandize into the Yarkand territory. As this is the first time that this success has been achieved, and as the region thus made accessible has been abandoned by the Chinese, it is inferred that our tea plantations of Hindustan may in future supply the inhabitants of the vast region formerly known as Chinese Tartary with tea, which, as Sir R. Murchison oddly says, "they have scarcely tasted since they threw off the Chinese yoke." As soon as trade is opened the process of exploration goes on rapidly, but there is hitherto no trade with the districts of Africa in which lie the great lakes, except that trade in slaves which Sir Samuel Baker is trying to abolish.

A large portion of Sir R. Murchison's address was occupied with geological discussion. We cannot help remarking that the discoveries of geologists, although of the highest possible importance, lack that popular interest which belongs to discoveries effected within the proper province of the Geographical Society. When Livingstone returns, as we trust he may, he will have a tale to tell which awakens the same kind of emotion as was felt by the citizens of San Lucar when the Vittoria anchored in that port, having gone forth on her voyage westward, and returning from the east. To Sebastian del Cano, who succeeded to the command of her after the death of Magalhaens, was given by the King of Spain for crest a globe, and for motto Primus circumdedisti me. Such an exploit can be performed but once, and there remains only to talk about it in after time. Yet it is not the fault of the existing Society that the ocean was so thoroughly explored before its time, any more than certain writers are to blame because Shakspeare thought of so many fine things before them. If the President and Secretary lament that they have no more discoveries to chronicle, there may be found, doubtless, in our navy, spirits who regret that they were not born before the Sea of Darkness had been illuminated in its most remote corners. The business of the present age is to complete the discoveries of the past by the application of more methodical processes and infinitely improved machinery of investigation. "The last Nile Expedition" has a value of its own, and although it is just possible that the excavations of the Suez Canal could have been performed by the same labour which erected the pyramids, it is not possible that these excavations could have been examined with the results stated by Professor Owen in any other age than this. He arrived at the remarkable conclusion, that "of fertile and habitable land Egypt is the most recent or last formed, and it is that which yields the most ancient evidences of social and civilized man." It may not be out of place to mention that the ancient Egyptians displayed, among other signs of civilization, an interest in geography; for one of their kings sent out a naval expedition from the Red Sea, which returned by the Mediterranean, having circumnavigated Africa, and it was from their priests that the Greeks derived the tradition of an island called Atlantis, opposite to the Pillars of Hercules, larger than Africa and Asia united, but which in one day and night was swallowed up by an earthquake and disappeared beneath the waters.

There is still plenty of work for every sailor and geographer in observing and recording details of ocean routes which were opened by those who lived before them. There is also ample field for interesting labours in the department of antiquarian geography, as we may call it, which has been so successfully explored by the Secretary of the Society. One product of his research is the map of Duarte Lopes, mentioned by the President. Another is the demonstration that Australia, with whose discovery we are accustomed to connect the name of Cook, or at furthest that of Dampier, was explored both on its eastern and western sides by the Portuguese. The Secretary has told us that "the knowledge of this fact lay dormant till the close of the last century, hidden in the testimony of some French manuscript maps, whose worth and importance, nay, even whose existence, appears to have been unrecognised till after the gallant Cook had completed his unrivalled series of explorations." The mention of the "insular continent" of Australia reminds us that there yet remains a field for terrestrial explorations, whence adventurous travellers may send home to future meetings of the Geographical Society narratives which shall gratify at once scientific and popular curiosity. It is remarkable that one of the early Portuguese accounts of Australia, which has been translated by the Secretary, is entitled, "Information about the Golden Chersonese." Yet until lately people who emigrated to Australia no more expected to find gold there than did a Scotchman expect to find it in his own country.

We part from the Geographical Society with the hope that it may be able to speak next year of new discoveries, and with the assurance that, if these fail, it will entertain us almost equally with discussion of the discoveries of bygone ages.

SCULPTURE IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

We interrupt the series of our notices of the Academy Pictures to speak of the sculpture in this year's Exhibition. Sculpture has never yet in England succeeded in obtaining equal honours with her sister art. Though the elder of the two, and by old confession the higher and the more intellectual, among us she has everywhere to yield the precedence to Painting. She hardly brings money to any of her followers, except through the prosaic practice of portraiture; her followers, with a few illustrious exceptions, are mostly untrained men, who in every point rank, and deserve to rank, below their brother painters; we must confess in sadness that they know little about her, and the British public, by a natural result, knows less. And nowhere, it is a notorious fact, has this apathy to Sculpture been more marked than it was in Trafalgar Square. The two series of cellars, and whatever, in pre-historic times, preceded them in Somerset House, are now, happily, things of the past. Those rooms, to the uninitiated, always seemed to have been constructed on purpose to allow the works of the three or four Academician sculptors to be tolerably seen, whilst the works of all outsiders were ingeniously doomed to a kind of limbo; exhibited, so far as the locality was concerned, but in every other respect worse than invisible. And when we look at certain names on the list of recent Academical sculptors, and compare their works with those which a few contemporaneous outsiders have produced, it would be absurd to wonder at an impulse which may have been only one of simple self-preservation.

However these things were, nunc tandem redit animus; and, in that splendid series of rooms which we owe to the wise liberality of the present Academy, Sculpture has at least found a handsome and an accessible habitation. Yet, even here, and with a full confidence that there was every desire on the part of the building Council to do justice to this art, we cannot help observing that the more flourishing and brilliant younger sister has still contrived to maintain her social supremacy. Two of the three sculpture-rooms form the entrance and passage halls to the remaining ten; and hence, although the light for sculpture requires even more elaborate arrangement than that for pictures, the light in these halls has been less arranged with a view to the contents, and more with a view to a general handsome effect, than elsewhere. The third room, or Gallery proper, is more strictly adapted for its purpose; or, we might rather say, is more adaptable, if the lower part of the large window were blocked up. We think also that a better distribution of the groups might be managed another year, so as to bring the better and more ornamental specimens together in a larger and more open semicircle. But we must couple this remark with the acknowledgment that on this occasion there were great difficulties in the way of a free disposition, and that the matter has, on the whole, been settled in a manner extremely creditable to the sculptor who was responsible. All we have to regret is that the materials were not more worthy of his care. But there are several exceptions, and to these we venture to hope that visitors will now pay that attention which is the first step in learning what to admire and what to avoid.

Royalty claims the first word. It would be an easy task to salute the bust of Her Majesty with a few phrases of general politeness or flattering epithet. But we shall not pay H.R.H. Princess Louise the poor compliment of treating her en amateur. There is much likeness to life, and the likeness is also rendered in a very pleasing way, in this head of a mother, justly loved and honoured, by a gifted daughter. The pose is natural, the drapery well imagined; the temptations to over-ornament or trick of handling have been resisted in a spirit honourably true to the demands of real art. It is a more promising piece of sculpture than Miss Durant's medallion below it. "Your Royal Highness's work," we would whisper, "is quite equal to the average level of English busts. But there is a much better level than this, indeed a wholly different one, both in likeness to character and in execution; and a bust which reaches this, small and simple though it be as a piece of sculpture, ranks with the great, the eternal masterpieces of the art." This level in art—or, to speak the truth, this level below which art is not—is conquerable by genius, and long labour, and indifference to flattery; qualities which must be born, not acquired; but there are also aids by which the artist may lighten the labour. To study a few thoroughly great models, and these only, to practise under the one or two (if they can be found) who really know their art, have been, in all times, the modes to which genius has had resort; nor does genius prove itself more decisively than by the evidence which it thus affords of the insight that recognises what is great, and the humility that gives up all to follow it.

It is not from the simple courtesy due to a foreigner that we next notice M. d'Épinay's "Youthful Hannibal Strangling the Eagle, symbolical of the Wars between Carthage and Rome." This group has been most carefully studied, and meets the difficult problem of presenting a good view on every side with success. The limbs (the legs in particular) and the body are modelled with much accuracy and closeness to nature. The difficult passage between the neck and the right shoulder may be singled out for special praise. The head also, carefully true to the persistent North-African type, is a creditable piece of ethnological art. Yet we must regret to find the group wholly insufficient for its aim. It would task the ablest sculptor of any age to render the death-grapple of the iron-sinewed eagle and the supple youth, even if he did not add to his task that of symbolizing thereby the war between two mighty empires. Some image of the material struggle may be gained from Landseer's noble picture, but we fail to find either of the required elements in M. d'Épinay's group. The boy's head has no ideal or elevated character—it is a Numidian, not a Hannibal; the eagle, the mere touch of whose claws would unfailingly have torn the muscles from the bone, clings to him far less like a foe than like the god's messenger sent for Ganymede; whilst so slightly has such a combat been realized, that the pressure of the boy's thumb has been treated as sufficient to paralyse his mighty power. An honourable ambition has, no doubt, impelled the artist to attempt here what is well nigh impossible. If we may judge by a miniature bust (No. 1,258, Vestibule), his genius lies more in the direction of the graceful; nor, if this be so, need he regret his portion. Charm is much more the element of art than astonishment

Mr. Woolner's "Ophelia" (1,248), like all similar subjects, exposes itself to competition from that general idea of Ophelia's appearance which every reader has framed with more or less distinctness. Hence, although the modelling and the execution display the thoroughness of our leading sculptor, it is probable that his treatment will not commend itself so universally as in the case of a subject created by the artist himself, or less familiar to our minds. Mr. Woolner's Ophelia, though on the brink of death, has no sentimentalism or pretty despair; in her madness she is still the noble-natured Danish maiden, worthy of Hamlet in his saner and happier days. Her beauty of feature and limb is cast in a grand and powerful type. But a life-size scale is required to do justice to these qualities.

Few other specimens of inventive sculpture deserve notice. The "Venus" (1,144), the "Eve" (1,189), the "Oenone" (1,224), are models smoothly reproduced. Mr. Fuller's "Jael" (1,190) reminds one of the spurious sentiment of Mr. Story's work. Mr. Noble's "Amy" (1,207) and Mr. Durham's beggar (1,225) appeal to popular weakness and sentimentalism of a lower order; they are altogether unsculptural. Mr. Munro's "Undine" (1,249) overhangs like a precipice, rather than floats like a spirit. Two small groups by Mr. Adams-Acton (1,231, 1,234) seem to aim at the look of bad antique bronzes, exhumed after long oxidization; a trick which reappears in the animals by Mr. Boehm (1,197, &c.), figures designed in the showy, careless style which delights the British vulgar, always ready to take slovenliness for spirit. Four bronze panels, for Calcutta, feebly modelled by Mr. Philip (1,251), are on a level with these works, which do nothing but harm to the cause of art. "Throwing the Hammer" (1,203) is stiff, but has truth and energy. "Saved from the Wreck," "Comus and the Lady," the "Olympian Victor," "Sabrina," are fair pieces of academical design. Mr. C. Marshall's "Tryst" (1,246) is a pretty statuette, and true to Scottish character. Mr. Miller's "Viola" (1,186) is pleasing. Mr. Bell's "Last Kiss" (1,240), though, as usual with this artist's work, crudely modelled, yet displays, what is also usual with him, a definite and a really sculpturesque idea. These remarks may serve as our criticism on his group for the Albert Memorial, which is modelled on too small a scale to admit of more detailed analysis. The careful work bestowed on Miss Durant's "Ruth," as on her group of two children cut across at the waist (1,185), loses its effect through the singular alienation from good taste and feeling for charm which this artist too often exhibits.

The monumental work of the year is deplorable. Mr. Foley does not exhibit anything. Two recumbent figures show that without the ancient feeling it is of small use to adopt an ancient type. The one, to Lady Devon, is the least unsatisfactory; the other, to Archbishop Sumner, has a head apparently copied straight off from a cast after death (so repulsive and formless are the features of the good old man), and a body badly imitated from the rudest of the Gothic effigies. It looks like one of those figures whom Dante saw "lapped in lead," and who were not clothed so on account of saintly qualities. Yet this is by a full Academician! "Commerce" and "Agriculture," by Mr. Bursil, designed for the Holborn Viaduct, will justify the common sneer at the taste of the City. Dr. Livingstone, by Mrs. D. O. Hill, swaggers like a "border rowdy." India, for which the Government work is habitually jobbed in favour of bunglers, is to have the colossal Queen by Mr. Weekes (1,218), whose Sumner we have just noticed. We wonder how many hundred pounds the Indian Exchequer is to pay for this huge piece of coarse modelling. The kindest wish we can frame for the Dutch-looking lady whom Mr. Armstead presents as "Chemistry" (1,232) is that she may be lifted somewhere far above earth and criticism into the recesses of the Albert Memorial. We at once invoke Mr. Layard's love of art before the "King Alfred," by Mr. Philip, is placed within the Palace of Westminster. Better to wall up Barry's niches than that they should be filled with such rubbish. And if Mr. Layard's jurisdiction extended to Liverpool, we would predict a "happy despatch" for the marble Gladstone by Mr. Adams-Acton. This is a rickety-looking figure, huddled under a mass of what man-milliners call "frogs," with fidgety hands, and arms as inarticulate as those of a child's favourite doll. The face expresses neither energy nor eloquence nor force of thought; no man with such features could lead the House for a day. We are sorry that such a pitiable affair should represent the Premier in his native town; but, remembering the bust of Mr. Gladstone which Mr. Adams-Acton exhibited some years ago, we cannot be surprised at the unredeemed failure of his more ambitious effort.

Is it not provoking that works such as these, works so defective in style and life and beauty that they deserve only the criticism of silence, should be precisely those which will vex our eyes in public places, and confirm the general low impression of English sculpture? Busts hide in the corners of staircases; monuments lurk on church-walls; but public statues we cannot avoid. Yet those above criticized are but fair samples of what is going on all over the kingdom and its dependencies (as, for example, the feeble and style-less Oastler group, by the above-mentioned Mr Philip, just put up at Bradford, and engraved in the Illustrated News), and will go on, till patrons and committees have discovered that sculpture cannot be judged like cheese, and that good work is to be had only of good artists.

The busts and medallions seem to us to present a smaller number of interesting heads than usual. Nothing but a really good bust is a bearable thing; really good busts are, and always have been, very rare; the state of the art, in short, is not encouraging to sitters. Look round those here; how few have any similarity to the real human face, with its infinite play of surface and variety of texture! Most of them rely for their effect on coarseness, or smoothness, or unsculptural devices. We may briefly classify, under the first head, 1,167 (Brodie); 1,291 (G. G. Adams); 1,165 (A. Munro; 1,184 rather better); and 1,154 by Mr. Boehm; this being much the worst, as it unites the faults of coarseness and tasteless trickery. Altogether, Mr. Boehm seems to be aspiring, with success, to the level in art held by the late Baron Marochetti—unless that doubtful honour be destined for Mr. Story.

Busts of the textureless style are Nos. 1,168 (Marshall Wood); 1,243 (Durham); 1,262 (Mr. Thornycroft, a noticeably bad specimen); 1,266 and 1,286 (Theed); 1,282 (Wyon, a curiosity of tameness, the subject considered); 1,159 and 1,264 (Noble)—the worthless dregs of Chantrey's conventionalism. In the third class, where picturesqueness, a quality not compatible with sculptural style, is aimed at, we have 1,180 (Adams-Acton); 1,257 and 1,261 (Boehm), two children whose pretty faces, not unknown to the world, left the artist no excuse for his bad workmanship; 1,280 (A. Munro), a lady's head in a circle, which might properly serve as an ornament for the Sun Fire Office.

Some better pieces we have already noticed. To these let us gladly add Mr. Boehm's "Sir Coutts Lindsay;" "Mrs. Hornby," and a Lady, full length (1,220), both by J. W. Wood (not the maker of 1,168); "Lady A. Gower," by G. E. Ewing; "Mr. Bright," by N. Burnard; "Mr. Cowper," a posthumous likeness, by Mr. Butler, who has here shown much ability in dealing with a rather difficult subject. Perhaps none of these works, the last excepted, are thoroughly satisfactory in style; but we should have many more as good or better, from artists whom at present we cannot praise, if it were once well understood what a bust ought to be. Mr. Woolner, as on former occasions, furnishes us with a few such; though we should be glad if he had the opportunity of showing what might be done in the direction of grace and charm, as well as of forcible expression and intellectual weight. In these qualities his portraits of "Mr. Wilson" of Melbourne (1,151), and "Mr. Pease" (1,241), are conspicuous; one reads in them the mental characteristics which have given distinction to the originals—every line and curve of surface speaks as it does in nature. Fineness of a higher type, a greater air of sensibility, appear in the "Frere" (1,285); if compared with the "Lord Dartmouth" (1,286) close by, the wonderful difference between ability in reading a character, with skill in working it out in marble, and sculpture wholly wanting in these qualities, will strike the least practised eye. But Mr. Woolner has been fortunate in finding his highest success in his greatest subject, and the bust of Mr. Gladstone which fitly meets the spectator's eye on entering the magnificent halls of the Academy is a proof how far impressiveness and truth to life may be carried by the legitimate means of art. Sculpture, like painting, can give but one moment, it is true; every side of character cannot be taken at once. What marks the penetrative artist is that he rises to his occasion, that he gives the man in that aspect which is most characteristic of him. Mr. Gladstone's head is one which presents so much as to be of great difficulty to an artist. What we admire Mr. Woolner's bust for is that, with a far stronger general likeness than any other representation of the Premier has reached, this one places him before us pre-eminently as the statesman.

THE WATER-COLOUR SOCIETIES.

THE two Societies in Pall Mall which have sustained with honour the art of Water-Colour Painting will, we trust, never suffer diminution through any threatened rivalry from the Academy. We believe the best interests of art and of the public at large require that separate societies should be maintained for the express culture of the one branch of painting for which the English have made themselves famous throughout the world. It is notorious that Europe cannot produce another Gallery comparable to this of the Old Water-Colour Society. And amid many changes, by reason of the death of some members and the decadence or defalcation of others, this choice collection sustains to the present moment its supreme position. Here, from year to year, we have been accustomed to trace the various phases of an art which, within its limits, attains to qualities more pure and subtle than are usually permitted to the grosser medium of oils. And though the public may have had to deplore the loss of Copley Fielding, William Hunt, and David Cox, and the secession to the Academy of Mr. Lewis, some compensation comes in the acquisition of Mr. Thomas Danby and Mr. Holman Hunt. On the whole we have seldom seen the Society in greater force than in the present year, nor the art of water-colour painting, notwithstanding innovations of opaque or tempera, with other tricks and devices, in a condition more healthful or more true to nature.

Mr. Burne Jones has seldom shown himself so mysterious, miraculous, or mediæval "The Wine of Circe"—which obtains, as it deserves, a commanding position—is grand in theme and imaginative in treatment. Dosso Dossi, a painter of wild, nightmare fancy, has, in a composition in the Borghese Gallery, depicted the enchantress Circe clad in rich turban and robe of state, confident in the spell of her necromantic art; the accessories comprise a magic circle, a coat of mail, a dog, birds, hags, and knights. Mr. Burne Jones has adopted a reading wholly different; the legend is less encumbered by circumstance, and perhaps all the more strong in its spell upon the imagination. Stealthily does Circe, with poison vial in hand, creep along, and we cannot but see, in her uncanny form and fiendlike intent, that mischief is brewing. Wild beasts of the forest prowl awaiting their prey; the black leopard, here at home, cowers as his mistress comes. The subject, as we have said, is grand; the treatment not a little peculiar. It cannot be a secret that persons scarcely yet initiated into the mysteries of ultra-mediævalism regard Mr. Jones's habitual performances as close upon the line which divides the sublime from the ridiculous. "St. George" is a saint supremely stiff, and the dragon seems some nondescript hybrid between a crocodile and a lobster. "What a fool!" exclaimed a young lady of strong-minded turn, "that dragon must be, thus to hold up its head meekly just that the spear may smoothly slip down its throat." Yet we confess that few pictures act more powerfully on the imagination than some of these; the joy may not be in a thing of beauty; the power of ugliness is verily vast; "like the basilisk, it fascinates, and is intolerable." Most people indeed may feel that the style of Mr. Burne Jones is difficult quite to justify on the side of simple nature; his art may be best accepted as something transmitted through long vistas and shadowy traditions of the past. Few will fail to recognise in these pictures, repellent though they may often be, deep significance, with very much of the earnestness we fondly cherish in the Italian pre-Raffaelites. Most people may possibly regret that qualities so rare should be marred by mannerism, yet it may be wise to accept what is set before us, and rest thankful. At all events, such art, if not quite justifiable, may be salutary as a protest against the low naturalism and the unimaginative literalness of modern schools.

"Cassandra Fedele" is the name given by Mr. Frederick Burton to one of the most refined and studious pictures of the year. This lady of noble family, born in Venice in the latter half of the fifteenth century, gave such signal proof of talent that at an early age her father provided for her instruction in Greek and Latin literature, in history, philosophy, theology, and eloquence; while, in the superlative language of eulogy, we are assured that music and poetry served only as her pastime. The Latin orations of Cassandra Fedele became famous, and special mention is made of one in praise of the Belles-Lettres at which the Doge and Senators of Venice were present. Thus it is easy to believe, in the words of M. Rio, that Cassandra Fedele "était devenue pour les Vénitiens une espèce de Muse nationale." Such is the character Mr. Burton undertakes to bring before our notice. The lady stands pensive, expectant of inspiration; her hands, musical in form as in action, are ready to vibrate in response to thought and emotion. A lute, fit symbol of a Muse, she is about to touch, and before her lies a volume of poetry. The surroundings of the chamber bespeak a life in converse with literature and art. The picture accords with the spirit of the theme; it rises, like the character depicted, above the level of common life. Specially subtle are the drawing, the colour, and the treatment. We recognise the presence of a beauty and of a balanced harmony in decorative accessories which recall pleasantly the school of Luini and the wall pictures in the church of San Maurizio, Milan. It is rare that we can trace among living artists a knowledge of historic schools, so exclusively are they given either to the model to be copied or to the fashion of the moment which it may be most profitable to follow.

Mr. John Gilbert has in his time been indebted almost as much to Rembrandt and Rubens as to nature herself. Thus a small drawing on the first screen from "Gil Blas" has evidently, in the management of light and of colour, much in common with the Dutch masters. The style of Mr. Gilbert may have been occasionally disfigured by rant and fustian, yet ever and anon we come upon touches worthy of a poet, as in the picturesque though not precisely Shakspearian "Burial of Ophelia." Solemnly and sadly they bear her away to her grave in the shadowy wood. The gravedigger in the foreground may be rather conventional and coarse; such figures, however, we have long learnt to tolerate in the clever compositions of Mr. Gilbert. Mr. Carl Haag is another painter who has a certain showy mastery over effect. His "High Priest at Nablous reading the Pentateuch" is large, elaborate, and pretentious; we admire the mechanism, yet dislike the art. We pass to the contributions of Mr. Watson, Mr. Lamont, Mr. Shields, and Mr. Pinwell, severally good in somewhat distinctive ways. Mr. Watson, when he paints, or rather plasters, "the peacock," though powerful, becomes garish. The ladies who assist in the ceremony of carrying this bird of bright plumage combine the charms of a dairymaid with the dignity of the Queen of the Adriatic. This clever and brilliant drawing, however, may recall less the style of Paul Veronese than of our own Mr. Calderon. Finer by far for pure art quality is Mr. Watson's unpretentious drawing, "The Family Pew." Mr. Lamont's one contribution, "Glasgerion," shows progress, notwithstanding that again he concocts sentiment with fog and smoke. The forms require definition, the figures accent, while the shadows need lighting up. This refined essence of poetry lacks substance; even imagination may need a substratum in fact. Mr. Shields continues, in a pretty little picture of children, to show himself the good draughtsman: he evokes expression out of form, but his colour is unpleasantly ruddy, and the execution rather muddled. This artist has done nothing so good as the "Bread Watchers" of a former season. Mr. Johnson still finds it to his advantage to borrow from the French; "The Burnt Letter" might pass for a tasteful Parisian picture. A word of congratulation is due to Mr. Pinwell on his first and favourable appearance within these walls; at the same time we would condole with the Dudley Gallery for the loss it has sustained. Hard indeed seems the lot which subjects the "General Society" to repeated reprisals. No sooner does an artist prove his power in Piccadilly than he is carried off as a prize to Pall Mall. It is not long since the capture of Mr. Lamont was effected, and now Mr. Pinwell follows. The new-comer announces his advent by three capital achievements, somewhat after the manner of Mr. Walker, brilliant and opaque, original yet eccentric. "A Seat in St. James's Park" is the best, "The Pied Piper of Hamlin" the most peculiar. "Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats, brown rats, black rats, grey rats, tawny rats" (N.B. this is poetry; vide Mr. Browning) come tumbling out to listen to the shrill notes of "The Pied Piper of Hamlin." The whole scene, as depicted in circumstantial detail by Mr. Pinwell, is to the last degree clever and comic. Perhaps the grotesque may dominate too strongly; the "pied piper" is turned into the mountebank, and thus the painter does violence to Mr. Browning's gracefully tripping lines:—

> Into the street the piper stept,
> Smiling first a little smile,
> As if he knew what magic slept
> In his quiet pipe the while.

The landscapes are up to accustomed standards; they are varied yet monotonous, original yet commonplace. The members, in fact, after their habitual routine, persevere with most praiseworthy intent in repeating whatever they can do well. Mr. Birket Foster occupies the place of honour by the largest picture we remember to have seen from his easel—"The Meet." But with greater scale he has not gained larger manner. The composition wants unity, the component parts are scattered, the execution is dotty rather than broad; indeed, the picture might with advantage be divided into a number of smaller pictures and put into separate frames. We need not add, however, that Mr. Foster cannot fail to be sparkling, charming, and clever. Other painters of landscape sink detail into tone, and seek expression through aspects of light or phases of colour. Perhaps little that is new, though much that may be good, will be expected from veterans like Mr. Richardson, Mr. Palmer, or Mr. Branwhite. In such drawings as "Loch Awe" Mr. Richardson repeats himself after a well-known recipe; his landscapes are as decorative on the walls as blue, red, and yellow bottles in chemists' windows. Mr. Palmer recounts "Pompeian Memories"; purple mountains and storm-clouds bound the distance; across the foreground a broad shadow sweeps, while among the ruined streets and temples of Pompeii glows golden light. The colour is intense, yet balanced. These are not so much "Memories" as visions. Mr. Branwhite produces a noble drawing, lustrous in deep-toned harmonies—"A Mountain-Stream, Evening." Mr. Newton seizes on the same time of day in "Shades of Evening." The plain sleeps in shadow, the mountain still glows in sunshine—an effect often attempted, but seldom perhaps with so just a relation in the contrast of cool and warm colour. Comparisons might be instituted between the kindred yet diverse styles of Mr. George Fripp and Mr. Thomas Danby, each colourists, each observant of atmospheric conditions; the one may suggest Copley Fielding, the other Turner. Mr. George Fripp has scarcely this year sought out new ideas, nor has Mr. Danby produced any results of which he has not before favoured us with the antecedents. Indeed, it appears to be only by way of rare exception that an artist is blessed with a novel thought anywhere, so much more easy is it to go on with what has proved a success than to open fresh ground. Very much, indeed, in this Gallery might be dismissed with the simple remark that we have seen it all before; still those who have joy in art, as art, come with untired zest to variations on well-known themes, just as the ear dwells on slight modifications in favourite melodies. The analogies often conjectured to subsist between colours and musical scales might receive illustration in such expressly chromatic compositions as "Genoa" by Mr. Holland; the artist plays with his pigments as a musician with notes of the piano or violin. Some of Mr. Holland's drawings, however, like the later works of Beethoven, are, save to the initiated, unintelligible. But genius, even though run wild, is better than no genius at all. This Society numbers among its younger members earnest students still on the look out for truths yet undiscovered. Yet it is now some time since that Mr. Boyce found out that red roofs and brick walls contrast well with cabbage greens; the drawings of this artist, if monotonous, must be accepted as student works. So too the landscapes of Mr. Powell. "Ben Nevis" is a grand study of cloud, mountain, and lake. An arduous task, assuredly, did Mr. Alfred Hunt, another observant student of nature, set himself when he essayed to map out from bird's-eye view "Loch Coruisk." The feat is more astounding than agreeable. The artist evidently was near to the catastrophe of finding the subject coming to pieces under his hand; the scene threatened to resolve itself into chaos. Yet among manifest merits may especially be admired decision of form just when in danger of being lost, the presence of colour in its absence, and the consciousness of light in shadow. Altogether we have here an abstruse problem nearly, but not quite, solved. Like criticism may be directed at the clever but eccentric drawings by which

Mr. Holman Hunt makes his presence felt for the first time within this Gallery. In "the Interior of the Cathedral at Salerno" the artist challenges difficulty and courts defeat. Only by infinite subtlety in form, light, and colour is confusion averted, and relative distance preserved. "Moonlight at Salerno," the remaining contribution of Mr. Holman Hunt, is for most people too blue; perhaps, however, scarcely for those who have watched the sea by night in southern latitudes. The artist has gained great lustre on a low scale, and this proves his skill; certainly his iridescent and opalesque colours are specially lovely. Such brilliancy seems to bear out a boast we used to hear, that the moon of Italy is as bright by night as the sun of England by day.

The Institute, alias the New Water-Colour Society, merits a word of encouragement in its recent endeavours to revert to nature, and return to ways of truth and soberness. The conventional high art, the stilted and vapid ideal, which have long taken possession of this Gallery, are fortunately giving place to styles simple, straightforward, and honest. Mr. Edward Corbould, however, stands out in brilliant and defiant exception to growing simplicity, and certainly the painter of anything half so fine as "Joan of Arc forsaken" need never look once at nature again. Mr. Guido Bach is also far too poetic to listen to common sense; he and his countryman, Mr. Carl Haag, dip apparently into one colour-box, and drink from the same perennial fount of inspiration, even to the dregs. Mr. Carl Werner—yet one more German who, with a shrewd eye for business, seeks fame and fortune in London—paints "The Memnons in Moonshine"; spectres illumined as by the Bude light, which might appear on the stage as companions to Professor Pepper's patent ghost. The Institute, in fact, has been, of old, privileged ground for such scenic effects. Here is a brilliant landscape trio, performed, by kind permission of the hangers, in one perpendicular line, wherein the executants are Mr. Aaron Penley, who plays variations on the "Lake of Llanberis"; Mr. Harry Johnson, who seems to have witnessed, after his usual good luck, a vision of blazing sunset on the "Coast of Porto d'Anzio"; while for Mr. Mogford is reserved something sentimental and sorrowful "by the sad sea waves," where a woman weeps. We fear the thing may have been perpetrated before, for truly there is nothing new under sunset. We have a more simple sentiment in some exquisite drawings by Mr. Hine. On the other hand, Mr. Edmund Warren, clever though he be, seems more and more to degenerate into an opacity of laborious detail abhorrent alike to art and to nature. Among truth-seeking figure-painters not yet misled by ambition we gladly call attention to Mr. Luson Thomas, Mr. C. Green, Mr. Kilburne, and Mr. Valentine Bromley. On the whole we incline to look favourably upon the fortunes of the Institute, especially if it will but forsake what is false and florid, and rest content with such simplicity and truth as may be found through strict study of nature

THE ITALIAN OPERA.

ROBERT LE DIABLE, the next work that calls for notice, was a fresh instance of an opera represented by Mr. Mapleson's singers upon Mr. Gye's stage. All the parts of importance, with the exception of Raimbaud, the least important, were assigned to artists from Her Majesty's Theatre. Madlle. Tietjens played Alice; Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, the Princess; Signor Mongini, Robert; and Signor Foli, Bertram. Signor Arditi, moreover, was in the orchestra. The performance generally was hardly more fortunate than that of Guillaume Tell, a short time previously. Mdlle. Tietjens, who had met with a severe accident at rehearsal, was still very much indisposed; nor is the Norman peasant girl just now a character at all fitted to the eminent Teutonic songstress, certain physical conditions needless to specify being indispensable to its adequate embodiment. Signor Mongini produces more than one striking vocal effect in Robert, but he has yet to perfect his conception and tone down his execution. Bertram is at present beyond the means, whether vocal or dramatic, of Signor Foli; and indeed, since the days when Herr Formes was in his prime, the like criticism may apply with more or less truth to every Bertram we have seen. About Signor Corsi, upon whom devolved the comparatively small part of Raimbaud, there is little or nothing to say. He should be styled the lesser Corsi, inasmuch as another Corsi, if not great, greater nevertheless than he, was yet to come from Lisbon. The best sustained character in the entire performance was that of the Princess; and the sensation of the evening was created by Madlle. di Murska, in the well-known concert-hacknied air, "Roberto, o tu che adoro" ("Robert, toi que j'aime"), into which she threw an expression as intense as it was natural. This exhibition of genuine feeling suddenly aroused the audience from an apathy that had prevailed from the beginning of the evening. Altogether the revival of Meyerbeer's once most popular work, which many amateurs (despite the Huguenots) still persist in regarding as his finest, was not encouraging; and we doubt whether its popularity will ever be renewed until the advent of some new and young phenomenon, to present us once more, as was done by Jenny Lind in 1847, with an ideal Alice.

Up to this period the result of the "coalition" was by no means equal to anticipation. The theatre, in repute at all events, had virtually gained little or nothing; while the public had been mulcted of nearly all those advantages to which it is accustomed to look from a rivalry conducted on either side with spirit and enterprise. Formerly, in the early season, at least some unknown singers were heard at one theatre, and an unknown opera or two at the other; but this time neither unknown singers nor unknown operas were forthcoming. With respect to singers, we have lost Signor Mario, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, M. Gassier, &c., all special favourites; with respect to operas, we have not had a single novelty; and with respect to conductors, in lieu of Mr. Costa at one theatre and Signor Arditi at the other, we have had Signors Arditi and Li Calsi, temporarily deposing each other, to the detriment of the orchestra and the advantage of nobody. If on one occasion people felt moved to exclaim—"after all the Covent Garden orchestra is still what Costa made it, still the orchestra of orchestras"—on the very next, in all probability, the judgment was reversed. This should not be at the Royal Italian Opera. Noblesse oblige: and the time when the musical director of that great establishment, parodying the motto of the French De Rohan, could proudly exclaim—"COSTA suis!"—is already beginning to be regretted.

On the evening of the 4th of May, however (a date to be always remembered in the annals of Her Majesty's Theatre, as the date of the appearance of Jenny Lind), the house was crowded to the roof, and pleasurable excitement was visibly imprinted on every countenance. The piece announced was, nevertheless, one of the stalest of the stale—no other than Lucia di Lammermoor. But the lady put down for the character of the heroine was as young and fresh as the sadly worn opera of Donizetti was the opposite. How suddenly Madlle. Christine Nilsson rose to fame, when, two years since, she came forth as the pale and erring Violetta, none of our music-loving readers can have forgotten. Last year, when the performances took place at Drury Lane, she was the mainstay of her director, just as, the year before, at Her Majesty's Theatre, she had been his saviour. Within the short period during which we have known her, Madlle. Nilsson has become as renowned in France as in England; for, whatever our complacent neighbours may pretend, Paris of recent years has borrowed its tone in operatic matters from London—not London from Paris. It did so with Alboni; it did so with Adelina Patti; and now once more it has done so with Christine Nilsson, who till after her first engagement here had been allowed to remain in comparative obscurity at Paris. As the Viennese could not see Schubert for Beethoven, so the Parisians could not see Christine Nilsson for Miolan Carvalho. Madame Carvalho was not only mistress of the fair young Swede, who served under her at the Théâtre Lyrique; she was also (of course involuntarily) her evil genius. One brief summer London season, however, set matters right. Madlle. Nilsson returned to Paris with a cubit added to her artistic stature, and was immediately everywhere in request. The sequel—the engagement at the Académie Impériale, the opera of Hamlet, the Ophelia mania, and the remainder—need not be told. That Hamlet may speedily be brought out at Covent Garden is the unanimous wish. Every one is longing to hear and to see Madlle. Nilsson (for either is a privilege) in some new part. Not that the public are tired of witnessing her impersonation of Lucia, Martha, Violetta, and Margaret; but that the desire exists to test her in some part of her own original creation, her assumption of which is not likely to invite comparison with that of any of her predecessors or contemporaries. We have nothing new to say of her Lucia, except that while the voice seemed as fresh and sympathetic as before, and the singing more than ever brilliant and refined, the acting generally showed a sensible advance in histrionic power. There was at one time a certain marble-like coldness about Madlle. Nilsson's stage demeanour, even in situations requiring the most unreserved abandon; but this has apparently departed, and we have now a genuine lifelike portraiture of the unhappy bride, from the first scene, with the meeting and parting of the lovers, to the last, with the mental frenzy that culminates in suicide. A Lucy more comely to behold has seldom appeared on the operatic boards; and this used to make Madlle. Nilsson's assumed frigidity all the more provoking. The greater the satisfaction, then, felt by her many admirers at her evident resolve to become as thorough a mistress of one department of her art as of the other, an accomplished actress no less than an accomplished singer Madlle. Nilsson's second appearance was in M. Flotow's Martha—an opera in the French style, composed by a Russian, and as unlike the genuine French style (of Auber, for example) as pinchbeck is to gold. The Lady Enrichetta of the gifted lady stood in want of no improvement that we can imagine; and to describe her singing in the quartet at the spinning-wheel, or her delivery of the "Last Rose of Summer," of which she persistently, even when encored, adopts the Italian version, would be a waste of words. Martha is an opera for children, young and old, not for men and women. The music is insignificant from first to last. Admitting a certain liveliness in the first two acts, and especially certain graceful prettinesses in the second, which not the less owes its principal attraction to the Irish melody to which reference has been made, the rest, apart from the vulgar apostrophe to beer, put into the mouth of Plumkett, a nonentity who acts perpetually as foil to his brother nonentity, Lionel, is mere drivel. How Martha has kept the stage so long it is not easy to understand. Doubtless, "Qui sola, vergin rosa" (that eternal "Last Rose") has had something to do with it; but the real sinners have been the prime donne, from Angiolina Bosio downwards, who have delighted in warbling this sentimental ditty, and in seeing themselves adored by a half-witted gentleman-farmer. It is a pity that Lady Henriette, ou le Marché de Richmond, was ever metamorphosed from a ballet into an opera. Perhaps, one of these days, M. Flotow, who seems to have spent some years of his life in considering and reconsidering, modelling and remodelling, his precious piece of work, will again transform it from an opera into an oratorio. There at all events it must rest at a standstill, seeing that from the lowest it will have risen to the highest sphere of the musical art, and can go no higher. To Martha succeeded La Traviata—tears after onions, for when the one has been given, the other seems to follow as a matter of necessity. In Signor Verdi's opera, however (the opera which introduced Madlle. Nilsson to an English audience), there is, notwithstanding the unsavoury incidents of its libretto, a considerable amount of dramatic expression, and no little music alike tuneful, original, and effective. The part of the heroine affords wide scope for an actor's talent; and in this, even more than in Lucia, Madlle. Nilsson finds opportunities for demonstrating the remarkable progress she has made since she was last among us. Guarding in a measure that reserved behaviour which in certain positions makes it difficult for us to believe that in her we behold the "unfortunate" whose end, while a matter of retributive justice, is yet, as things turn out, to be lamented, Madlle. Nilsson imparts a degree of animation to the earlier scenes which occasionally reminds us of Piccolomini, the first representative of the character in England (1856), though she never gives way to that unrestrained laisser aller which, in the eyes of uncompromising judges, was the cardinal sin of Piccolomini's too famous assumption. In the second act where, moved by the earnest solicitations of the elder Germont, Violetta writes the fatal letter which deprives her of her lover, and in the last, when, as the sequel of a crowd of unpleasant details, she dies in the presence of Alfredo and his father, Madlle. Nilsson showed herself fully equal to the dramatic requirements, and both surprised and charmed the audience. In short, her Violetta is now quite equal if not superior, to her Lucia. How admirably she gives the music—from "Libiamo, libiamo," and "Ah fors' e lui," with its cabaletta, "Sempre libera," of the first act, to the monotonous and lachrymose duet with Alfredo, "Parigi o cara," and the repugnant death-wail, of the last—we need not say. It would be difficult to imagine it given better. As the heroine of Faust—or Faust e Margherita, following the title adopted at Covent Garden—the voice, singing, features, and stage deportment of Madlle. Nilsson are familiar to English audiences. Her impersonation of this most interesting character is very much what it was last year, with the difference that to the scenes of the Cathedral and the Prison she brings a force and intensity which she has never before exhibited—at least in our experience. Her Margaret is now as poetically truthful as, judged simply from a musical point of view, it is irreproachable; and, without further comment, we may leave it to make its own impression. Madlle. Nilsson's companions in Lucia were Signor Bulterini, whose Edgardo was in some points more effective than could have been anticipated, Mr. Santley, whose Enrico is now the best on the stage, Signors Marino and Foli; in Martha, Signor Mongini was her Lionel, and Mr. Santley his Plumkett, Nancy—Enrichetta's friend and confidant—being represented by Madlle. Grossi, a contralto, whose voice, heavy, though rich in quality, is not well suited to the music; in La Traviata Signor Naudin played the extremely ungrateful part of Alfredo, and Signor Graziani that of Alfredo's father, if possible even a weightier infliction. There were two novelties in the "cast" of M. Gounod's opera. First we had a new Faust, in Signor Corsi, from Lisbon (already named), who by his performance of this character, the merits of his predecessor borne in mind, fully established his claim to the title of the greater Corsi, although hardly to that of the great Corsi. This gentleman, we believe, was in London, some ten years since, when Mr. E. T. Smith presided over the destinies of Italian Opera; but what are his antecedents and what were his achievements at that epoch we are unable to remember. He has a light tenor voice, which, when he does not force it (as he too frequently does), is agreeable enough; and he is quite at ease on the stage. Further than this, at present, we have nothing to say about Signor Corsi, unless it be that, on the whole, he made a sufficiently favourable though by no means strong impression. The other novelty was the Mephistopheles of Signor Graziani, about which the less said the better. Signor Graziani was master neither of the music nor of the character; and, indeed, the music is as much beyond the capacity of his voice as the character seems beyond the reach of his intelligence. Madlle. Scalchi was a very acceptable Siebel, and Mr. Santley, as usual, the Valentine of Valentines.

Close upon the appearance of one of the "stars" of the season (for it is evident that the "coalition" is to depend, not upon operas, but upon "stars") followed that of another—Madame Adelina Patti. Among the acquisitions made by Mr. Gye, since he undertook the direction of the Royal Italian Opera, foremost of all stands Madame Patti. This very gifted artist, who made her début here on the 14th of May, 1861, as a girl of scarcely eighteen, and by her performance of Amina, in the Sonnambula, at once took musical London by storm, has been the chief attraction of the theatre ever since. And no wonder, for, with endowments far beyond the common, she has studied her art perseveringly and conscientiously. Attractive and full of promise from the beginning, she has never been content to stand still, but has laboured to such excellent purpose that she now deservedly occupies a first place in the very first rank of her profession. That Adelina Patti was a genius could not fail to be discovered by all capable judges at the very outset of her career—a genius both as comedian and singer; and those who foretold great things of her future have not turned out false prophets. Her performance the other night, as Amina, her original coup d'essai in England, was from first to last enchanting. It seemed hardly possible that she could be better than before. Better, nevertheless, she was; refined and delicate touches, here and there, in almost every scene, showing how deeply she must have been engaged during the interval in perfecting that which, by those accustomed to look upon art as simply a diversion, was already recognised as perfection. We do not hesitate to say that the finale of the second act of the Sonnambula, as represented by Madame Patti, is equal to anything witnessed on the lyric boards for a generation past. No such Amina as her's, nothing, in fact, approaching to such an Amina, has been seen in our time; and we may well despair of anything worthier of its kind. Having said which, we forbear from entering into details that, in reference to a subject so familiar, would only tax the patience of our readers. Madame Patti was well supported by Signor Mongini, whose Elvino is thoroughly genial and good. As much cannot be said for Signor Bagagiolo's Rodolpho—very nearly the worst we remember; nor are we able to give one word of praise to the Lisa of Madlle. Locatelli, some of whose former achievements had led us to hope for a more than usually spirited representation of that by no means insignificant character. Madame Patti's next appearance was as Adina in Don Pasquale, and her third, as Rosina in the Barbiere di Siviglia. As the scheming widow and the rebellious ward, all the world knows, she is equally charming. She acts both characters to admiration; and in Donizetti's comic music—a pale reflex in this particular instance (unlike the Elisir d'Amore, his masterpiece) of the comic music of Rossini—all the world equally knows, she is just as much at home as in that of Rossini himself. It is, indeed, her extraordinary versatility, her intimate familiarity with the various phases under which the lyric drama presents itself, that affords one of the most signal proofs of Madame Patti's genius. Of her Adina, as of her Rosina, we have spoken more than once at length; but while each is beyond reproach, we may suggest that in the "Lesson-scene" of the Barbiere she might introduce something else than the bolero from the Vêpres Siciliennes, which, brilliantly as she sings it, is quite out of place; and that for the inevitable "encore," she should cease to give the ballad of "Home, sweet home," which, whether Rosina be regarded as the heroine of Beaumarchais or as the heroine of Rossini, is equally inappropriate. Madame Patti appears to be in greater favour than ever with the public this year, if we may judge by the enthusiasm she creates at every one of her performances.

Any further reference to Don Pasquale and the Barbiere would be unnecessary but for the fact that a new "buffo" appeared in each—as the hero of the former, and as Don Basilio in the latter. Signor Bottero's reputation in Italy has been chiefly acquired at minor theatres, and especially as the representative of Don Bucefalo, in Signor Cagnoni's opera of that name. We have not yet enjoyed the privilege of making acquaintance with Don Bucefalo; and all we can say at present of Signor Bottero is, that both his Don Pasquale and his Don Basilio are, at the best, mediocre—as noisy, pretentious and obtrusive as they are destitute of humour. If these be criterions it is very difficult to account for so wide a Continental renown; but, perhaps, Don Bucefalo (which is to be produced this evening) will set matters right. Let us hope so. Meanwhile we have only to add that the parts of Dr. Malatesta and Ernesto, in Don Pasquale, are indifferently well sustained by Signors Cotogni and Naudin; that in Il Barbiere Signor Mongini surprised everybody by his very natural assumption of the character and his fluent delivery of a large part of the music of Almaviva; and that the other chief parts in Rossini's comic masterpiece were sustained by Signors Cotogni and Ciampi (Figaro and Don Bartolo), as of yore.

To conclude, the subscribers to the Royal Italian Opera are eagerly looking forward to something new—whether it be Otello, with Madlle. Nilsson as Desdemona, Dinorah, or L'Etoile du Nord (the first the most desirable), with Madame Adelina Patti as the heroine, or the Hamlet of M. Thomas (for Madlle. Nilsson)—the rehearsals of which last, we hear, have already begun. The thirst for novelty, indeed, has become little short of intense.

THE DERBY.

ALMOST every year there is some one horse in the Derby, not necessarily the first favourite, but, for all that, the popular idol. Last year, despite the immense prestige of Lady Elizabeth, the public sympathies were all with Blue Gown; and this year Belladrum was the object of similar favour. Partly because Mr. Merry's horses are always trusted by the public; partly because of Belladrum's brilliant performances as a two-year-old; partly because he has been about the best-abused animal of the century; and partly because he so nearly succeeded in confounding his enemies at Newmarket in the Two Thousand. So, while it was generally feared that Pretender must win, it was almost universally hoped that Belladrum might win. Pero Gomez, naturally considered as the only rival to this pair from whom danger need be apprehended, has declined of late in public estimation because Duke of Beaufort, whom he defeated by a neck only in the Newmarket Biennial, was beaten out of sight a fortnight later by Pretender and Belladrum. It was also understood that he had lost his trial at Kingsclere, but if it is true that he was set to run Blue Gown at a difference of 12 lbs. only, it is not wonderful that he was beaten. Sir Joseph Hawley always tries his horses very highly; but such a trial as that would have reduced the Derby to that certainty so often predicted, so rarely accomplished. Setting aside these three—Belladrum, Pretender, and Pero Gomez—it was difficult to find any other candidates with even a faint chance of success. It was not possible to believe that any of the horses that ran in the Two Thousand and could not get within lengths of the leading pair could reverse that running at Epsom, and the rumours of a promising outsider were fainter than ever, though some of the Newmarket people entertained a high opinion of Rupert. Thus it must be confessed that the Derby this year awakened singularly little interest. It was so obvious that one of three—and, as the day drew nearer and the truth about Belladrum became better known, that one of two only—would win, that people accepted the fact as settled, and preferred to speculate on what might have a chance of scrambling into the third place. And the majority of the probable runners were so much on a par that there was a fine field for guess-work on this point. The result completely justified these anticipations. Pretender and Pero Gomez as nearly as possible ran a dead heat, and half a dozen horses made an equally close struggle for the third place. There was never a better finish for the Derby; there were never so many horses resolutely ridden out for place honours.

The paddock, as usual, attracted an inconveniently large assemblage of spectators, but those who had hoped to scrutinize Pretender and his stable companions, Thorwaldsen and Lord Hawthorn, were disappointed, for this trio only came into the enclosure for about a quarter of a minute, and were then summarily transferred to the vicinity of the starting-post, and appeared no more till the time arrived for the preliminary canters. The rest of the twenty-two starters (four more than last year) were paraded in the paddock, but the crowding and mobbing was so excessive that it was difficult for some of them to move about, and almost impossible, without making great physical exertions, to get a fair view of either Belladrum or Pero Gomez. The former of these two, indeed, was so much surrounded by eager spectators that his trainer had to take him elsewhere to be saddled; but it may be mentioned that a better-tempered string of horses was rarely subjected to so intrusive a scrutiny. They all bore the jostling and hustling with wonderful equanimity, without evincing any signs of nervousness or fretfulness, and to this cause must be attributed also the unwonted absence of false starts, for which the Derby of 1869 will be remarkable. Border Knight and Martyrdom were walked about and saddled near Hermit's tree, and, like Hermit, they were not much troubled by the number of their admirers. Ladas seemed not to have grown much, and went very stiffly on his hind legs. Rupert was remarked for his size and his colour; Ethus was rather admired, and his Sussex friends protested he was in fine condition. Duke of Beaufort and The Drummer never looked better, and De Vere was in beautiful condition. He is an elegant little horse, full of quality, but altogether too small for a race of this description. Pero Gomez was full of muscle and power, but never was and never will be a beauty; and turning from him to Belladrum the contrast was remarkable. As far as appearances went, nothing in the paddock could be compared with Mr. Merry's horse, who looked and moved like the real aristocrat of the party. Perry Down attracted a good number of admirers, but the recent victories of his trial horse, Trocadero, and of his stable companion, Consul, were the cause of much of the attention that was paid to him. Unquestionably, however, he is a fine, strongly-framed horse, and ran conspicuously in the race till his leg gave way. Besides those which we have named, the field included Ryshworth, Tenedos, Defender, Tasman, Alpenstock, The Ægean, Neuchatel, and King Cophetua. None of this string but Ryshworth had much claim to notice, and Ryshworth's temper is so villanous that even his owner, with all his patience, must be tired of trusting him. At the usual time they cantered past the Stand, and Belladrum was honoured with as hearty and spontaneous a burst of cheering as we ever heard on a race-course. His action was as grand as ever, and he pulled Daley nearly out of the saddle. Pero Gomez also galloped with great freedom and power, but nothing went better than The Drummer, if so well. No one could fail to notice Pretender's stride and the amount of ground he covered, but still he did not please. Strange to say, neither at Newmarket nor at Epsom has he gained many friends. The Newmarket judges would not allow that he had a single good point about him, and the Epsom judges gave a nearly similar verdict. There are, however, more things to be desired in a racehorse than elegance and perfect symmetry, and, in proof, the first and second in the Derby, Pretender and Pero Gomez, are as plain-looking a pair as can be seen. The canters over, the twenty-two passed through the paddock on their way to the starting-post—where, by the way, more people were congregated than we ever remember to have seen—and showed themselves so docile and manageable that, after one slight failure, and almost before the multitude was prepared for it, the starter dropped his flag, and the race commenced.

Pero Gomez appeared to us a little slow in getting off, but the pace was so slow that it did not much signify. Neuchatel and Lord Hawthorn made as much running as they could, The Drummer also being close to the front, while Pretender lay well up in the middle, Pero Gomez being some way behind, and Belladrum and Ladas conspicuous in the extreme rear. Coming down the hill, Pero Gomez improved his position, but at Tattenham Corner the usual scrimmage took place, of which Sir Joseph Hawley's horse was this year the victim. It is extraordinary how people can persist in talking about the excellence of the Epsom course, when every year, year after year, the chances of some of the Derby horses are either jeopardized or annihilated by the casualties at that detested turn. To be able to whisk round sharp corners is no merit in a racehorse, and is not a quality calculated to improve the breed; and yet, in the great race of the year, the best horse of the year is annually exposed to dangers from which he can be only saved by good luck and the acrobatic dexterity of his [illegible] And, with all this, the Epsom authorities actually projected, and partially laid out, a new course, with a more dangerous turn than the present. On this occasion Thorwaldsen swerved in front of the Duke of Beaufort, who very nearly blundered on his nose, and stopped Pero Gomez, who was just coming through. Wells, who had some difficulty both in steadying his horse and in maintaining his own balance, was then compelled to go round his horses and take another line, and at that critical point of the race such a mischance was equivalent to a loss of three or four lengths. Pretender in this way secured a considerable advantage, and on coming into the straight took up the running, his immediate followers being The Drummer, Ryshworth, Rupert, and Duke of Beaufort. All these were in the race at that point, and Rupert for one moment looked as dangerous as anything. He fell back, however, and then The Drummer was going so well and so strongly that the shouting in his favour commenced. Opposite the Stand Pretender and Pero Gomez, who had made up his lost ground, drew away by themselves, and fought out the remainder of the race with desperate determination. Inch by inch the ground was contested; and, as each jockey called on his horse for a final effort, it was responded to in the gamest manner possible. The issue was in doubt up to the last stride, and we thought that Pero Gomez had just got his neck in front; but the judge said No, that he was in front in the next stride after passing the chair, and that Pretender was rapidly tiring, but just managed to retain a slight advantage at the critical instant; and so Sir Joseph Hawley missed winning his fifth Derby by a short head, and we felt very thankful that the responsibility of judging the race did not devolve on us. Meanwhile an equally desperate battle was going on, a length behind the leading pair, for the third place; and this The Drummer, who ran for some way in difficulties, but with unflinching gameness, secured by a head from Duke of Beaufort, Rupert, and Ryshworth, who were so close together that the judge could not place a fourth. Alpenstock was seventh, Martyrdom eighth, and the positions of the remainder are unimportant. Ethus was far behind, and Ladas and Belladrum were last of all. Poor Belladrum! It was Lady Elizabeth over again. She got off last, so did he; she went leisurely up the hill, and the people looked for her to come with her fine speed at the top; so did he, and the people looked likewise; she never came at all, neither did he. The first hill effectually stopped him, and when he got to the top, instead of getting to full speed, he wanted to stop altogether to take breath. He never got near his horses, and toiled along in the rear in company with Ladas, who, we fear, is a very dear purchase for his youthful owner. And yet the pace was very slow—2 min. 52½ sec.—nearly ten seconds more than in Kettledrum's year, and as a consequence there was much less tailing off than usual. Horses that could not live the pace in the Two Thousand were in good positions last Wednesday up to two hundred yards from the finish, and up to the last moment it was difficult to say which of four or five would get the third place, and that only a length from the winner. Belladrum's performance is quite inexplicable after the brilliant speed he showed a month ago, and we can only account for it by supposing that on the flat course at Newmarket he scarcely felt himself troubled by his affection of the throat. The Duke of Beaufort ran a good honest horse, and Rupert ran much more prominently then we expected. Ryshworth was in front for a long way, but stopped as usual when the struggle came. Nothing was looking better than Perry Down before he went lame, and he would most probably have been in the first three. Of the winner we will only say that he fairly deserved his honours, but we much question whether he would have won if Pero Gomez had had good luck at Tattenham Corner. However, they are both sound, game, good horses, and we hope they may come fit and well to the post at Doncaster to fight their battle over again. The question which of them is the better will not languish for want of disputants during the summer.

The Derby day, in point of favourable weather, was one in a thousand, and in other respects it presented the same hackneyed aspects as ever. The course was in beautiful order; the sunshine was brilliant, and yet there was no dust; and the country looked charming. At Epsom, on such a day as last Wednesday, it may be said that every prospect pleases, and only Tattenham Corner and the arrangements of the Grand Stand authorities are vile. The former more closely concerns owners of horses, who seem to have made up their minds that there must be some victims every year, and wh[illegible] hope that the lot may fall on their friends' horses, and not on their own. The latter affect the suffering public, the inutility of whose remonstrances is so universally acknowledged that the sound of them is almost silenced. Man is born to suffer, especially an Englishman in search of pleasure. The managers of the Grand Stand at Epsom fully understand this truth, and are singularly successful in enforcing it. Their method of procedure is very simple. They first screw money out of their visitors at every step, at every yard, on every conceivable pretext, and then they hamper and obstruct them in every possible way in their goings out and in their comings in, in their efforts to mount from the bottom to the top or to descend from the top to the bottom, in their struggles to get into the ring or to get out of the ring, and in their desire to obtain something eatable and drinkable at reasonable prices. In all its arrangements, in its entrances, and its passages, and its staircases, and its refreshment-rooms, the Epsom Grand Stand is ludicrously ill-adapted to the requirements of a great national festival.

CREASY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

When a book is written under great disadvantages, allowance must of course be made for the disadvantages. Still we cannot help taking into account how far the disadvantages are of the writer's own seeking. The remark was made by Lord Jeffrey, and before Lord Jeffrey it was made by Cato the Censor. If the Amphictyonic Council had ordered Aulus Postumius to write a book in Greek, he might have fairly asked for gentle criticism on any mistakes into which a foreigner might fall. But when Aulus wrote a book in Greek, no man constraining him thereto, he laid himself open, so Cato thought, to all the censure that might be inherently due to his mistakes. So when Sir Edward Creasy tells us that he writes at Colombo, and that at Colombo there is "no copious historical library," we are not surprised that his book lacks somewhat which it might have gained if it had been written within a stone's throw of the Bodleian or the British Museum. But then we cannot help asking whether a man who, by his own account, has neither a good library of his own nor access to a good public library has any business to write a History of England at all. Sir Edward Creasy tells us honestly that his book is made up from old lectures, that the manuscripts of his old lectures "do not in general give him the means for a complete set of references," and that Colombo contains no library from which he can now collect them. That is, as we understand Sir Edward Creasy, he has actually turned his lectures into a narrative without having those books at his elbow without which a careful writer would not venture to write or revise a line. Modern books sometimes reach him and sometimes do not; but we must say for him that he seems delighted with them when he does get them. Writing under these difficulties, we are surprised that Sir Edward Creasy has not written a much worse book than he has written. But under these difficulties it is certain that no good book can be written. Sir Edward Creasy does not despise his subject, for he shows a real liking for it and some understanding of it. But he trifles with it; the account of his way of writing it shows that he has no notion of the sort of work which is needful to produce a really sterling history. In fact Sir Edward Creasy has been rather too much in the habit of putting forth slight books in order to suit what is supposed to be the popular taste. He wrote a rather pretty book about Decisive Battles. When the English Constitution was thought to be in danger, he wrote a book on the English Constitution. When everybody was talking about the Turks, he wrote a History of the Turks. If our memory does not greatly fail us, when a French invasion was expected, he wrote a book on expected Invasions. A man who is used to do this kind of thing is not likely to sit down to really hard work. Sir Edward Creasy's History of England is not so flimsy as his History of the Turks, but it is very far from being what a History of England ought to be.

Sir Edward Creasy, however, has some good points; let us therefore do full justice to those good points. He writes in a fair, honest, candid spirit, with no violent prejudices one way or another, but with an evident wish to do justice to all sides. He has a very good appreciation of personal character; his portraits are by no means badly drawn in point of power, and his way of looking at men and their actions is fair and generous. Neither does he write in the interest of any political or theological party; in a struggle between a King and a Bishop he can see elements of right and good on both sides. His style is sometimes meagre and slipshod; but it is clear and unaffected, and without a particle of grandeur. He has an amusing way of patting his betters on the back, but it is done in simplicity and not in arrogance. And we must remember that the narrative is made up from scraps of lectures, and in lectures addressed to a youthful audience it is often necessary to point out the authors to be studied, and to introduce Hallam or Palgrave in a way in which it seems ludicrous to introduce them in a formal history. Altogether there is that in Sir Edward Creasy which, if he had written in some place where there was a copious historical library, and if he had really taken pains with what he wrote, might have enabled him to turn out something much better than what he has turned out.

The book then is made up out of lectures delivered, we fancy, from twenty to thirty years ago. Now, if it had been published twenty or thirty years ago, it might be judged according to the standard of that time. But Sir Edward Creasy does not equably represent the standard of that time. Neither does he represent the standard of the present time. He has, as we have said, read some of the things which have been published since, but not all. And the effect is odd. It seems to be quite a toss-up whether a given book reaches Colombo or not. It is perhaps hardly to be expected that all the publications of the Archæological Institute should reach Colombo. But the result is that we have another blind guide labouring at the earliest history of Englan in all the darkness of the days before Dr. Guest. Sir Franci Palgrave's Normandy and England seems to have reached him onl while he was correcting his proof-sheets; Mr. Freeman's Norma Conquest seems not to have reached him at all. But he has rea Mr. Bryce, and accordingly the Holy Roman Empire is trotted ou to be patted on the back:—

> The necessity which the Germans found of combining under one chie against the Hungarians caused the new revival of the Roman Empire, o rather, of the creation of "The Holy Roman Empire," which endured unti the present century. The rise of this empire, its relations with the Italian and especially its conflicts with the Papacy, are subjects which must not b neglected by the student who desires to comprehend the history of England or of any other State of Christendom, during an important part of th middle ages.

When we are told that the history of the Empire "must not b neglected," we are reminded of the Scotch minister who prayed the Almighty to take care of the Great and the Little Cumbrae, and "not to forget the adjacent islands of Great Britain and Ireland."

And so it goes on; books seem to be alternately known and unknown. The first two Angevin Kings are done as they might be done before the wonderful portraits of them drawn by Professo Stubbs; and the Crusades, which Sir Edward Creasy condescendingly pronounces to be "remarkable enterprises," are done as the First Crusade might be done before Sir Francis Palgrave's fourt volume had made its way across the Indian Ocean. But t make up, when he reaches Henry the Third, he has read Dr. Shirley, and Dr. Shirley is accordingly patted on the back, as well as Mr. Bryce, the Empire, and the Crusades. Dr. Shirley's preface to the Royal and Historical Letters is pronounced to be "a most valuable contribution to our history," and elsewhere we are assured that "there is great value in his remarks," and that "the whole of his preface to the Monumenta Franciscana," which we had always thought was written by Mr. Brewer, is "well worth perusal." Dr. Hook too will doubtless be glad to learn that he "has written admirably on the men and measures of this period." So, to go back to older writers, we hear of "Mr. Hallam's eloquent observations" and Mr. Forsyth's "valuable remarks." Mr. Hartshorne has been less lucky; it is still, in the absence of copious historical libraries, believed at Colombo that "Edward II. was born in Wales, in the new royal castle of Carnarvon."

These after-studies of Sir Edward Creasy have had two peculiar effects on his book. They do now and then help him to a reference by misadventure. Though the lectures which Sir Edward Creasy carried off with him to Ceylon contained no references, yet the books which have since followed him thither do; so it happens that, through the help of Sir Francis Palgrave or of Dr. Shirley, a line or two of the original authorities does now and then find its way into the pages of Sir Edward Creasy. But there is another effect also. When a man gets a new book anywhere, it is likely to occupy his thoughts for a while more than the old books. Its merits or defects will be for a season the thing uppermost in his mind. We are ourselves just now thinking more about Sir Edward Creasy than we are about Sir Francis Palgrave. And we can quite understand that the pleasure of getting a new book at Colombo must be still greater than the pleasure of getting a new book anywhere in England. So it is not wonderful if Sir Edward Creasy's head is very full of his new books when he gets them. He is in the same sort of state of mind as a child with a new doll, a girl with a new lover, or a Church with a new dogma. The new for a season puts the old out of sight. So Sir Edward Creasy, when he gets a new book, flies off at a tangent. Something or other strikes him, something of which he approves or of which he disapproves, and he gives a note to set forth or to dispute the new position, of a length quite disproportionate to the scale of the work. It thus comes about that important parts of the narrative are carelessly slurred over in the text, while incidental points are dwelt on in the notes with needless fulness. Thus in the years from 449 to 1154 we have references in abundance to Palgrave—who is obligingly described as a "most learned and able historian" and is somewhat condescendingly pronounced to be "quite right"—to Kemble, Grimm, Milman, Guizot, and Sir Edward Creasy himself, to say nothing of Dr. Latham and what Sir Edward Creasy calls "the excellent history of our country by M. de Bonnechose" (a book of grotesque blunders called "Les Quatre Conquêtes de l'Angleterre"); while there is but one single extract from Bæda, namely the story of Gregory meeting the English children, and one single extract from the Chronicles, namely a portion of the Lay of Brunanburh worked into the text. Now setting aside Dr. Latham, M. de Bonnechose, and Sir Edward Creasy, for all Sir Edward's other authorities we have a profound respect, as well as for his later lights, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Brewer, and Dr. Shirley. But we certainly think that nothing that could be done would be more painful to any of those great scholars who are still among us than to see themselves thus trotted out and glorified in the places of the original writers to whose study and illustration their labours have been devoted. And, after all, when we see Sir Edward Creasy patronizing Sir Francis Palgrave, we are irresistibly reminded of a proverb about teaching one's grandam to suck eggs.

To turn to the matter of Sir Edward Creasy's History, it is not very wonderful if, when he put together his lectures thirty years ago, he had no idea what the English nation was. The first sentence of the book might give us some hopes. "The land we live in has been called England for about ten centuries." To be sure it would be hard to find an instance of the use of the name "Englaland" before the eleventh century, but Sir Edward Creasy most likely believes, as some time ago people did believe, that the name was introduced by Act of Parliament in the days of Ecgberht. Still, bating the ten centuries, we could not think of a better beginning than the statement that the name England is comparatively recent. But instead of going on to tell us from the very beginning why it is called England, Sir Edward goes on with some geographic talk a good deal of which is to the purpose, and some patriotic twaddle none of which is to the purpose, and with the information that Arnold was "one of the ablest commentators on the history of ancient Greece," that Hallam was "the most discerning and most impartial of English historians," and that Niebuhr was "the greatest master of historical knowledge that modern Germany has produced." Indeed, throughout his opening chapter Sir Edward writes as if he were bestowing prizes at a competitive examination. We see that Arnold, Hallam, and Niebuhr have all got very good marks. But Sir Edward goes a step further. In the process of educating his grandam he goes up as high as grandmother Tethys and her venerable spouse. Byron told Ocean that "Time writes no wrinkle on his azure brow," but Sir Edward Creasy has found out a way to pat Ocean himself on the back and to assure him that he is "the mightiest instrument in the civilization of mankind."

* History of England from the Earliest to the Present Time. 5 vols. By Sir Edward S. Creasy, M.A. Vol. I. London: James Walton. 1869.

By this sort of thing, and by a great deal about Phœnicians, Romans, and Britons, we are separated from Sir Edward Creasy's theory of the English people, which when we get to it runs thus:—

> Four races of men have principally formed our English nation; first, the Britons, who, as we have seen, were Romanised Celts; secondly, the Anglo-Saxons, who were Germans; thirdly, the Danes from Scandinavia; and, fourthly, the Normans, who were a composite race, originally Scandinavian, but largely mingled, before their arrival here, with the Frankish and Roman-Gallic populations of the Continent.
> Of these four races, the German (that is, the Anglo-Saxon), though only second in point of date of settlement here, is first in importance. The name, by which our country is best known in the world; the name, which is dearest and most familiar to us, is a German word. England is the land of the Engles or Angles—the German tribe that gave a new collective appellation to the southern and best part of the island, while the new and permanent appellations of many parts of it, such as Sussex, Essex, Middlesex, were taken from the Saxons, the other chief tribe of our German forefathers. Our language, though now apparently so different from German, was given to us by Germans, and is still essentially a German tongue. And although our institutions, our population, our national character, have been greatly modified by the admixture of other elements, they still have more of the old Teutonic type in them than of any other; and we can yet point to ancient Germany as the source whence the main stream of the English nation has flowed.

We mean to come back to Sir Edward Creasy another time. For the present we will stop with this, a specimen of the sort of thing against which we spend our lives in fighting. It is the usual blunder of putting the successive infusions which have more or less affected our nation and our history on a level with the one original stock itself. But there are some special aggravations. Our language, though apparently so different from German, was given us by Germans. Our language, let us tell Sir Edward Creasy, was given us by nobody. In the only sense in which the word "German" can be used in the matter at all, instead of our language being "given us by Germans," we are Germans, speaking a German tongue. But no word can be more misleading for any such purpose than the word German. Sir Edward Creasy has evidently no idea of any Teutonic tongue except the High-Dutch which we learn as part of a polite education. In this sense no doubt our language is very "different from German," not only apparently but really. But then with High-Dutch, we who "eat and drink" and do not "essen" and "trinken," have nothing directly to do. It is very likely that, when Sir Edward Creasy put together his lectures a generation back, the difference between High-Dutch and Low-Dutch was unknown. A generation or two earlier again Bishop Percy felt his way as one propounding a paradox when he ventured to hint that Celts and Teutons were not one people. Bishop Percy was in advance of his age; Sir Edward Creasy, thirty years back, was perhaps not behind his; but it is really too bad to dish up again now the præ-scientific philology which in præ-scientific days might be pardoned.

TRAVELS OF THE BUDDHIST PILGRIMS.*

MANY are the legendary accounts of the introduction of Buddhism into China. That most generally received is that Ming-ti (62 A.D.), the second Emperor of the Eastern Han dynasty, saw in a vision in the night "an image, nineteen feet high, resplendent as gold, and its head surmounted with a halo as bright as the sun," which approached his palace and advancing towards him thus spake:—"Buddha bids you send to the west countries to search for books and images, that you may obtain a knowledge of him." This dream, if dream it were, was doubtless suggested by the sight of a golden image of Buddha, which had previously been brought to China by General Hou kiu-ping after a successful campaign against the Hioung-nu. Be that as it may, the Emperor was not disobedient to the vision, but despatched an embassy to the West, which returned to Lo-yang laden with books and images.

The Chinese people were at this time peculiarly ripe for the reception of a religion, more especially for Buddhism. Their two great teachers—Laou-tsze, the founder of the Taouist sect, and Confucius—had not only awakened them to a sense of their depravity, but had created in their breasts a desire for something more than mere moral maxims and ritualistic observances, which were all that they had to give them, and caused them to long for a religion which should spiritualize their morality, and teach them the circumstances and conditions of the future state. Had not Laou-tsze, moreover, foreshadowed the Buddhist Nirvana in his "state of absolute vacuity," and the way to destroy Karma in his "indefinite impalpable Taou"? It has been suggested that a vague expression used by Confucius with reference to a sage who was to appear in the West may have contributed to the eagerness with which the embassy of which we have spoken was despatched, and the delight with which after it had succeeded its return was hailed. Upon this expression also has been founded the legend that, about the time of Christ, the Chinese so vividly expected the advent of a God in the flesh that they despatched envoys to the West to hail their expected Redeemer, that their envoys encountered Buddhist missionaries on their way from India, who announced to them Buddha as an incarnate God, and thus induced them to present him to their countrymen instead of the true Messiah. After an absence of eleven years the embassy sent by the Emperor Ming-ti returned, accompanied by the Indian Kâsyamâtunga, who, with his compatriot Tsu-fah-lan, who shortly followed him to China, translated five Buddhist works into Chinese, amongst which were the Sutra of the Forty-two Sections, the Dasabhûmi Sutra, and the Lalita Vistara. From this time Buddhism prevailed throughout the country. A succession of Indian priests arrived who translated the sacred writings and instructed the people in the laws of Buddha, and numbers were daily added to the worshippers of the golden image which Ming-ti, the Emperor, had set up. Temples were built in many of the large cities, and in 335 A.D. native Chinese were for the first time permitted to take Buddhist monastic vows. So rapid was the progress of the religion that in the year 350 A.D. there had been erected, in Lo-yang (the modern Honan-fu) alone, "forty-two pagodas from three to nine stories high, richly painted and formed after Indian models."

But, notwithstanding the success which the religion of Buddha had met with in China, it vexed the righteous souls of the more ardent of the new religionists, among whom was Fah-hian, the author of the travels before us, to observe the "fragmentary character of the rules of the Buddhist discipline as they were then known in China," and the imperfect translations into Chinese of the Buddhist Scriptures. It was determined therefore to send an army to Koutché, a kingdom to the westward of Lake Lob, to bring back a learned Indian priest, Kumâragiva by name, who might supply correct versions of the chief books as yet known in the country. This the army accomplished, and Kumâragiva, assisted by eight hundred priests, entered on his task, and to him we owe many of the standard translations of the Buddhist sacred writings now existing in China. While Kumâragiva and his associates were thus employed, Fah-hian resolved to go to India to collect the books that were wanting to form a complete code of the laws and ordinances of Buddha. On his return he published an account of his travels in a volume variously entitled "Fŭhkwŏ che," or an account of the Buddhist kingdoms; "Fah-hian chuen," or Fah-hian's narrative; and "Fah-hian hing chuen," or the narrative of Fah-hian's journeyings, which is the original of the translation before us. In the year 1836 M. Remusat published the only translation of the "Fŭhkwŏ che" that up to this time has appeared, of which work M. Julien, the first Sinologue in Europe, said it was 'très recommandable pour l'époque où il a été publié." If this was a just estimate of the work, then may we affirm, making every allowance for the greater facilities now existing for the accomplishment of the task, that Mr. Beal's is a very excellent translation. Chinese is confessedly a difficult language, and the Indian priests employed to translate their native works into Chinese have, either by inventing expressions or by giving them unusual significations, further complicated its intricacies; at every turn also we meet with long Indian names of places and men represented either phonetically by Chinese characters, or else translated into that language, with nothing to reveal them as such but the instinct of the translator and the nature of the context. We congratulate Mr. Beal on his success in this part of his undertaking. In almost every instance he has succeeded in unearthing the Indian name from its quasi-Chinese equivalent, and in so doing he has earned the thanks of that daily increasing section of the public which is interested in the geography of Central Asia. He has also not only thoroughly mastered all the information already acquired on the subject, but has succeeded, in the ample yet compact notes that accompany the text, in bringing it to bear on elucidating the obscurities and explaining the seeming anachronisms of Fah-hian's narrative.

In the year 400 A.D. Fah-hian, with all the earnestness of a religious enthusiast, carrying neither scrip nor purse, set out with nine companions on his pilgrimage to India. And it is a noticeable fact that, so completely had his religious belief humbled his national pride, throughout his book he applies the haughty title of Chung kwŏ, or Middle Kingdom, universally arrogated by the Chinese to their native land, to India, the home of his religion, and speaks of China as peen kwŏ, or Bordering Nation. From much the same cause he for the most part omits to describe the features of the countries through which he passed, but fills page after page with minute descriptions of the different religious observances peculiar to the inhabitants. The difficulties he had to encounter between Chang-ngan, the modern Si-ngan, the place of his departure, and Khoten might well have deterred a less adventurous spirit, and served to render his progress slow. Arrived at Changyay, a frontier town in the province of Kansüh, he found the country in such an unsettled state that the roads were unsafe for passengers, and he was therefore obliged to accept the hospitality of the prince of the land until the danger was overpast. Thence he passed into the inhospitable desert of Gobi, where he tells us there are "sirocco winds which kill all who encounter them. There are no birds or beasts to be seen; but as far as the eye can reach the route is marked out by the bleached bones of men who have perished in the attempt to cross the desert." After travelling seventeen days in this dreary waste he arrived at the kingdom of Shen-shen, and thence proceeded to Khoten, and passing onwards by successive stages to Yu-hwui, crossing the Tsung-ling mountains to Toli and on to Oudyana, he entered India by way of Peshawur. As might have been expected from so devout a Buddhist, Fah-hian observed with great punctuality the different periods of rest established by the ordinances of Buddha, and at Yu-hwui "went into retreat." Mr. Beal has missed the meaning of the characters gan chü, here signifying went into retreat, and has translated them rested; but in this instance, as also generally in Buddhist writings, the expression gan chü, when used as a verb, has the signification we have attached to it. A very noticeable feature in the narrative before us is the extreme hospitality everywhere shown towards Fah-hian and his companions; only once do we hear of their meeting with a cold reception; for though, as we are told, at Oudyana the hospitality extended to them was limited to a period of three days, this fact did not arise from a desire on the part of their hosts to get rid of them, but was in accordance with a custom of the country. This custom, Mr. Beal informs us in a note, is as old as the time of Alexander the Great, and in reference to it he quotes a passage from Cunningham mentioning how Appollonius said that "after three days he would leave the King of Taxila, who had entertained him for that time." At each place relics of Buddha were eagerly sought for by the pilgrims—such as his alms bowl, his staff, his footprints; even the place where he pared his nails, the place where he dried his clothes, the places where he sat down, and the places where he walked about were gazed on by them with mingled awe and ecstacy. At Hidda Fah-hian had the happiness to behold a piece of the veritable skull of Buddha, which he describes as a bone of a "yellowish-white colour, about four inches square, and somewhat elevated in the middle." By this time Fah-hian had been separated, either by diversity of interest or by the stroke of death, from seven of his original companions; and now, in crossing the snowy mountains after leaving Hidda, Hwui-ying, one of his two remaining associates, succumbed to the excessive cold and the overwhelming difficulties of the route. Feeling his end approaching, he addressed Fah-hian thus:—"'It is impossible for me to recover; whilst there is time do you press forward, lest we all perish.' And upon this he presently died. Fah-hian attempted by cherishing him to supply warmth, and piteously invoked him by his familiar name, but it was all ineffectual to restore life." Disheartened, but not despairing, Fah-hian pushed forward with his solitary companion to Picha, and thence, by Mattra, Sankisa, Kosala, and Vâisâli, to Patna, and on to Benares, where, after visiting the Deer-park of the Rishis, celebrated in Buddhist history, he returned again to Patna. Up to this time he had been unsuccessful in the real object of his pilgrimage—namely, the obtaining of Buddhist works—for he found that in the north of India there was no written law of Buddha, but that its ordinances were handed down by oral tradition from one generation of priests to another. At Patna, however, he met with a large library, and there remained for the space of three years, learning to read and speak Sanskrit, and copying the Precepts. That time being accomplished, To-ching, his fellow-pilgrim, was so charmed with the religious bearing of the Indian priests that he bound himself by an oath to spend the remainder of his life among them; but "Fah-hian, desiring with his whole heart to spread the knowledge of the Precepts throughout the land of Han (China), returned alone." From Patna, then, he proceeded to Tamluc, near the mouth of the Hooghly, where he spent two years "writing out copies of the sacred books, and procuring impressions of the figures (used in worship)"; and thence, taking ship, set sail for Ceylon. It was now the object of Fah-hian's heart to return to his native land; as he says himself, he had "been absent from China many years; the manners and customs of the people with whom he had intercourse were entirely strange to him. The towns, people, mountains, valleys, plants and trees, which met his eyes were unlike those of old times. Moreover, his fellow-travellers were now separated from him—some had remained behind, and some were dead—to think upon the past was all that was left to him! and so his heart was continually saddened." But, notwithstanding this most natural desire, he stayed two years in the island, and during that time succeeded in adding many treasures to his store of books. At last he set sail, and in spite of adverse winds, fierce storms, and no small perils by sea, he landed on the coast of Shantung. After an absence of fifteen years, during which time he had traversed thirty different countries, "in the year Kea-yin [414—415 A.D.], being the tenth year of the reign of I Hi of the Tsin dynasty, when the star Sheou was just emerging from the summer mansion, Fah-hian, the pilgrim, returned home."

The narrative of the mission of Hwui-seng and Sung-yun loses much of the interest that would otherwise attach to it, from the fact that their route lay through the same countries which had been traversed by Fah-hian a century earlier. Although the object of their mission was ostensibly the same as that which induced Fah-hian to expatriate himself for fifteen years—namely, to obtain Buddhist books—their position as envoys rendered their reception in the different countries through which they passed of a much more formal and courtly character than that accorded to the pilgrim. In fact, it is as envoys that they figure throughout the narrative; there is no expression of that ardent desire after religious knowledge so conspicuous in the Fûhkwŏ che, while the constant references to charms and magical arts mark the stride which Buddhism had made since the time of Fah-hian towards its superstitious development of later years. Hwui-seng and Sung-yun travelled as far as Peshawur, and after an absence of three years returned to China.

THE LIFE OF SARPI.*

WHEN it was understood two or three years ago that a new Life of Sarpi was being prepared by a lady who had devoted herself to the study of Venetian MSS., a confident opinion was felt and expressed that the promised biography ought to be one of the most interesting in the world. Few persons have played so important a part as Sarpi in a great crisis of history, and of still fewer has so little been certainly known. Many books in many languages have been written about him, but there is still the widest divergency of view about the true nature of his character and religious belief, and even about some important events of his life. The narrow jealousy which, under the old régime, guarded all the Italian archives, as the archives of the Vatican are still guarded, from critical inspection, rendered it impossible for these disputed questions to be set at rest. And thus it has come to pass that two very different parties have claimed Sarpi as their hero, with neither of which can he have had any genuine sympathy. The patent facts about him were that he had written a history of the Council of Trent in a strongly anti-Roman sense, and that he had given the whole weight of his high ability and still higher reputation to support the Venetian Government against the encroachments of the Papacy. Two inconsistent but equally intelligible explanations of this conduct were ready at hand, and both have been adopted by different writers according to their predilections. It has been left for his present biographer, with that slight inaccuracy of mind not unusual in her sex, to combine both. On the one hand, Sarpi has been represented, both by friends and foes, as a concealed Protestant, and there is much to render such a notion a plausible one, and indeed to show that during his life he was not unwilling to encourage it. He even on one occasion told a Protestant diplomatist that he agreed with him in thinking the Pope Anti-Christ, though a contrary opinion is expressed in his writings. He was in correspondence with many distinguished Calvinists. Diodati, the translator of the Italian Bible, came to Venice to visit him, and spent some time in his company there. Bishop Bedell, who was Sir Henry Wotton's chaplain at Venice before he was raised to the Bench, knew him intimately, and stated, whether correctly or not, that it was his habit to omit the words of consecration in saying mass; and his history of the Council was first published, without his authority, in England by Archbishop De Dominis, who had joined the Anglican Church, and then held the Deanery of Windsor. Miss Campbell insists that he did not believe in the doctrine of the mass or of purgatory—not apparently perceiving that, if so, his conduct in daily saying mass, and continuing to the last to act as a priest and monk of the Church of Rome, was deeply discreditable to him. But the more general, which is also the more favourable, view of his career has been, both in his lifetime and since, that he was an honest but enlightened, or what would now be called a liberal, Catholic. There is abundant evidence of the existence of such a party in his day, sincerely attached to the Roman Catholic Church, but convinced that the extravagant pretensions of the modern Papacy, the means by which they had been upheld, and the objects which they aimed at, involved a grave departure from the principles of Christian antiquity, and had chiefly contributed to discredit Catholicism itself with thoughtful minds, and to alienate half Europe from the communion of the Church. Sarpi's outward professions are in accordance with this line of thought, and it would serve to explain his conduct. The Council of Trent had failed to place any effective check on the growing power of the Roman Court, and it was the ruling aim of the newly enrolled militia of the Jesuits to extend it in every way. Naturally, therefore, it would be the object of a Catholic of the Liberal school to counteract that power, and to curtail—or, if possible, crush—the influence of the Jesuits. And these were, in fact, the prominent objects of Sarpi's public life. That he sought to effect them by what has since been termed an Erastian policy can hardly be made matter of blame to him, for it might well seem at the time that the indirect action of civil legislation was the only available means of bringing about what the last Council of the Church had been unable to accomplish. And thus, while Protestants have eagerly claimed his name as that of a brilliant though baffled Reformer, some Catholics have raised him to a pinnacle of almost unexampled honour as a man who united more than the genius of a Bossuet to all the sanctity of a Savonarola. We should be glad to accept their verdict. But honesty is the truest policy, and in this case Roman jealousy of investigation has only served to shield one of the ablest and bitterest foes of Rome from merited obloquy.

* The Life of Fra Paolo Sarpi. By Arabella Georgina Campbell. From Original MSS. London: Molini & Green. 1869.

Paolo Sarpi was neither a hero, a patriot, nor a saint. He was neither a liberal Catholic of lofty views, too much in advance of his age to leave his mark permanently upon it, nor a pious and persecuted Protestant hiding his light under a bushel. A man of rare genius and great learning of course he was; that we knew before. But he is now shown, on his own evidence, to have been also a profound hypocrite. His History of the Council of Trent, though his most celebrated, is by no means his only, published work. Till we turned to a note at the end of her volume, which we shall have occasion to refer to by-and-by, we supposed that Miss Campbell, who is needlessly diffuse in lauding Sarpi's mathematical and scientific labours, had never heard of his works on civil government, which are, however, among the most conspicuous monuments of his intellectual vigour. While his treatise on the Venetian Republic, published after his death, equals the power, it more than equals the baseness, real or reputed, of Macchiavelli's Prince. So far from having that ardent devotion to the cause of freedom with which his new biographer credits him, he is proved to have been a rigid and wholly unscrupulous absolutist. He not only advises strict censorship of the press and a despotic system of government, but advocates the Tarquinian policy of getting rid of men influential enough to be dangerous to the State, and suggests poison as the best means of doing so. When he was stabbed on the bridge of La Guerra, he exclaimed—which, by the way, Miss Campbell omits to tell us—"Cognosco stilum Curiæ Romanæ"; but the assassins, whether authorized by the Pope or not—and there is no direct proof of it—were only carrying out Sarpi's own principles. And it is not a little remarkable that, when most of his books were placed on the Index, the one maintaining this monstrous theory was spared. Secret murder for the interest of the Church had in fact been recommended by Catholic writers of the day, and St. Charles Borromeo and Pope Pius V. had approved it. In an age of fierce religious conflict it is conceivable that such a view might come to be conscientiously entertained, shocking as it is. But it is not conceivable that a religious man, or indeed a believer in Christianity, should deliberately advocate, not only despotism, but secret murder, for no better end than State convenience. Nor are we left to mere inference, however sure, as to the true nature of Sarpi's religious opinions. His private diaries are still preserved, and of course contain the most trustworthy record of his real sentiments. It is clear from them that he rejected not only the Divine authority of the Roman Catholic Church, but the Divine origin of Christianity, which is treated simply as a phase of human thought, important and interesting as such, but nothing more. His defence of absolutism and assassination was not therefore inconsistent with his religious belief, and in opposing the influence of Rome he was not, like some of his Catholic contemporaries and later admirers, seeking the emancipation of the Church from the yoke of Papal tyranny, but attacking the only power which, in his age and country, could offer any resistance, however feeble and uncertain, to the arbitrary domination of the State.

This is not, however, the view that we should gather from Miss Campbell's book. To her Sarpi is a persecuted confessor for the Protestant doctrine of justification. With a subject of surpassing interest, and with original sources of information, open to no previous biographer, at her command, she has written what, but for the interest of her subject, which the clumsiest handling cannot altogether suppress, would be one of the most wearisome volumes it was ever our lot to wade through. Nor are the reasons far to seek. The authoress is not only destitute, to all appearance, of any special qualifications for her self-imposed task, but she labours under several positive disqualifications. The very uninviting get-up and typography of the volume may perhaps be excused on the plea of economy, while the numerous misprints and the excruciating method of punctuation suggest, as the most charitable hypothesis, that there was no attempt made to correct the proofs. Still, the constant occurrence of such phenomena as "the poet Catullus," the "Book of Cammon Prayer," "Primes" apparently for Princes, "horotary" for hortatory, "fedis" for sedis, and the like, has an ugly look. It is still more difficult to account for the utter omission, in a work where such aids are peculiarly requisite, of anything in the shape of a table of contents or an index, while the headings of the chapters throw the least possible light on the obscure confusion of their contents. Nor is this the worst. The writer is not only guiltless of anything that can be called style; she has failed to attain any mastery over the idiom, not to say the grammar, of her own language, and her habitual use, or abuse, of the personal and relative pronouns would baffle the acutest interpreter of a corrupt Greek chorus. In the very first page we are informed that Sarpi was "a remarkable man of his own or of any other age"; and a few pages later we are told that it is a mistake "to represent the Republic either so cruel or so persecuting as other nations." Many sentences are so worded as to be wholly unintelligible, while many more can only be explained by a liberal application of the figure called by grammarians σχῆμα πρὸς τὸ σημαινόμενον. What, for instance, is to be gathered from the following extraordinary paragraph?—

> Much against his will, Fra Paolo was commissioned not only to hear confession in other churches besides those of his own order, but in company with the other Counsellors of the Cardinal to give judgment in cases of conscience. He did not leave any written condemnation of it, but that he did not approve of being himself a confessor, may be gathered from the fact, that his name having been duly sought by a member of the Church of Rome, who was at great pains to ascertain the truth, the name of Fra Paolo Sarpi is not to be found amongst those who heard confession. The power exercised by the Jesuits by constant confession was strongly censured by him, and one thing is certain that his confessions were chiefly made to God.

Does "it" mean confession—as the sense, if there is any, seems to require—or the Archbishop's asking him to hear confessions, which is the only meaning, if any, to be got out of the words? What, again, is meant by "his name being duly sought by a member of the Church of Rome?" and what possible bearing has the result on his approval, or disapproval, of confession? We should like, by the way, to know the writer's authority for the strange assertion, a page or two afterwards, that St. Charles Borromeo "endeavoured to prohibit the eating of meat on Sunday." Is it a misprint for Friday? One more instance of Miss Campbell's idiosyncracies of thought and construction may suffice:—

> A system of religious opinions which requires a man to write against his will by command in favour of the Pope Paul V. (and on more than one occasion Bellarmine declared that he did not agree with the Pope), cannot be orthodox Christianity, but is an upholder of falsehood. It is profound as the ocean, yet clear to its utmost depths, it is as high as the heavens, and yet is not beyond the reach of the most simple. It is wide as the universe, and yet cannot be bound within finite limits. It is divine, and therefore cannot be amalgamated with what is untrue.

We presume the "It" on which so much eloquence is expended means orthodox Christianity—that is, the Lutheran doctrine of justification; but, by all grammatical rules, it ought to mean a system which requires men to write against their will in favour of Pope Paul V. And this brings us to a still graver disqualification of the authoress for doing justice to her subject than any linguistic deficiencies. A really valuable life of Sarpi might be written, with command of the requisite materials, by a liberal and intelligent Roman Catholic, or an impartial outsider like most of the German critical historians. But the very worst person to undertake the task is an orthodox Protestant, in Miss Campbell's sense of the word, who gauges the merits and demerits of her characters by their holding right views on justification by faith and predestination, as against "the heretical opinions of Molina," and who can believe no evil of a man who cites authorities regarded as heretical at Rome, and always maintained his "disbelief in the supremacy of a Pope to a Council, as also of his infallibility." To such a mind the temptation to convert the life of Sarpi into a Protestant hagiography is too strong for any evidence to overcome. We are not, therefore, at all surprised to find Miss Campbell insisting, in the teeth of the clearest evidence, on "his enlightened opinions on liberty of conscience, and his thorough faith in the truths of the Christian religion," or to be told that it is a mistake to regard his History of the Council of Trent as the work of a partisan. She adds, indeed, to prove that it was not undertaken out of revenge for his attempted murder, that he "had written much of it in early life." But the only "evidence" for this, which she considers quite "sufficient," is the probability that when he was residing at Mantua, as a youth of twenty, Camillo Olivo suggested to him the idea of composing such a history. The precise truth about the matter can never be ascertained until the secrets of the Vatican are laid open; but the revelation is far likelier to diminish than to augment Sarpi's reputation for candour. Meanwhile it is abundantly certain that his history is "the work of a partisan." Of course Pallavicini's is a partisan work too. The only question is how to apportion the measure of studied inexactness between them. The history of the Council, like the biography of Sarpi, has yet to be written. And we must be content to wait for it till those who can be trusted to write impartially have access to the original documents.

And now we have a word to say, in conclusion, as to Miss Campbell's treatment of the too famous "Maxims on the Government of the Republic of Venice," already referred to. In the body of the work there is no allusion to the book, and we began to think she could never have heard of its existence. But in a note of nearly half a page, at the end of the volume, she thinks "it may be as well to observe that it was not written by him." It is certainly very necessary to observe this, if her estimate of Sarpi's character is the right one; and it was open to her to insist, if she pleased, that there are doubts on the subject, though we believe the weight of evidence in favour of the authenticity of the treatise is really quite conclusive. We have no space to enter at length on the question here, but a few words will suffice to show the utter worthlessness of such attempts at argument on the other side as Miss Campbell condescends to make. We are summarily informed that "no one of the learned has ever pronounced it his." Now, to go no further—and we could name many more authorities—it is expressly pronounced to be his by Daru, Botta, Cantu, and Ferrari. Ferrari, at least, is a sufficiently impartial witness. He has no theological antipathies to Sarpi, his interest in whom is purely political, and he is himself a professed atheist. He says: "Assai deboli sono gli argomenti con quali ne fu negata l' autenticità." It is true, no doubt, that the patriotic Venetians, who have always reverenced Sarpi as a national hero, reject the treatise, just as many Prussians reject the authenticity of the manuscript diaries of their hero Frederick the Great, for a precisely similar reason. To admit it would be at once to hurl their idol from his pedestal. It is hardly too much to say that no single writer rejects the authenticity of Sarpi's treatise who is not, as a partisan, compelled to do so. But Miss Campbell is still less felicitous when she comes from general assertions to the citation of particular testimonies in favour of her view. She rests her case on a passage from Cicogna, telling us that "in a note in the handwriting of Father Giovanni, an Augustinian, on the article 'Canale,' is the following in Gradenigo's Chronicles"; and then follows the extract, saying that the treatise was written, not by Sarpi, but by the bastard Canale. What Cicogna really says is, "Il padre Giovanni degli Agostini in una nota di suo pugno nella cronaca cittadinessa dei Gradenigo, all' art. Canale, dice, un bastardo," &c., and then come the lines which Miss Campbell quotes. Observe, in the first place, the man's name was Agostini, not "Father Giovanni, an Augustinian"; and the work is the family chronicle of the Gradenigos, not "Gradenigo's Chronicles," which has no existence except in her own imagination. In the next place, Cicogna, though a laborious, is a very inexact, writer, and, like all Venetians, a devout admirer of Sarpi, so that the note in an obscure manuscript was very welcome to him. But it possesses no sort of authority. The chronicle is merely a private family history, and nobody knows anything of Father Agostini, unless he was the learned Franciscan of that name who published a history of Venetian writers, which does not reach to Sarpi, in the middle of the last century. If so, he was certainly not a contemporary witness. This is Miss Campbell's way of getting rid of an inconvenient document and ignoring a great controversy. But what accuracy could be expected from a writer who talks about the "Decretals of Gratian," meaning the Decretum, though the two things are clearly distinguished in a passage quoted from Sarpi on the very same page?

CHAUCER'S ENGLAND.*

THERE is one word, and one word only, which adequately expresses the weariness of mankind over books like this. They are "tootle." Mr. Matthew Browne is undoubtedly a clever man, and his Chaucer's England is no doubt a clever book, but its cleverness consists simply in the adroit and ingenious way in which he has managed to invest a host of commonplaces with an air the very reverse of commonplace. Its knowledge of Chaucer is the sort of acquaintance which a sharp-witted reader picks up with a book he has read over twice in his life, and knowledge of Chaucer's England there is none. In the place, however, of solid meat we have the daintiest cookery in the world. Never was chat so chatty; never did philosophy—and there is a good deal of "philosophy" in these pages—come so condescendingly down from the clouds. The talk is seldom tall, but it is charmingly Euphuistic. Here is, for instance, a little bit about love:—

> When the poet looks at the love of beauty in woman with all its concomitants of self-devotion and its mysterious issues of ever-new Being with still new concomitants of self-devotion again, he sees in it what is strictly divine and worshippable. He sees, that is to say, an outbreak or disclosure of the great inscrutable central fire of life which shoots up to the surface of Nature universally. He looks upon it without judging, without criticizing, without moralizing, making only one demand, and that he makes unconsciously as a skylark sings or a daisy flowers, namely that what has an infinite source and has infinite issues shall always have the infinite of symmetry in its individual forms.

To the reader unconsciously demanding, "as a daisy flowers," what this means, we can only suggest that by "concomitant of self-devotion" is meant a wedding present, and by "mysterious issues of ever-new Being" a baby. The book is, in fact, one which would rejoice the heart of Sir Piercie Shafton. The growth of towns is "the gradual civification of the actual surface of the land"; "the rosy cross—think of it!" is "flitting about under the uttermost gables of our civilization"; dogma shifts its ground from that of "institutionalized miracle"; Wiclif represents "the politico-moral insurgence of the time of Chaucer"; "what tells in the long run is the diffused ethic of a man's work." Here and there a flight of this kind is tempered with a "so to say," but in his grander moments Mr. Browne dismisses even this fleeting touch of pity for intellectual weakness. No qualification softens the statement that "we must represent to ourselves human progress under the image of a Shadow-Cone, in which at its greatest dilatation there is nothing that was not within the outline at the beginning; whilst all proceeds by laws recognisable but untraceable, and for ever mysterious and sublime." We soar here from the realm of Euphues to that of Elijah Pogram, but even this falls below the little bursts of scientific physiology which give such a piquant interest to these pages. "One of Griselda's reasons for being ready to give up her child to be slain is that it was his, her husband's. A reason founded on a mistaken scientific position—what would the poor lady have said of Parthenogenesis?" We are afraid she would have said that, if it proved what it seems it proves about the baby's paternity, it must be something dreadfully improper. We can't wonder, however, that with all Mr. Browne's resources English fails to meet such demands upon it as these, that "the image of Mary was, so to speak, calquée upon the image of Venus Urania," and that the beginnings of the social state are to be found in "the essor of valour and the essor of love." We do not know whether Mr. Browne will take refuge in the Somptuour's defence that

> Subtilte
> And high wyt mad him speken as he spak, but from one end to the other of his book he makes us long that, like the maiden of Chaucer's exquisite sketch,

> Noone contrefeted termes hadde sche
> To seme wys.

We are tempted to linger over these flowers of style just because it is possible to treat them with an amused indulgence which we can hardly extend to the actual matter of the book. Its subject, it is only fair to remember, is not directly the poetry of Chaucer. Mr. Browne wanders indeed, in a facile and graceful fashion, from one sketch to another sketch of the well-known Prologue, and says a great many pretty, and some really sensible, things by the way. But he does not pretend to be attempting anything very serious in the way of poetical criticism. What he attempts is a picture of English life as Chaucer has painted it for us, or at least a series of vignettes of life in its social aspects in Chaucer's time; and if a remarkable capacity for loose generalization could have ensured success, Mr. Browne would have been successful. Unluckily such an attempt required a knowledge of history, and on all historical questions his ignorance seems complete. One very often meets a man who knows something of the history of his own country, but very little of the general history of the world; and now and then one meets with a man who knows a good deal about the history of great world-movements and very little about the history of his own country. But mediæval Europe and mediæval England are equally unknown to Mr. Browne. We hardly know three better tests of a knowledge of the larger field than the three subjects which he is continually fingering throughout his book—Feudalism, Chivalry, and the Troubadours. His acquaintance with the first may be judged by his acquiescence in a wonderful dictum of M. Comte, that "it was feudalism which introduced for the first time the Worship of Woman." This is worse than the reply of the small girl's who caught at the Curfew, and defined the Feudal system as "ringing a bell." The Troubadour movement he pronounces an ecclesiastical one, in happy unconsciousness that the cruellest of ecclesiastical wars had to be waged for its suppression. Chivalry, it seems, "was in its glory in the reign of Edward the Third." At no time certainly did it more clearly prove itself the most miserable and revolting of shams. The first thing to prove about chivalry is that it ever existed in real life at all. Edward's chivalry was as deliberate a fiction as the "chivalry" of Philip of Burgundy a century later, or the Highland tartans of George IV.; and the whole literature of chivalry, such "love disputes" as Chaucer's, was a sheer modern-antique, a mere Wardour Street revival of the Love-Courts which the first De Montfort had trodden out in blood in his crusade of Languedoc. But if on the general field of mediæval history Mr. Browne contents himself for the most part with repeating the loose talk of other people, as to English history he certainly has notions of his own. Other people have thought that "there is a sense in which it may be said that the history of England begins about the time of Chaucer, or in his own century"; but we can hardly fancy that any other people reached that conclusion by the remarkable process of Mr. Browne:—

> It may still be said that we tread the soil on which was spilt the blood of Caractacus, on which the scythed wheels of Boadicea's chariot moved to the battle-field. But who can get up any sympathy with the Druids? The mistletoe does not help us, nor the mystery of Stonehenge; they are as remote as the Aztecs. We should cut them dead if we were to meet them. We call ourselves Anglo-Saxons when we are on our stilts, but we must pass over many years from the time of Caractacus before we can feel in our very bones the England of our pride. Mr. Carlyle, fortune-telling backwards after the manner of modern historians, pronounces it to have been a good thing that William the Norman conquered Harold. But what school-boy ever read, or what man or woman ever remembered, the familiar words—"As soon as William had passed the Thames at Wallingford, Stigand, the Archbishop of Canterbury"—without feeling very enraged with Stigand, and thinking that Stigand ought to have cursed William with bell and book and told him to "get out of that." However, the Norman did in fact lay his hand on England, and left pretty strong finger-marks there. Then come forest laws, feudalities, resistance of the Kentish men, Domesday-book, the gradual remoulding of the Anglo-Saxon institutions by the supple administrative fingers of the Norman, the struggles between the King and the King's barons which began the break up of the feudal system, the resistance of offended or injured nobles and others to the forest laws, the true romances (more representatively true, I believe, than much history) of Robin Hood and Little John, and Adam Bell and Clym of the Clough; and Magna Charta; and the gradual modification of the Roman Catholic religion in practice by the spirit of the people; and the growth of London and Canterbury; and the fermentation of the best of the old Anglo-Saxon elements in the noble county of Kent; and the gradual appearance in the political arena of "the modern problem, the greatest happiness of the greatest number"; the confluence of the Romance and the English literary genius; the advent of a great monarch; the self-adjustment and reconstruction of the language, and its admission within courtly gates—and we are in the time of Chaucer.

It is impossible to do justice to such a conception of our national history as this. Even Mrs. Markham, who seems to have furnished its ground-work, has not ventured on the bold flight of making Caractacus an Anglo-Saxon, and bedewing the fields of Britain with his blood. It is interesting to know that the feudal system (we abandon "feudalities" in despair) was broken up, not by the Wars of the Roses, but by those very "struggles between the kings and the king's barons" to which dry-as-dust historians have attributed its real political existence in England; that Robin Hood stands on equal ground with Magna Charta; that English religion before Chaucer was "Roman Catholic"; that the accession of Edward III., the most absolutely empty and pretentious of all our sovereigns, was "the advent of a great monarch," and his reign the epoch of "the admission" of our language "within courtly gates." We had hitherto imagined that Alfred was an English author, that "William the Norman" tried to speak English, but that Edward III. certainly spoke French. After this "we are in the time of Chaucer." Let us take a single man of the time of Chaucer, a man about whom Mr. Browne talks very eloquently indeed. "In his days printing was not, and mail coaches were not, yet Wicliffe was a diligent preacher and reformer." He was something more, a "Professor of Divinity" at Oxford, who "gave up his chair rather than omit the Protestant element in his teaching!" If Mr. Browne ever writes a Latin epitaph over an ordinary Doctor of Divinity, he may discover that "S. T. P." does not necessarily imply a Professorship at Oxford, and that there is a certain peril in leaving Dr. Shirley unread. If he ever makes acquaintance with St. Bernard or Joachim of Calabria, he may learn that "calling a Pope Antichrist" did not necessarily prove Wiclif "a Protestant." But we hardly know who is to set him right when he tells us that "Wiclif was twice promoted, once to a prebendary, and once to the incumbency of Lutterworth." Does he suppose that Wiclif was "a prebend" when he spent his time in those "polemicial labours" which his admirer commemorates with so much gratitude? We are tempted to venture from Wiclif on to Wickham, but it is perhaps only necessary to state that in his famous motto, "manners makyth man," Mr. Browne believes "manners" to mean "good manners." We are afraid, indeed, that our readers will hardly care to enter further on "the time of Chaucer." If they do, however, they will find some points on which Mr. Browne has displayed an information which the instances we have quoted would hardly lead one to expect. He knows a good deal about May-poles and Jack in the Green. He has shown much curious reading on the subject of knives and forks. He has examined with great minuteness the "auditarian" questions which are suggested by the drama and poetry of the age. The costume of Adam and Eve in the older miracle plays may, we think, be now regarded as definitely settled. It is some comfort to know that his readers may glean something about subjects such as these, even though Mr. Browne tells them nothing of Chaucer or of England.

THE BOOK OF THE LANDED ESTATE.*

A GOOD many features about this work seem to stamp it as a great book for great people, rather than one of those handy books which are designed for the service of the million. Its burden seems to be the snatch from Virgil, "Veteres migrate coloni," for its whole drift is the supersession of ignorant by skilled farmers, small farms and holdings being swept away and merged in huge territorial tracts. Indeed, if in Mr. Brown's model landed estate a single farm is left in dubious hands, it will apparently be that on which he proposes that young Squire Hopeful shall experiment, when he has added to his Eton and Oxford curriculum the special training in practical and theoretic farming which is to be gained at Cirencester or Edinburgh. Were we to accept first impressions, and to allow ourselves to be aghast at such improvements on a gigantic scale as are detailed and estimated for in pp. 104-5- the improvement, for example, of 10,000 arable acres, by draining and trenching, at a total cost of 120,000*l.*, or 12*l.* per acre; by means of which a rental of 11,000*l.* per annum is brought up to 21,000*l.*, and a market value of 363,000*l.* to 709,500*l.*—we should be tempted to close the book, and leave it and its lessons to the exclusive study of the "golden lads and lasses" who come into the world inheritors of whole counties, and who find in agents and factors a providential help towards spending the incomes wherewith they are overburdened. But although we are not prepared to say that Mr. Brown might not have done more wisely to cite modest instances and illustrations, rather than vast records of improvements which at first sight look immeasurably out of reach of every-day resources, it is only fair to state that he furnishes the painstaking reader with a great deal of practical detail that may be of use to average landlords, tenants, and agents. And if at times he sets up a somewhat impracticable standard —e.g., in his ideas of due training for landlordship, factorship, and intelligent tenantship—he is in the main full of sound and valuable hints on matters of leases and yearly takings, draining, trenching, fencing, forestry, farm-building, road-making, and of engines and implements, steam and other; while he is always ready with an intelligent reason for whatever, from the vantage ground of experience, he takes upon him to recommend. Indeed, there is not a chapter from which any reader may not gain something; and the reader who has that luxury—which does not always go along with landed property—plenty of money lying idle in the Bank or the Funds, has but to study this book to be convinced that he cannot better secure for it an interest at once safe and ample than by bestowing it on judicious improvement of his estate. Such a one will be tempted to read more by an account at the threshold of the work of how a farm of 340 acres, renting at 1*l.* 5*s.* per acre, or 425*l.* per annum, was drained, trenched, fenced anew, and furnished with thoroughly good farm-buildings at a cost of 2,960*l.*, or 9*l.* per acre; and then, after having been kept in hand some two or three years, re-let on lease at 900*l.* a year, an advance of 475*l.* per annum, or fifteen per cent. interest on the outlay. A parallel instance of improvements on a smaller scale, with results proportionately satisfactory, is given by Mr. Brown in p. 4.

But the gist of the whole of the earlier part of the Book of the Landed Estate is, that to realize the profit of judicious improvements a landlord must meet with skilled tenants; and that to make an improved farm pay at an advanced rent, there will be need of talent and experience as well as capital. Obviously, in the presence of these, humdrum, old-fashioned farming will have to give way. Whether agricultural colleges or apprenticeship for three or more years to scientific farmers will yield the supply of enlightened young farmers on which Mr. Brown calculates, it may be hard to determine; but certainly to take improved farms, and farm them to a profit, will involve enlightenment in the tenant, quite as much as to improve them involves outlay on the landlord's part. We conceive that neither will be the worse for careful perusal of a book which raises a high standard for both, and which, more particularly, is candid and outspoken upon the important question of capital. At least "ten pounds an acre is required to work an arable farm with any prospect of success," and "farmers engaged in mixed husbandry realize, on an average of years, about ten per cent. per annum on the capital they have engaged in their business," after paying their rents and farming expenses. Mr. Brown strongly advocates the granting of leases to good tenants, on the principle that they will then expend their own money on the improvement of the farms which they rent; but, as yet, in the majority of cases, improvements are done at the landlord's cost, the tenant paying a percentage directly or indirectly. Nor can there be any reason why a landlord should shrink from this cost for the permanent benefit of his estate, either finding the money at first hand, or getting a loan from some one of the Lands Improvement Companies, returnable by a rent-charge on the estate, extending over from twenty-one to twenty-five years. With common attention to business, this course could not fail to result in profit.

There is much to justify Mr. Brown's argument, based on a consideration of the bearing which the limited extent of our country has on the value of land, that estates will ere long be worth more than double the money for which they can now be purchased. And it is easily credible that a wealthier, as well as a more enterprising and intelligent, class of tenants is now on the look-out for farms than formerly (p. 131). And the maxim, "raise your rents and your lands will be better farmed," is soundly based on the invariable observation that the worst-paying farms are those where the tenants lack skill and ability to profit by them. We can hardly fancy, however, that the day is imminent when any very large proportion of tenant-farmers will carry out at their own cost, even with the security of a lease, such a scale of improvements as our author recommends. If they are ready to pay interest of money upon improvements done, and if, as their own advantage demands, they will give their intelligent supervision to the carrying out of such improvements, this will as effectually lead up to the good time coming for landlords, which will certainly have been fairly earned by outlay of capital. And this is a safer course, it strikes us, on the landlord's part, than for him to take a particular farm in hand and get it into cultivation, and into a pattern condition, before letting it at an increased rent to a high-class tenant. No doubt such a course is sometimes necessitated by circumstances; and it is at all times a more sensible plea for such a course that you are aiming to let it to advantage in due time, than that you are keeping it in hand to be a model to tenants, who will probably laugh in their sleeves at the cost of your hobby. In this case, as we are reminded in an early part of the volume, àpropos of "home-farms," everything depends upon an honest and intelligent bailiff—a valuable animal when you can catch him. It is a maxim as old as Cato, that "male agitur cum domino quem villicus docet." But, as to getting a farm into condition, it is very doubtful whether it is not more prudent to carry out the necessary improvements while the old tenant is still in possession than to risk the usual fate of gentleman-farmers. Such, according to Mr. Brown, is undoubtedly the cheaper course, though the other, because in it there is no hindrance or obstruction from ignorance and stubbornness, will probably be the quicker process. One should be content to overlook a little tardiness, in order to avoid the risks of an experiment depending for its success upon such a combination of sine-qua-nons as an honest bailiff, skilled and zealous farm-servants (whose zeal, it is suggested, should be enhanced by a percentage on profits over and above their wages), the master's constant eye, and a strict debtor and creditor account with the other departments, such as the house and the garden, to which the farm-in-hand is apt to supply cartage, manure, and other articles. One of the first improvements which the tenor of all Mr. Brown's remarks points to is the curtailment of fences, and the bringing fields and farms to the best working dimensions. It is obvious that a farm of one hundred and fifty acres requires as much expense in buildings as one of two hundred; and, in the matter of fences, a farm of a hundred acres, subdivided into ten equal portions as fields, requires just as much trouble and care of hedges as a farm of three hundred acres, divided into twelve compartments. But, what is still more important, it is this curtailment of fences, and allotment of from five-and-twenty to thirty or more acres to each field, which gives free scope to the modern invention of "steam-cultivators," a very valuable assistance in profitable high-class farming. In his chapter "On Steam for Agricultural Purposes," Mr. Brown discusses these very fully, and, while fully recognising their capacity for opening up the land deeper than horse-ploughs, and their general satisfactoriness in grubbing, harrowing, and the like, considers that they have not yet reached that perfection and cheapness which will justify their superseding horse-power. Their great drawback is frequent breakages, and one of his suggestions for effecting "a great saving in the construction of the tackle" is previous trenching of the land, so as to remove stones and such like obstacles, and to allow the "cultivator" an easy passage. For cheapness, simplicity, wear, and versatility, we observe that he gives the palm to the apparatus of Messrs. Howard of Bedford.

It is indeed a problem of the utmost moment, this question of efficient "cultivators" at a reasonable cost. Our author says, with much truth, that the present mode of tillage is for the most part "a mere scratching of the surface-soil," and he lays down as the surest criterion and index of a farmer's intelligence "the depth to which he ploughs." Many farmers still act as if they thought that to go deeper than nine inches or so in ploughing were quieta movere, to stir up a hidden and dormant evil to the hurt of their crops. Yet it is really by deep ploughing, so as to break the subsoil and mix it with the upper, that intelligent and enterprising farmers grow those more abundant crops which enable them to meet the advanced standard of rents. It is, as is well enforced in this treatise, only in connexion with a system of deep ploughing and thorough opening of the soil lying above the drains that the costly process of draining can be thoroughly operative. When, in 1835, Mr. Smith of Deanston propounded his famous scheme, the two operations were understood to be simultaneous. It will be readily seen how much is to be looked for in this case from steam-cultivators and subsoil ploughs; and one is a little surprised (in days when haymaking machines, reaping machines, and so forth are in such request, to supply the scarcity of hands, in many parts of the country) that Mr. Brown advocates "manual trenching" in preference to "subsoil-ploughing." Certainly the records of his experience cited in pp. 96-7 go far to make good his case for trenching of some sort. In one case the trenched portion of a field yielded sixty-four bushels to the acre, while the untrenched yielded but forty; and the results of all the experiments with which Mr. Brown is acquainted convince him that "spade or fork trenching" to the depth of two feet, simultaneously with draining, and the constant application of all spare manure to the lower half of the turned-up land, will end in producing crops resembling in quantity and quality those of the market gardener, who trenches deep and manures deep also. And not only so, but he adds that this deep trenching and coincident manuring would obviate all those diseases in turnip and potato crops which arise from continual cropping of the same surface.

It must be confessed that there are one or two queries requiring a categorical answer, before simple folk can see their way to this kind of improvement on an extensive scale. Given the needful capital—which Mr. Brown admits should be not less than from fifteen to twenty pounds per acre to the tenant who farms according to this system—given, too, the supply of manual labour, which in many English counties is scarcely enough for even the old-fashioned demands upon it—whence is to come the sufficiency of manure to meet this proposed system of trenching and manuring two feet deep at least? We cannot say that the answer given by our author in p. 106 is quite satisfactory. It suggests how the supply may be kept up after the work is once done. But the starting-point is the crux. Who is to do that part of the work? The landlord, who, according to Mr. Brown's showing, will have had to pay out at least twelve pounds an acre on trenching and draining? A negative answer seems to be implied in his suggestion at p. 107:—"I would recommend that they should engage with wealthy tenants only, who could undertake the trenching of the land on their own account, as it would be so much to their own interest." It were uncandid, however, to omit to notice how very much help both landlords and tenants may obtain from these pages as to matters of detail. The chapter on manures, for instance, is exhaustive in its way; and in it occur no traces whatsoever of a desire to advocate out-of-the-way and expensive fertilizers in preference to that which is cheaper and ready to hand. We are taught herein how to make the most of road-scrapings, ditch-cleansings, and pond-mud, as well as of sewage and liquid manure. And the author enforces the wisdom of applying all the available manures of our own country before we have recourse to other countries for guano, which is apt to be often adulterated and always costly. Not that he undervalues the discriminating use of this latter:—

> There is no doubt [he writes] but that many of our farmers would benefit greatly by a more general use of guano. Previous to 1860 very few farmers in the North used any guano—they seemed to have an idea that it was useless as a manure, . . . a quack affair, made up to rob their pockets. Some of my elder tenant-friends had, and indeed still have, a very low estimate of the value of guano as a manure; they cannot conceive how such a small quantity can be sufficient manure for an acre. They say there is nought like management. "Management" in Yorkshire means farm-yard manure. This is like the old story of a Scotch Laird, who, when chemical fertilizers were first talked of, went to one of his tenants, and told him that a new manure had come to the country, and it was so strong, that the contents of a coat pocket were sufficient to manure an acre of land. "May be that," said his old friend, "but I doubt your waistcoat pocket will hold the crop."

A study of the Book of the Landed Estate will tend to remove such irrational prejudices, and also, in many passages, to set at rest questions often rife between landlord and tenant. Such are the restrictive clauses in leases—by which tenants are tied down to certain rotatory modes of cropping, clauses which Mr. Brown would omit in the case of intelligent and well-to-do tenants, who have gone in for such improvements of their land as have been above spoken of. Such, too, are the clauses in leases which not only prohibit a tenant from destroying game, but also from claiming recompense from his landlord for damage done "by the instrumentality of game themselves, or by reason of any increase thereof." The author pronounces that it is the tenant's own fault if he takes a farm with such restrictions; and he seems to be a fair and candid exponent of the well-conditioned tenant-mind when he says that, "though they do not like to have their crops reduced by hares and rabbits," most tenants "feel pleased at seeing their landlords shoot over their farms in a gentlemanlike manner."

It is impossible even to glance at a tithe of the useful information and advice contained in this volume, which will be certain to be the landlord and the agent's vade-mecum. Among the most interesting of the chapters which we have not noticed are those on "The Improvement of Waste-Lands," "Woods and Plantations," and "Farm-Buildings and Labourers' Cottages." We may be able to recur to the last of these, in connexion with Lord Cawdor's and other "Cottage Plans," on a future occasion.

ARTHUR CLIFFORD.*

WE put down this novel with a certain sense of gratitude to the author. It is not merely on account of its shortness, though novelists, if they are really anxious for the praises of critics, should pay more attention than they often do to moderating their demands on their attention; nor is it that the literary merits of the performance are of any remarkable order. It is like many hundreds of other novels which are published from time to time, neither very good nor very bad; it is grammatical, fairly well written, and the sentiments expressed are of most unimpeachable propriety. The story is perhaps told with rather more than average force; but, to say the truth, it supplies one more illustration of a fact which is constantly forced upon our notice—namely, that the number of people who can write tolerably well is almost unlimited, whilst the number of those who approach any high degree of excellence may be counted upon one's fingers. To speak in sporting phraseology, the field is amazingly numerous; but the favourites who can be said to be really in the betting do not seem to multiply in the same proportion. The critic is constantly oppressed by the over-growing difficulty of discriminating between shades of merit so closely matched, and by the doubt whether it can be worth while to discriminate at all. Almost all that can or need be said upon this point is that Arthur Clifford is a book of which the author has no need to be ashamed, but which will certainly not confer a crown of undying glory.

To what cause, then, is our gratitude due? The answer is very simple. The hero of this novel is a member of our own craft. He is a gentleman who, after a creditable career at Oxford, undertakes to support himself by writing for the press. He pursues this duty under circumstances of great difficulty. His father has been guilty of appropriating certain trust funds, after which he dies; and Mr. Clifford, to save the credit of his unworthy parent, takes the blame and the responsibility upon himself, and proceeds by a course of self-denying industry to replace the money. We need hardly say that he is successful, and we have much pleasure in commending to public notice the portrait of a virtuous and brilliant writer for the press. We repudiate in advance any supposition that we are actuated in this matter by an unworthy vanity. We admire, not because the picture is flattering to our sensibility, but because it is so admirably correct. The public, we fear, is scarcely impressed with a due belief in the thoroughly disinterested and noble character of most anonymous writers; even when their talent is recognised, it fails to appreciate the loftiness of their motives. It would be obviously impossible for us to seek by any direct means to give a truer view than that which generally prevails of our own merits; if, in the words of the poet, we should "voice aloud how good we are, how great should be," we should of course be accused, and it may be justly, of immoderate conceit. We must wait for other and independent authorities to praise us. But when that praise comes we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of calling attention to it, and at least holding up our own photograph, and then modestly retiring, leaving it to the public to draw their own conclusions. No one would be so uncivil as to ask us point-blank whether we consider it to be a good likeness. Therefore, without further preface, we will draw the curtain, and invite inspection for a lively representation of the modern newspaper writer.

Mr. Arthur Clifford, then, is a young gentleman fresh from Oxford. Desirous, for the reasons we have mentioned, of saving money, he lives in a remote lodging, with no furniture except a few chairs, plain deal tables, and one large book-case; with of course a chaotic mass of books, reviews, and Parliamentary papers. From this humble abode he searches the weak places of society, terrifies time-serving Ministers, and thunders through the columns of the Daily Budget. An editor of admirable benevolence—for even editors, be it observed, have a share of the virtue by which the press is permeated—has set him to write articles because he once knew something of his father. Even when the first article is a failure, this discerning gentleman sends him five pounds in payment—a precedent which, we may as well say, to prevent any misconception, is not invariably followed by well-regulated newspapers. Succeeding articles, we need hardly say, are more favourably received. Mr. Clifford is sent out as a Correspondent to New York, and the letters which he writes produce a marked sensation on both sides of the Atlantic. Returning, he begins to make his power felt, when a great opportunity luckily offers. A fearful job is being perpetrated. "Clause 5" of a mysterious Act, the nature of which is never revealed to us, has been clandestinely inserted, and is being smuggled through Parliament, to favour the degraded creature of a corrupt Minister. Then Mr. Clifford arises in his wrath. He writes an article of tremendous power, which makes even the virtuous editor shake in his shoes. "The populace," as Mr. Clifford informs that gentleman when he shows symptoms of wavering, "the populace is made up of units, and each Englishman will face an unwelcome fact placed fairly before him, as this is placed; but they will not swallow their gilded pills; nor, as long as I have a hand to write, will I lift a finger to deceive them." The editor mildly observes that this tirade would be better suited for Parliament than for a newspaper-office. However, Mr. Clifford puts it to him that he must either publish the article without alteration or lose Mr. Clifford's services; and, thus gently impelled, the editor takes the plunge. The effects are tremendous. The country wakes from its slumbers. "One of the fiercest debates on record" is produced. And what is the cause? "One thing, and one thing only, the article in the Daily Budget." The Ministry trembles; the Clubs—of which institutions, by the way, the author takes the view which is popular with correspondents of country newspapers, that they are mysterious centres of all kinds of political discussion—can talk about nothing but the anonymous author. "He is a man with his eyes about him, whoever he is," proclaims one intelligent critic, "and I advise Thornton (the editor) to make the most of him. It's Junius without the coarseness." Soon, however, Mr. Clifford exceeds even that conventional standard of excellence. A book appears, under the title of Moral Diseases, which excites the most intense interest. "Metaphysics, society, abuses," as Mr. Thornton not very grammatically declares, are "all handled like a master." "All the fellows of the Athenæum" are delighted; and, though we are not treated to a specimen, or even a table of contents, we should say that they had excellent reason. So far as we can guess from certain hints, the book not only lays bare all the springs of the social evils of the day, but it gives a withering rebuke to scepticism, and generally puts mankind to rights. The author of the book, we need hardly say, is Mr. Arthur Clifford, who is fortunately enabled by circumstances to avow his performance a short time afterwards. By a lucky accident, the cloud which has hung upon his reputation is entirely dispelled; and it appears that he was entirely guiltless of any complicity in his father's misdeeds. The consequences are truly delightful. He becomes at once a lion of the first order. Invitations pour in upon him from every distinguished person in London. The culmination of his glory is described in glowing colours. The Duchess of Tewkesbury invites him to a dinner at her princely mansion in St. James's. The guests are all asked "to meet a distinguished man," and amongst those guests is the Bishop of Rutland, who, we need hardly add, is "the most courteous of men, and sought far and wide for any dinner where wit, agreeability, and beauty are gathered together." The whole party is converted into "a listening and admiring audience." The Duke of Tewkesbury appeals to him familiarly, and all treat him as one whose talents and character command the highest respect. Can human glory go further? To be asked by a duke to meet a bishop—or rather, for such is his inconceivable pitch of exaltation, to have a bishop asked to meet you by a duke—is a vision of splendour enough to turn the firmest head. It is little to say, after this, that articles under the signature of "Kappa," which he has adopted, are enough to make the fortune of any magazine; it is not much even to say that in four years he has paid off 5,000*l.* with full interest; and scarcely worth mentioning that he marries the lovely and accomplished lady whose proud parents had looked down upon him with disdain. Yet such is the fate which rewards a successful writer in the press, and that whilst he is yet scarcely of standing to take his Master's degree. It is sometimes said that historians should learn the manners of the day rather from novels than from barren collections of facts. If the historian of the future acts on this principle, and disinters Arthur Clifford from the library of the British Museum, he will draw a glowing picture of the honours which await the successful author in England. Who shall say after this that literary excellence is insufficiently rewarded?

It might be our duty, if we were the official guides of young men, to inquire how far this glowing picture is correct. Do young men come up from the Universities and immediately become the most powerful writers in the daily press? When they have acquired that position, does every Club in London anxiously discuss the articles they have written? Do invitations to all the pleasantest houses in town pour in upon them till they have not a moment to call their own? Do dukes ask bishops to meet them and listen delightedly after dinner to their disquisitions upon social and metaphysical topics? We do not feel obliged—as we are not speaking as University tutors—to give any categorical answer to these inquiries. We can only say that, before persons in authority advise young men upon the choice of a profession, they had better inquire into the accuracy of these representations. Of course, if a young man feels that he possesses the genius of Mr. Arthur Clifford, or of the late Right Honourable Edmund Burke, he should adopt a career for which he is so eminently suited, even if the prizes be a little less magnificent than those which are thus glowingly described. We can only hint, in the most delicate way possible, that dukes and bishops are not always so keenly alive as they might be to the merits of newspaper articles. Any shortcomings in this respect will doubtless be made up by the delights of a good conscience; for we are not about to dispute the inference, which will naturally be made, that the writers of articles are frequently men of the highest genius and the sternest principles of morality. If, to use the time-honoured phrase, only one reader of Arthur Clifford is persuaded of the truth of this assertion, the labours of the author will not have been quite thrown away.

It is necessary to say nothing more upon this point; and we have spoken sufficiently of the general merits of the novel. We will only remark, in conclusion, that the very original picture which we have described is awkwardly fitted in to a most commonplace framework. As soon as we read of a country gentleman of old family and embarrassed circumstances refusing his daughter to a virtuous youth on account of his poverty, we know only too well what is going to happen. Of course the father will be ruined, and the young man will make his fortune; and the worldly mother will be forced to relent. We rather resent the brilliant journalist being put through so every-day a series of events. We would suggest that if Arthur Clifford reaches a second edition—as, for the honour of the press, we must naturally hope it will—the cast of characters should be entirely altered, and Mr. Clifford rewarded with the hand, not of a ruined gentleman's daughter who has actually been driven by misery to live in Thurloe Square, but of the Duke's sole daughter and heiress. That, and that alone, would be a fitting climax to his affecting history.

LYLY'S EUPHUES.*

THE English language, as well as the English nation, has been compelled to fight several sturdy battles for its freedom. It has had at one time to contend with superstitions in style, at another with despots in thought; it has dethroned more than one literary sovereign, but it has never recalled him by any counter-revolution like that of 1660. John Lyly and Erasmus Darwin—the former indeed far more than the latter—prevailed during a season of vitiated taste; both were writers of no ordinary learning and vigour; both were desirous of having finer bread than could be made of wheat; both were unseated by the withering irony of satirists or parodists of their style; but Darwin lived to see his own downfall, whereas the evil that Lyly did lived long after him. Nor were such revolutions confined to them. Owen Feltham, at one end of a period, and Samuel Johnson at the other, "spoiled the language of our nation by words that end in -osity and -ation." And the Resolves, Divine, Moral, and Political, of the one, and the Rambler and Idler of the other, now slumber on shelves among a host of other books that no gentleman's library should be without.

It was just to protest against the vices of Lyly's style, as it was right in Tacitus to brand with censure the "calamistros Mæcenatis" or the "tinnitus Gallionis." But more than even-handed justice—nay, a good deal of injustice—has been dealt to Lyly as a writer. Critics and readers who are not aware that Euphues and his Anatomy of Wit and Euphues and his England are two separate treatises, and who perhaps never read half a dozen pages of either, write or talk of them as the works of a coxcomb; and one Berkenhout, in his Biographia Literaria, calls them a "most contemptible piece of nonsense," whereby Berkenhout proved himself to be, so far as Lyly is concerned, what Dogberry desired himself to be written down. Scott, too, in his Monastery, has joined the tribe of gibers against Lyly; but his Euphuist, Sir Piercie Shafton, is a gross burlesque. For if we remove the masks and wrappers of the language, the writer of Euphues is a sound thinker, an accomplished scholar, and really a noble gentleman—one who in days of much license, and no little profaneness also, laboured to convince his readers of the worth of knowledge, and the dignity and beauty of virtue.

Euphues, in both portions of it, fairly understood, and not measured by the vices of its language, belongs to the family of which the Cyropædia is the first known and common ancestor, and which includes among its numerous posterity Barclay's Argenis, More's Utopia, Bacon's New Atlantis, Fénélon's Telemachus, and Berkeley's Gaudentio di Lucca. What differentiates Euphues from other members of the family is the excessive ornament in which his off-spring is clad. The Greek romance is remarkable for the simplicity and purity of its language. The Argenis is written in good, if not quite classical, Latin; Telemachus is composed in a kind of Xenophontean French, and the Latin romance of More, and the English one of Bacon, are worthy of the great names inscribed on their title-pages.

It is too often, if not universally, forgotten by his censors, that Lyly was neither the alpha nor the omega of the style that goes by the name of Euphuism. That style neither began nor ended with him. We may discover this overlooked fact by briefly considering the cause of his popularity, and that of the almost "mere oblivion" that succeeded it. So complete, indeed, has been the obscuration of his once burning and shining light, that we believe the latest sensational romance is not more a novelty to many persons than Lyly's Anatomy of Wit or his England. He might indeed have furnished one more instance to his contemporary Spenser of "mutabilitie." His fortunes are described in a sonnet of Shakspeare's:—

> Great princes' favourites their fair leaves spread
> But as the marigold at the sun's eye,

And in themselves their pride lies buried,
For at a frown they in their glory die.

For his popularity the causes are not far to seek. A tendency to "Italianate"—to borrow an expressive word from Roger Ascham—began with the revival of literature in the reign of Henry VIII. and prevailed, in greater or less degree, until it was superseded after the Restoration by an opposite tendency to Gallicise the English language. It began with Surrey and Wyatt; it did not quite cease until Dryden was at least half-way through his poetical career. In Elizabeth's reign Tasso and Ariosto were the models of Spenser, of Phineas and Giles Fletcher, and of all who wrote poems de longue haleine; Petrarch, and the numerous brood of Petrarchists, were the mirrors and models of English sonneteers—of the best, such as Raleigh and Drummond, as well as of the worst. Nor was poetry the only importation from the Arno, the Tiber, or the canals of Venice. The Queen and her courtiers adopted Italian fashions in music, dances, dress, and dishes for the table; and that as submissively, and with as plenary faith in their good taste and superiority, as the next century adopted French fashions. Lyly was no more the author of this tendency than he was the discoverer of printing, gunpowder, or the Copernican system. He found it at spring-tide; and, being a man of real genius, he infused into it additional vigour. The strength of the "Italianate" tide may be estimated by the angry protest of usually sober Roger Ascham against it; and the truth of his remonstrance is confirmed by the history of Florence, Venice, and Rome at the time, and by the testimony of Thomas Coryat, an eye-witness of the Italian manners, some years later. Ascham implores young Englishmen of rank starting for the grand tour—then, as ever since, regarded indispensable to the to-be-completed gentleman—to shun Italy, or if they must go thither, to make their stay there as short as possible. He hints, the nearer to Rome the nearer to perdition also; not because of her idolatries, but of her morals. He writes of the Italians of the sixteenth century as Seneca wrote of the Roman nobles, and Juvenal of the parasitical Greeks of their days. It is to be remembered, however, that the evil communications of Italy seem not to have existed, or not to have been dreaded by Englishmen, at the time of Milton's visit to the peninsula. No man of his age was more deeply versed in Italian literature than Milton; he was even consulted by the Florentine academicians on the niceties of their language; he exchanged sonnets with poets to the manner born and bred; he was applauded and caressed by both north and south Italians—poets, statesmen, princes, and philosophers. It would be profane to think Milton tolerant of manners that shocked Ascham. The inference is that the morals of the peninsula had undergone some change for the better in the course of about eighty years; and yet this is scarcely reconcilable with what is told of the temporal and spiritual Courts of Italy in the seventeenth century. Italy, however, long after Ascham denounced its profligacy, was the model of the English Court and the English wits. Her novels were the stocks on which many of the Elizabethan and Carolinian dramas were engrafted. Her Amintas and Pastor Fidos furnished the pattern of English pastoral poetry; and the works of her practical or speculative statesmen were consulted, and sometimes copied, by those who treated of civil government and the rights and duties of princes. The perverters of Italian eloquence, both in verse and prose, the seicentisti, were of later date than euphuism in England; nor can the nearly contemporary decline of Spanish eloquence have affected our writers of the sixteenth century. But the corruption was a general epidemic of the time. From about 1560 to 1660 the literature of Southern Europe tended to the vice of which John Lyly is incorrectly supposed to have been the author; and as fashion, no less than fame, gains strength by moving, France and England were speedily infected by the disease which reached a crisis in Marini, Gongora, the Hôtel Rambouillet, and the wits "that so did take Eliza and our James."

For the English Court the writings of Lyly—his plays scarcely less than his Euphues—became the glass of fashion and the mould of form. They were the Academy of Compliments, Hints for Etiquette, the Complete Letter-Writer, the Manuals of Polite Conversation. Ladies talked euphuism; gentlemen made love in euphuism; Court-preachers did not disdain to employ Lyly's phrases; and crabbed Chief Justice Coke would now and then sprinkle the arid wastes of the law with images that Lyly's Philautus might use, and Lucilla approve. The treatises, "carefully edited by Edward Arber," passed through ten editions in fifty-six years; of these the first four were issued during the last twenty-three years of Elizabeth's reign, the next four in the reign of James, and the last two in that of Charles I.—the latest edition being that of 1636, eleven years after that monarch's accession. Ten editions or reprints of the same work, at the rate of one in each lustrum, were a liberal allowance for an age when a reading public scarcely existed beyond the liberties of London and Westminster, or, if to be met with in provincial towns or country mansions, migrated from the capital periodically with great families when Parliament was prorogued, or when the plague dispersed the attendants on Courts, legal or royal. Even in the high noon of his popularity Lyly was the butt of satirists. Yet satire is in most cases an evidence of some kind of merit. Had he written "absolute nonsense," or been merely "a slight unmeritable man," "the gentle Shakspeare" would scarcely have singled him out for ridicule, nor would surly Ben Jonson have condescended to parody his language.

His fall was scarcely less signal than his rise. From 1636 we have no more editions of Euphues until 1868; and although some of his plays were inserted in collections of the old English Drama, they were not in any sense edited or collected until Mr. Fairholt published them, carefully revised, in Mr. J. R. Smith's excellent series of reprints, known as the Library of Old Authors, in 1858. The date of this penultimate impression of Euphues—his Anatomy and his England—is significant. It was a grave and earnest time that year, the eleventh of Charles I.—a time that had little leisure or taste for epigrams, conceits, tricks, or riddles in mother-English. Eloquence both within and without the precincts of Parliament was becoming serious, and even stern, in its character. Pulpits, then discharging some of the functions of the modern newspaper, were busied with other matter than compliments, or lessons conveyed in spruce and balanced periods. The almost countless host of pamphleteers wrote too much in haste, or too much under the influence of passion, to bestow much thought or pains on ceremonies of expression. Euphuism had found favour in three reigns, but the Court in 1636 was finding little favour with the mass of the English people, and the Arcadian reed-pipe of John Lyly was rendered inaudible by the trumpet of spiritual and temporal indignation. He, and those who copied him, had built on a foundation of sand. The shafts of ridicule had breached the walls of his house, and the tide of revolution swept it away into one of the many limbos that sooner or later await all that is unsound in either literature or science.

If language is the natural vehicle and garment of thought, assuredly the style of Lyly is among the worst, and fully merits the censure which Mr. Hallam has pronounced upon it—that "it is antithetical and sententious to affectation; the perpetual effort, with no adequate success, rendering the book equally disagreeable and ridiculous, though it might not be difficult to find passages rather more happy and ingenious than the rest." The passages cited by this distinguished critic in justification of his opinion of Lyly are neither the worst nor the best samples of his writing; and even as regards his style, this once overpraised and long overblamed writer has found in Mr. Charles Kingsley an advocate who has at least this merit—he has not contented himself with dipping into either the Anatomy of Wit or the England, but has evidently studied both works with unusual attention.

One of the glaring defects in Lyly's writing is the extravagant, and indeed perverse, use made by him of natural history. This defect very early in the day attracted notice. Michael Drayton, in a folio volume of poems, published in 1627, among other remarks on English writers of the seventeenth and preceding century, pronounces a severe censure on John Lyly, as

Talking of Stones, Stars, Plants, of Fishes, Flyes, Playing with words and idle similies.

And it would be easy, though it would be tedious, to prove by extracts that Drayton has abundant reason for his complaint. There is scarcely an idle story in Pliny's Natural History, in Plutarch's miscellaneous writings, in Conrad Gesner, Aldrovandus, or any of the huge encyclopædias available to his hand, that Lyly does not press into his service. Had he, as Burton did, appended to his collectanea from such sources references to their authors, the short treatises he wrote would have amounted in bulk to at least a third of that goodly folio the Anatomy of Melancholy. Whether he consulted the originals in all or many cases cannot be discovered, but he was undoubtedly a much-reading man, and if he did not keep a commonplace-book like Southey, he must have been gifted with a portentous and enviable power of memory. We defend neither his style nor his abuse of learning; but, admitting these faults, we agree with Mr. Arber and with Mr. Kingsley that Lyly is really a noble writer in his aims and his views of social, political, and domestic morals, and that his book should not be shelved or described as one not merely, as it really is, out of date, but, as it is often described, as of a depraved fashion — a prodigy in its own day, and worthless now. It is far more just, in our opinion, to rate him among writers who strove against the current of profligacy, corruption, and low political feeling which prevailed in the reign of Elizabeth, and which was at full spring-tide in that of her successor. Moreover, Lyly may be considered as an adjunct to the histories of these reigns. In his counsels and in his remedies may be discerned how deeply and widely the Court and the higher classes in the sixteenth century were infected by those vices, and we can the better understand the necessity for the strict Puritanism which in another half century swept away with an unsparing besom the corruptions of the Tudor and Stuart times. From the Anatomy of Wit and the England we learn, far better than from the sermons of the period, the fashions and features of the great as Lyly saw them. That there was some good ground for the seed which he scattered is clear, since, had it all been rock, or thorns and thistles, the popularity of his writings cannot be accounted for.

Of Lyly's plays, which like his prose works have within a few years been carefully revised by Mr. F. W. Fairholt (1858), we have not room to speak. The dramatic vein in them is feeble; but the lyrical is, if not powerful, certainly marked by tenderness in sentiment and elegance in expression. It is to be wished that he had given us more songs than he has done, since the few he has given are excellent. In this respect, indeed, Lyly bears some resemblance to one who differed from him in every other. Ben Jonson perversely, we think, suppressed his lyrical genius and cultivated his dramatic vein. His plays are literally works; his songs and occasional poems are flowers springing up in the generally arid dese[rt] of his plays. The affectation of Lyly disappears in his songs. I[n] them he is "natural, simple, affecting." English literature tains one poet the less owing to the resistance of John Lyly to the promptings of his nature, and to his yielding to the siren of far-fetched allusions, balanced periods, and laborious conceits—such as mark alike the Greek rhetoricians of the empire, the Latin poets who wearied their venal and weary audiences by the Orestes, the Epics, the suasoriæ and controversiæ of the lecture-room, and the Spanish and Italian writers, to whom reference has already been made, who were more anxious to display their ingenuity in words than in accuracy or originality of thought. It is scarcely possible to imagine John Lyly again a popular writer—non eadem est ætas, non mens. Yet, if he once more obtains a few readers, he will owe them to the pains bestowed on his works by Mr. Fairholt the editor of his plays, to Professor Morley's collation of his texts, and to the "careful" editor of his prose writings, Mr. Edward Arber.

MADAME DE MONTESPAN ET LOUIS XIV.*

M. CLÉMENT contributes to the secret history of Louis XIV. a chapter that is well worth reading. That monarch habitually denied that he suffered his amours to mix themselves up with his policy. He even formally requested those of his courtiers whom he selected as his familiars to warn him frankly if they saw his caprices clash with the interests of his kingdom; and, whatever his faults, the great King could bear on occasion to hear the truth from those whom he respected. His pride, too, came in aid of his sense of duty, and we can well believe that a woman's counsel, openly tendered, would have been at least as frankly rejected. But there cannot be a question that, directly or indirectly, his mistresses counted for much in the events of his reign. Any interference in matters of state would have been the last idea of the timid La Vallière. Mademoiselle de Fontanges, "bête et sans esprit," had as little ambition of that kind as she had of intellect. Madame de Loudres, Madame de Soubise, and the rest were but so many passing fancies. But it is certain that Madame de Maintenon's advice in no small degree swayed his conduct in his later days, when the tide of fortune was running against him; and that it was very much owing to her that the spirit which had been so overbearing in prosperity showed itself so vacillating in adversity. And in the heyday of her prosperity Madame de Montespan, if she did not direct the policy of the kingdom, had much to do with administering its patronage. She literally forced from the King the brevet that made her Sybarite brother Vivonne Marshal of France, and her entreaties obtained for him the command of the discreditable expedition to Messina. Moreover, when the drain on the Treasury, and the taxes on the ingenuity of Colbert, became excessive, the war was often starved to feed the extravagances of the favourite. Thus the biography of Madame de Montespan becomes part of the history of France. But the story of her life and times has a still greater historical importance as commencing the prologue of the bloody drama of the Revolution. Louis XIV. was hard at work, all his reign, sowing the harvest which Louis XVI. was destined to reap. Almost omnipotent in its early years, he chose deliberately to abuse his enormous influence, and, by systematically outraging every social propriety, made morality and patriotism republican. For many previous generations neither Valois nor Bourbons had been saints; but it was reserved for Louis XIV. to defy decency, even as regulated by the elastic code of Court tradition. In so far he seems to have been innocent, that he held in all honest simplicity the convenient doctrines that the King could do no wrong, and that majesty is a fountain of honour whose waters, by a first law of nature, must be always pure. Legitimatizing his daughter by Madlle. La Vallière, he expresses himself thus:—

> Les bienfaits que les rois exercent dans leurs États étant la marque extérieure du mérite de ceux qui les reçoivent, et le plus glorieux éloge des sujets qui en sont honorés, nous avons cru ne pouvoir mieux exprimer dans le public l'estime toute particulière que nous faisons de la personne de notre chère et bien-aimée et très-féale Louise Françoise de la Vallière, qu'en lui conférant les plus hauts titres d'honneur qu'une affection très-singulière, excitée dans notre cœur par une infinité de rares perfections, nous a inspirée depuis quelques années en sa faveur.

Nor was he singular in holding this faith. Prudery made terms with what in a purer state of things would have been held to be a violation of all decorum, and in high places vice and virtue everywhere kissed each other amicably. Julie de Rambouillet, Madame de Montausier, prude par excellence, connived at the famous night of Compiègne, and, after the King's liaison had become matter of notoriety, remained the intimate friend of the mistress. The Queen quietly retired to apartments on the second floor, while the favourite engrossed those on the first, visited the palace that was building at Clagny for Madame de Montespan, and paid her a visit of formal condolence when her son by the King was on a sick-bed. The whole story from first to last shows a society rotten to the core, and proves that a baseness almost inconceivable to us had tainted every one, even those whom circumstances would seem to have placed high above all temptation. Our faith in the possibility of honesty is so shaken that even when we hear Bourdaloue and Bossuet denounce the morals of the Sovereign in no measured terms, when we read the frank letters of Colbert reproving his extravagant follies, and when we find to our astonishment that the King listened and was not offended, we cannot help suspecting (unjustly perhaps) that they must have sounded the ground before they ventured on it, and that the monarch considered his plain-spoken advisers as much an essential part of his State as the slave in the chariot at a Roman triumph. We have spoken of the behaviour of Madame de Montausier. M. de Montespan, when his wife's conduct grows into a public scandal, transports himself with passion, holds blasphemously unloyal language that scandalized beyond measure that abjectly loyal society, and dramatically insists on wearing mourning, and celebrating the obsequies of his departed wife. Here at least, we say, is an honourable man. But even if his conduct sprang from anything but pride, stung by the success of a rival who had robbed him of one of the most brilliant women in France, at least he thought better of his folly, and repented it at leisure. In his later life we find this outraged husband sitting down to cards at Versailles with the natural daughters of his wife, kissing their hands in the ceremonious fashion of the Court, while, laughing aside to his friends, he shows his sense of the humour of the situation, and his consciousness of his own dishonour. The King himself, indignant at the husband's show of indignation at the loss of his wife, sets his arbitrary power in motion to mark his disapprobation of it. When the Marquis stays raging in Paris, on the pretence of a lawsuit he has in the Courts there, the King sends instructions to his Minister to have the process summarily disposed of, and hints at the Bastille in the event of the Marquis lingering on. He superintends in person the drawing of the contract of separation between husband and wife. When the Marquis's regiment, which is in quarters at Perpignan, comes to blows with the citizens, Louvois sends orders to the Governor to arrange that the local Courts shall put the Marquis in the wrong, and have this modern Uriah the Hittite banished the country, which was accordingly done. And later, when exile has brought him to a better mind, it is only by slow degrees that he is suffered to fix his residence in Paris, or bring his son to be educated there. Then we have the proud house of Condé making it the object of their ambition to marry their son to the daughter of La Montespan. We see the highest nobility humbling themselves for her friendship. We see her when retired from Court favour—about as much of a sincere penitent as Satan on his sick-bed—corresponding closely with the excellent Huet, Bishop of Avranches, and living in the most unreserved intimacy with that paragon of virtue, her sister the Abbess of Fontevrault. How sincere the repentance was, we learn from the piquant account of the interview at which she and her sister, Madame de Thianges, the proudest woman in France, baited a trap for the impressible monarch with their niece and daughter, the lovely Duchess de Nevers.

Yet, after all, the general result of M. Clément's book is decidedly more favourable to Madame de Montespan than is the ordinary conception people have formed of her character, while that of the King suffers proportionately. We see Louis, while with his grand manner he is giving the tone to the first society in Europe, habitually sink the gentleman in the despot. We see him set his spies to dog his rivals, ostentatiously insult the wife he has vowed to honour, and cruelly drag the woman he professes to love, in a springless carriage over jolting roads, in the train of his armies. Madame de Montespan never was an engaging woman, and cannot be made attractive to us. It was passion more than love that she inspired in the King. Those of her children who did not hate her seem to have cared for her as a matter of duty, and the ties that bound the rest of the world to her were those of interest rather than affection. Yet M. Clément has brought the better side of her nature into a brighter relief than we have ever seen it in before. The materials left to illustrate her life can be but scanty at best. Voltaire tells us that both she and Madame de Maintenon had pledged themselves to write their memoirs. How far she ever redeemed the pledge we do not know. Her legitimate son, the Duke d'Autain, had a certain cross-grained sense of honour, and felt an eccentric shame in his mother's anomalous position, although he was only too eager to profit by it. This shame got the upper hand at her death, when she could be no longer useful to him, and he destroyed all the papers bearing on her career that he could lay his hands on. Thus the bulk of the letters addressed to her, as well as many of those she wrote, must have perished; but in his book M. Clément produces for the first time a good many that have been rescued, and a good many more that have hitherto been but little known. As we have said, their contents are, on the whole, to her credit. Whether she originally sought the King, or the King pressed his notice on her, still, in her position, and in the atmosphere of that Court, virtue would have been little less than heroism. She had just the style and the looks that fascinated Louis; she had the proverbial esprit of the Rochechouarts, and all the brilliant superficial gifts that almost forced her to enter in the race for the Royal favour, in a society where virtue and loyalty were held to be incompatible with each other. She was selfish, when, so far as we can judge, no one was otherwise; but when it did not conflict with her personal interest, she was always ready to do any one a kindness. Her religion was very likely superstition, but it would be unjust to call it hypocrisy. It seems habitually to have influenced her conduct, except with regard to the one great sin that made her career. With that exception, she was not inconsistent, and we may take as a fair epitome of her easy creed the remark she made to the Duchess d'Uzès, whom she surprised with some unlooked-for scruples—"Faut-il, parce que je fais un mal, faire tous les autres?" Before her rise—or fall—she was formally regular in her devotions; when she sinned most, she prayed most; and, when she had lost all hope of retaining the Royal favour, she set herself perseveringly to the task of "making her soul," only threatening a relapse under some such strong temptation as that of giving a niece to the King. If she was lavish to herself, she was profuse to others; her friends had no reason to complain of her neglecting their interests; and, although it is easy to say that money lightly come by may be lightly parted with, yet, allowing all that, few in her position have been so munificently charitable. It has been much the fashion, not only to undervalue her abilities, but even to brand her as grossly illiterate. As M. Clément remarks, Voltaire had formed a very different estimate of her. He pronounced that she wrote "avec une légèreté et une grâce particulières." M. Clément declines to go so far as this on the strength of the letters which he publishes, but he claims for her at least fair rank as a writer, even among the contemporaries of Madame de Sévigné. Reading the correspondence, and looking especially at her constant interchange of letters with the learned Bishop of Avranches, it is difficult to conceive how the story should ever have passed current that those which she wrote to the King were really by Madame de Scarron. If not actually brilliant or witty, her letters are almost invariably light and even sparkling. Perhaps among the most amusing and characteristic of the documents given in the appendix are the notes addressed to her by the little Duke de Maine, when under the charge of Madame de Maintenon. It is almost impossible to picture a child so formally precocious as to have written them, and yet their ideas and turns are often so infantine that you cannot fancy them written by his preceptress. One contains a most earnest entreaty for a watch like his mother's. Another concludes, "J'ai encore une prière à vous faire, qui est qu'on ne me mette plus de jupes; j'en marche mieux, et je vous la demande, ma belle madame." He complains of the baths at Barèges being heated till they make him cry; of Madame de Maintenon's waiting-woman refusing to let him have her mistress's clothes that he might dress himself up as a girl. But when, in the same letter, he talks of tartuferie, one asks if Molière's plays had become household words in the nursery, or if it is not rather the hand of Maintenon.

On the dark suspicions that rest on the character of Madame de Montespan, M. Clément does not pretend to throw much new light. The Princess Palatine, in her Memoirs, perpetuates the scandal that La Montespan, ce diable incarné, had poisoned her rival, La Fontanges, in a cup of milk. In the poison panic in Paris her reputation did not escape, and the daughter of the infamous La Voisin swore to her having had frequent interviews with her mother; and it seems clear that La Montespan had at least purchased love-powders to be administered to the King. It is certain that the inflexible La Reynie wished to have both her and her sister-in-law placed at the bar, and that they were only saved from this disgrace by the interference of Colbert. For the rest, although it is impossible to establish her innocence, it would be hard, on the evidence we have, to pronounce her guilty of a charge that was never proved, and which would have been so naturally suggested by the jealousy of her rivals. M. Clément, we think, has done justice to one of those characters whom history is apt, not unnaturally, to treat unfairly, and whom the undiscriminating contempt and dislike of posterity condemn to do perpetual penance for the false position they occupied in life. He treads discreetly on delicate ground; manages to handle pitch without being defiled, instead of, like Michelet, rather revelling in the contact; writes Court scandal without compromising the dignity of history; and treats with the tact of a Frenchman, and something of the verve of a Grammont, subjects where most Englishmen would be puzzled between coarseness and reticence.

GRATIUS FALISCUS.*

PROBABLY Gratius Faliscus is the only poet of the Augustan age with whose poem the best scholars are not generally familiar. There was perhaps a time when his short work on the Chase attracted more attention than it does now, for in 1654 a translation of it into English was published in London. We have never seen a copy of the translation, and therefore cannot pronounce upon its merits. But the original was also printed by T. Johnson in 1690, together with the treatise of Nemesianus on the same subject.

The diminutive volume of the Aldine series whose title is given below, contains the editio princeps of this author, and was printed from the only entire manuscript of the work which is known to exist. And it is the only edition which represents the manuscript with all its blunders and lacunæ. There is a second manuscript of the first 159 lines, which one of Gratius's editors had seen, but which is quite useless because it is plainly a copy from the other. It may be supposed, therefore, that there is enough in the text of Gratius to exercise the ingenuity of scholars both in the way of emendation and addition. But this is not the relation in which we wish to call attention to the Cynegeticon now. Our principal object is to point out, to those who may feel an interest in it, what may be learned from the reading of the poem; and to give those who will not care to read him for themselves some idea of the merits of this unknown writer. It consists of 540 lines, and is entitled the Cynegeticon, but whether the title is to be considered a nominative singular or a genitive plural seems very questionable. This point is, however, of less importance than the meaning of the word, which must not be taken, as might be supposed, to refer to "dogs" especially, but to hunting in general. In fact, it is as much entitled to be called, in English, "The Chase, a Poem by Gratius," as its better known and more popular namesake, "The Chase, by William Somervile." The poet begins, in fact, by telling his readers that his opening subject will be the instruments rather than the animals used in hunting:—

> Armorum; cassesque plagarumque ordiar astus.

There is no point of peculiar interest in his description of the best construction of nets, or the most durable materials for the purpose. In this part of the poem there is only one line that requires notice. And it will be seen how little is known of the author when we say that the name of the country of his birth or residence is only known, or doubtfully inferred, from his complaining of the flax of the district as being wanting in strength, in the following words:—

> At contra nostris imbellia lina Faliscis.

It is said that the word "nostris" implies that the author was a Faliscan. We think it must be admitted that the conjecture rests on a somewhat slight foundation.

This first part of the poem concludes with a digression in which the poet ventures the following apology for devoting sixty lines to the subject of nets:—

> Nonne vides veterum quos prodit fabula rerum
> Semideos? illi aggeribus tentare superbis
> Ire freta; et matres ausi tractare Deorum,
> Quam magnâ mercede meo sine munere silvas
> Impulerint. Flet adhuc et porro flebit Adonim
> Victa Venus, ceciditque suis Ancæus in arvis,
> Et prædexter erat geminisque securibus ingens,
> Ipse Deus, cultosque fert Tyrinthius orbes,
> Quem mare, quem tellus, quem præceps janua Ditis,
> Omnia tentantem, qua laus erit obvia, passi,
> Hinc decus et famæ primus patravit honorem.
> Exige, si qua meis respondet ab artibus ergo
> Gratia, quæ vires fallat collata ferinas.

We fear that the abruptness of the transition, no less than the style of verse, will recall to the reader's mind the Georgics of Virgil rather in the way of contrast than comparison. We are not in the position of editors of Gratius, and therefore do not feel bound, as more than one of his admirers has ventured, to express our feeling of astonishment that the poet has so nearly dropped out of notice. And yet there are some passages which will repay the reading, and will in fact bear comparison with the polished diction of Virgil. Of this kind are the lines which describe the invention of nets and hunting-poles under the direction of the goddess Diana, in the person of Dercylos, an inhabitant of Amyclæ:—

> O felix tantis quem primum industria rebus
> Prodidit auctorem; Deas ille an proxima Divos
> Mens fuit, in cæcas aciem quæ magna tenebras
> Egit et ignarum perfudit lumine vulgus,
> Dic age Pierio (fas est) Diana ministro.
> Arcadium stat fama senem quem Mænalus auctor
> Et Lacedæmoniæ primum vidistis Amyclæ
> Per non assuetas metantem retia valles,
> Dercylon. Haud illo quisquam se justior egit,
> Aut fuit in terris Divûm observantior alter.
> Ergo illum primis nemorum Dea finxit in annis > Auctoremque operi dignata inscribere magno,
> Jussit adire suas et pandere gentibus artes.

After a few more lines devoted to the subject of arrows and javelins, the author proceeds to the main part of the poem, the description of the hounds, which has given the name to the whole work. After going through the various kinds of dogs, their breeding, their maladies, and the remedies to be applied, the author next proceeds to the horse, and in the middle of this part of the subject the manuscript breaks off abruptly, the last five lines being so obliterated, or so badly copied, that only about half of them can be made out. A specimen may suffice. The author begins the subject of colour as follows:—

> Venanti melius pugnat color; optima nigri
> -ra illi, badiosque legunt
> Et quorum fessas imitantur terga favillas, > ntum Italiæ, sic Dii voluere, parentes > et terras omni præcepimus usu > illustrat prata.

The word melius in the first of these lines is undoubtedly a corrupt reading for some word indicating colour; whether crura should be inserted at the beginning of the second line we will not take upon ourselves to decide. Badius is variously interpreted grey and bay, but fessæ favillæ must, we suppose, mean a light grey colour. In the previous lines the author had only spoken of the different countries that were supposed to produce, or to be adverse to the production of, good hunters. So we must suppose that the poem extended to a much greater length, as there is little or nothing in the portion that has survived, descriptive of the style and qualities of the hunter.

A question may arise as regards this part of the poem, how far there is evidence that Gratius had seen the Georgics of Virgil, and imitated them. But there is really little to decide upon. The accidental coincidence of expression in the two following lines proves nothing. Gratius, in describing the horse he does not want, says, > Quis Eleas potior lustravit arenas?

* Hoc Volumine continentur: Poetæ Tres egregii, nunc primum in lucem editi: Gratii qui Augusto principe floruit, de venatione lib. i.; P. Ovidii Nasonis Halieuticôn liber acephalus, M. Aurelii Olympii Nemesiani Cynegeticôn lib. i., ejusdem carmen bucolicum, T. Calphurnii Siculi Bucolica, Adriani Cardinalis venatio. M.D.XXXIIII.

and Virgil's praise of the racer is well known :—

> Hic vel ad Elei metas et maxima campi
> Sudabit spatia, et spumas aget ore cruentas.

Few of our readers, however, will, after reading what Gratius and what Virgil respectively say about the horse, be inclined to echo the sentiment with which one of the earliest of his editors concludes his annotations :—

> Mihi satis fuit Gratium illustrare; qui huc usque in tenebris delituisse videri potest, nec ullum omnino, quod sciam, interpretem nactus est: nunc fortasse commodius ac minori utique molestiâ legi poterit a studiosis. Gratius certe hujusmodi poeta est ut omnium manibus frequenter teri mereatur, non minus quidem quam Catullus, Virgilius, Horatius, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovidius, Manilius qui σύγχρονοι, aut certe haud ita longo inter se intervallo distantes fuisse existimantur.

The description of the best dogs for breeding will also remind any reader of the Georgics, and perhaps will suggest the idea that Gratius was an imitator of Virgil :—

> Sint celsi vultus, sint hirtæ frontibus aures,
> Os magnum, et patulis agitatos morsibus ignes,
> Spirent, adstricti succingant ilia ventres;
> Cauda levis, longumque latus, discretaque collo
> Cæsaries, non pexa nimis, non frigoris illa
> Impatiens; validis tum surgat pectus ab armis
> Quod magnos capiat motus, magnisque supersit.

We have selected some of the best lines from Gratius, and perhaps it may be thought that they will bear little comparison with the exquisitely polished diction of Virgil; but some readers will be more struck with the contrast exhibited in the abrupt introduction of the episodes and the equally abrupt transition from them to the main thread of the subject. The digression concerning the baneful effects of luxury is introduced àpropos of the question of the proper feeding of hounds, and the return from it to the main subject is a mere repetition of the idea:—

> Sic parvis componere magna solebam.

We will quote one other passage which will give some idea of Gratius's descriptive powers :—

> Est in Trinacriâ specus ingens rupe, cavique
> Introrsum reditus ; circum atræ mœnia sylvæ
> Alta premunt, ruptique ambustis faucibus amnes ;
> Vulcano condicta domus, quam subter eunti
> Stagna sedent venis oleoque madentia vivo.

The contributions to grammatical rules which Gratius furnishes are a single instance of proximus governing an accusative case; the use of dorcas as a masculine plural, as if it came from the Greek nominative δόρξ, which is used by Oppian; and several instances of the second form of the second person singular of the imperative mood, such as petito, adesto, which seem to point to the conclusion that there is no tenable distinction between the meaning of the two forms. He also appears to use without metrical necessity the accusative form vulgum in preference to the more common vulgus. In illustration of rules or exceptions in Prosody, we notice one instance of the final vowel being lengthened before two consonants of the following word in generosa stirps, and one instance of que being lengthened at the first cæsura of the verse:—

> Taxique pinusque altinatesque genistæ.

We must not conclude our notice of the editio princeps of Gratius without remarking that the editor has appended to it a poem descriptive of a boar-hunt and a subsequent banquet, by Adrian de Castello, the Cardinal who was Henry VII.'s ambassador at the Court of Rome at the time when the petition for the dispensation for the marriage of Henry, Prince of Wales, with Prince Arthur's widow was on the tapis. It consists of between 400 and 500 hendecasyllables, which are exceedingly creditable to the scholarship of the Cardinal Bishop of Bath and Wells, and which, as far as we know, are the only specimens of his Latin verse composition extant, though several letters in the Record Office testify to his excellent Latin scholarship. As the goddess Diana is one of the persons who figure in the hunt, the writer probably did not expect that his readers should interpret literally all that he says. The death of the boar by a javelin entering his mouth and coming out at his tail forcibly reminds us of the similar account in that veracious historian, Baron Munchausen.

THE MEETING AT CHESTERFIELD HOUSE.

THE Irish Protestants have had their great Conference with the Conservative Peers. The Duke of ABERCORN invited an attendance of Protestants and Peers at Chesterfield House last Saturday, and at any rate the Protestants could not complain that they did not enjoy an opportunity of stating their case fully and fairly. Every topic on which timid or indignant Orangemen can wish to dilate was handled with unquenched fervour and at most exuberant length. The speakers all spoke in the same key. The Bill was wicked, was mischievous, was in the last degree treacherous. Ireland would be ruined by it, the British Empire would be ruined by it, all Protestantism in all countries would be ruined by it. In Yankee language, they piled up the horrors smart, and hoped that the breath would leave the quivering bodies of the terror-stricken peers. But they could not get the peers present to commit themselves. Those whom they addressed had, they were informed, been most deeply interested by all they had heard, and would think what was best to be done. This did not look much like fighting the Battle of the Boyne over again. The peers evidently had not made up their minds to imperil the interests of their order under the excitement of listening to the effusions of wild Orangemen. But, however disappointed they may have been, they were perhaps prepared for the disappointment. There was an ominous absence in the group of listening peers. Lord CAIRNS was not there, and they knew perfectly well what was implied by his not thinking it prudent to attend. They were asking the Lords to do what would involve the sacrifice of interests even far greater than any connected with the Irish Church. It is said that Lord CAIRNS when in Ireland had already told them this, and that his absence from the Chesterfield House meeting struck them with dismay, because it showed he really meant what he said. However that may be, they could guess what is likely to be the final decision, not only of the leader of the Conservative party in the Lords, but of all his foremost associates. It has indeed been since reported that the Conservative peers have made up their minds to reject the second reading. But this is incredible; and however much some of them may threaten, or whatever show of desperate courage they may like it to be thought that they are going to make, it is impossible to believe that they will run the enormous danger which such a course would involve. It is far more probable that they will throw all their strength into carrying amendments favourable to the Church. The general scheme for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church, they may say, must be taken as imposed on the Lords by the voice of the people; but the people had none of the details of the present measure submitted to them at the hustings; and the Lords are entitled to assume that, if the Bill can be made more just and fair to the Church, the people would recognise in any well-grounded modifications the expression of their true wishes. It will be time enough to discuss the amendments proposed by the Lords when we see what they are. They ought to be canvassed on their merits, and, without prejudice. If a case can be made out for them by solid argument, and by appeal to unquestionable policy, they ought not to be set aside in order to gratify the Ministry and the majority in the Commons. All that can be said is, that amendments of this sort are as yet in total obscurity. No organ of the Conservatives, or of the friends of the Irish Church, has, so far as we know, been able to propose any material amendment which will bear discussion. The only amendments reduced into a tangible shape, and accredited by the position of their proposer, are the amendments of Mr. DISRAELI, and his amendments were wholly inadmissible. They were, as Mr. GLADSTONE happily remarked, like the blessings which ended the trials of the Patriarch JOB. His possessions were taken away from him, but then, by the happy amendments introduced into his fortunes, all, and much more than all, taken away was restored to him, and his last state was very much better than his first.

The Irish Protestants at Chesterfield House were very furious, and those whom they represented have lately been still more furious. They have held many meetings lately, and their talk is of nothing but treason and civil war. They thirst for blood like giants in a pantomime. They roam about shouting Fee Fo Fum and scenting the blood of Mr. GLADSTONE. We cannot help liking the Rev. JOHN FLANAGAN, in his way, who has delivered his soul at Ballibay, county Monaghan. He is such a typical Orange gladiator. He does not mince matters in the least. Not only does he inform the QUEEN that she will commit perjury if she assents to the Irish Church Bill, but he tells her that she may expect to meet the fate of JAMES II., and drop her crown in the Boyne. He smells the battle from afar. He counts up his hosts, and he is quite prepared to face the British Empire. He has got an army of two hundred thousand men in Ireland, and of no less than a million and a-half, if he is allowed to include the remote dependencies of England. Possibly the odds may nevertheless be on the side of the British Government, but he trusts fervently in that Providence which he believes will, for once in a way, not declare itself on the side of the stronger battalions. Here is the real original rampant Orangeman seen at his best, or worst. The Church Militant never exceeded this outburst of ardour. Bunkum never took a higher or a nobler flight. And now what is the answer which he gets, and which he ought to get, from England? It is very simple. We are not going to ask him to reckon up his strength against ours, and to invite him to retire, like a candidate for a University constituency, if he finds the probable balance against him. We do not credit him with the amount of sense and good feeling which prompts University candidates to retire from a struggle likely to do more harm than good. We merely invite him, and those who admire him, and those who put his sentiments in a somewhat milder form, when they get over the Channel, to observe that such language is the very best justification for passing the Irish Church Bill that could possibly be given. It is precisely because Protestant ascendency has instilled [illegible] into the minds of men otherwise just and [illegible] that we wish it to come to an end. This abuse of political power in the name of religion is the very worst consequence of the system embodied in the Irish Church. It has [illegible] the minds of men. To defend the Irish Church in the spirit and with the language of Orangemen seems to taint even the minds of good and equitable men. We wish the Irish Church, as at present constituted, to come to an end, precisely because its unhappy history fills the minds of men with bad thoughts, and provokes them into intemperate language. Within the last year we have seen an English Archbishop actually praising the Irish Church because it is an embodiment of religious hatred. We have seen an Irish Archbishop, previously known as a man quiet, moderate, and gentlemanly, speaking of a Cabinet supported by the great majority of the English people as a set of garotters. We have seen an Irish Bishop striving to win a moment's applause by [illegible] on the PREMIER. The supporters of the Irish Church come forward as the true friends of such men. They want to cure the Archbishop of YORK of sentiments alien to a mind not generally illiberal; they want to save the Archbishop of DUBLIN and the Bishop of CORK from using language disgraceful to their order. They want to make the Rev. JOHN FLANAGAN as [illegible] an anachronism as a big fossil lizard. This is what they want, and this is what, if the Lords have listened to reason, they have every prospect of doing before the year is out. By next Christmas they may fairly hope this clerical firebrand will be as much out of date as if he were down several yards deep in an Oolite formation.

All these fierce Irishmen at Chesterfield House and elsewhere keep asserting and howling over the inevitable ruin of Protestantism in Ireland. They take it as indisputable that their religion must die out unless it is provided by the State with an enormous amount of money. They speak of themselves as if they were converted Jews at Jerusalem, and could only be kept converted if they got their piastres regularly. What an uncommonly poor religion Irish Protestantism must be if they are right! Here is a religion which has had all the advantages of State support for three centuries, which is professed by persons holding nine-tenths of the Irish soil, and which, as its friends allege, is secured by the impassioned support of all the most intelligent, thriving, and prosperous part of the Irish population, and yet it is going to die out like the wick of a burnt-up candle if it is now placed on an equality with other religions. Supposing the Irish Protestants really believed in Irish Protestantism, would they dishonour their religion by the most distant approach to stating anything of the sort? They profess, further, to believe that, besides these great external and mundane advantages, they have got the overwhelming spiritual advantage of being in exclusive possession of the truth. The Gospel in its purity is committed to their sole charge, and yet this embodiment of truth, this genuine unadulterated Gospel, backed up by almost all the landed wealth of the country, by the inherited traditions of centuries, and by the vast preponderance of Irish education and Irish industrial energy, is to melt away like dew before the sun, unless the secular arm of the State will throw down all its adversaries before it. No body of sincere and moderately intelligent Protestants ever before spoke with such outrageous contempt of Protestantism. If they are right, they have got hold of the most puny, rickety abortion of a religion that ever offered itself as the child of the spiritual longings of civilized man. Is it true, then, that they are not sincere Protestants, or that Protestantism is the sickly ward of the State they represent it to be? There is no reason for believing either proposition. They are, doubtless, honest Protestants, and Protestantism is, we may trust, built on a solid rock. But the fact is that the peculiar history of their Church has nursed them from their cradle into a habit of regarding Protestantism, not as an expression of spiritual and intellectual truth, but as an embodiment of political supremacy. They hold it as the Normans held the fiefs, and manors, and honours of conquered England. To be a Protestant in Ireland is not to entertain certain views as to the destiny or duties of man, but to enjoy a kind of patent of nobility. Let us hope these Irish Protestants may themselves some day come to bless the misunderstood and unappreciated friends who, against their will, will have taught them to begin to look on Protestantism as a religion. We have not, we own, much hope of the Rev. JOHN FLANAGAN. He will, we fear, go down to his Oolite grave cursing Mr. GLADSTONE and the House of Commons, and possibly the House of Lords too, and the whole nature of things in the British Empire, because his enemies have tried to free him from the illusion that in this world and the next he must necessarily be justified because he has the Battle of the Boyne to his credit. But milder men and a younger generation may show themselves more accessible to the whisperings of reason, and may see and rejoice in the splendid opportunity they have given them of pushing forward Protestantism on its own intrinsic merits.

MR. MOTLEY.

If it is true that the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and the Liverpool American Chamber of Commerce complied with established usage in presenting addresses to the American Minister, neither body can be severely blamed for continuing a courteous and harmless custom. Both the addresses were conventional, and therefore unobjectionable, in their language, with the exception of a reference to commercial policy which was perhaps indiscreet, and certainly unsuited to the occasion. It is not the business of an Envoy to criticize or approve, in his intercourse with foreigners, the domestic legislation of his own country; and it would have been well not to afford Mr. MOTLEY an opportunity for rebuking an intrusive suggestion. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce ought to have known that the dominant Protectionists of America derive their most popular argument from the fact that Free-trade would incidentally benefit England. The warmest advocates of the present tariff, represented by Mr. GREELEY, have for an entire generation been the bitterest enemies of England. The amiable writers in the Tribune constantly assert that the Free-Trade League is subsidized with that English gold which has, since the days of ROBESPIERRE, been so profusely created by Jacobinical mendacity. The language used in the Liverpool address will be eagerly quoted as an admission that political economy is exclusively advantageous to England. Mr. MOTLEY, on a previous day, was unable to accept a seat in the carriage of the Mayor of LIVERPOOL on the singular ground that he had not yet presented his credentials to the QUEEN; or, according to another version, because he was unwilling to compromise himself by accepting municipal favours. It is fortunate that the same scruple did not restrain him from answering the Chamber of Commerce in terms of the strictest diplomatic propriety. It may be hoped that the ceremony, which perhaps could not without slight have been omitted at Liverpool, will not be unnecessarily repeated in other towns which Mr. MOTLEY may have occasion to visit. Experience has shown that the expression of anxiety for the equitable adjustment of disputes has been systematically misinterpreted in the United States. The otherwise unaccountable violence which culminated in Mr. SUMNER'S disgraceful speech was the immediate consequence of the speeches and addresses made in honour of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON. English feelings of good will, however sincere, were in America unanimously attributed to cowardice; and consequently not a dissentient voice was raised when Mr. SUMNER demanded an act of national humiliation, together with the payment of a tribute of incredible amount. Mr. MOTLEY is not likely to imitate the error of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON in encouraging a degrading and dangerous mistake; and even if he were disposed to be as effusive as his predecessor, the Senate has taken care to show how far an American Minister may be from representing his Government. On more than one occasion during the singular negotiation recorded in the published Correspondence, Mr. JOHNSON assured Lord STANLEY or Lord CLARENDON that one more concession would ensure the approval of the Senate. If at any time it seems expedient to pay Mr. MOTLEY any public civilities, his literary reputation provides a suitable topic for complimentary phrases; and the Liverpool Chambers showed sound judgment in devoting a part of their addresses to a subject in which the utmost ingenuity could not discover a pretext for resentment.

If the Senate had not rendered the whole negotiation abortive, it would be difficult to read the diplomatic Correspondence with patience. From first to last Mr. SEWARD dictated the course of proceeding, while the English Ministers invariably complied with his successive and increasing demands. The arguments on either side are not contained in the despatches; and perhaps it may have been thought that, in the prospect of a reference to arbitration, it was useless to prosecute the controversy. The merits of the question will be publicly discussed, almost for the first time, in the debate which is impending in the House of Commons; and probably attention will be called to the inconsistency of the American Government in its respective dealings with France and with England. In November, 1862, the Emperor of the FRENCH, in a formal communication to the English Government, proposed that the Maritime Powers, which, as he truly said, had maintained the strictest neutrality, should, by the tender of their good offices, "assist the two 'belligerent parties in an endeavour to escape from a position 'which has no issue." Lord RUSSELL, in the name of the English Government, declined the proposal, on the ground that the offer would probably be rejected by the Federal Government. Although suggestions which would have been still more obnoxious to the North were only preferred in conversation, it must have been well known to Mr. SEWARD, and to Mr. SUMNER as Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, that France would at any moment have gladly recognised the independence of the Confederacy but for the steady resistance of England. Yet the American Government has never varied its expressions of friendship to France, or the exacting tone of its negotiations with England. The text of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S Convention was published, in defiance of American usage, even before it was submitted to the Senate; and consequently the Massachusetts Assembly had an opportunity of passing an inflammatory Resolution against the conclusion of a Treaty.

The new Minister will apparently enjoy ample leisure, as it is understood that he is not instructed to resume negotiation. The English Government is fortunately relieved, by the contumelious rejection of Mr. SEWARD'S Treaty, from the obligation of proposing any alternative settlement. The Naturalization Treaty, containing the large concessions which had been not unreasonably desired by the American Government, has been approved by the Senate; but the San Juan Treaty has not been taken into consideration. As all disputed questions were arranged by Lord STANLEY or by Lord CLARENDON with the Minister for the time being, there is nothing for Mr. MOTLEY to discuss. Even at Washington no progress can be made in the San Juan Treaty during the recess; and although the continuance of the provisional joint occupation of the disputed territory is inconvenient, there is little reason, while the Senate is in its present temper, to regret a further adjournment. Diplomatic communications are highly useful in removing accidental causes of difference between two communities which desire to maintain amicable relations. When one or both of the principals prefer a grievance to satisfaction or compromise, discussion only tends to create and prolong irritation. It is proper that an English Minister should reside at Washington, and an American Minister in London, because a suspension of official intercourse would be unusual, and probably significant of hostility; but the use of either Legation is principally negative. The unbounded publicity which prevails in both countries leaves an Ambassador nothing to discover for the information of his Government which may not be found in the newspapers. Mr. MOTLEY will hardly trouble himself or the Secretary of State by writing despatches to announce the friendly feelings of Mr. GLADSTONE, Lord CLARENDON, and the country at large to the people and Government of the United States; nor will a sensible and well-bred diplomatist annoy the Foreign Secretary with superfluous proofs that Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON wholly misrepresented the sentiments of his countrymen. Immediately after the rejection of the Treaty it seemed probable that, in accordance with the suggestions of several American journals, some offensive proposal might be made for the surrender of English territory, especially as Lord STANLEY had expressed no indignation at a suggestion of the kind offered by Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON; but it almost seems as if an impossible demand had been preferred only for the purpose of expressing general ill-will, without any more practical object. The Washington Correspondent of a New York paper, with dramatic fitness, if not with historical accuracy, states that Mr. SUMNER is greatly amused with the indignation which he has provoked in England. In Europe, State papers and official speeches on international questions are not habitually composed in joke. It is a strange excuse for a declaration all but unanimously adopted by the Senate, that the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations is well known to be a mere rhetorician. If peace is ultimately maintained, there will be no advantage in discussing the method by which it has been secured; but there is always a danger that some unforeseen incident may lead to a rupture. If such a risk should practically occur, Mr. MOTLEY will have an opportunity of displaying the judgment and ability which he may fairly be supposed to possess. During his mission to Vienna, although he can have had no serious business to transact, he had the opportunity of becoming practically acquainted with the forms and traditions of diplomacy. As the Americans have never allowed their representatives in foreign countries to form a distinct profession, Ministers who happen to have acquired diplomatic experience possess a great advantage over mere politicians. His long and familiar acquaintance with English society ought to provide him with additional facilities for the effective discharge of his functions.

An American Minister may at the present moment devote himself to the discharge of his special duties with the complacent feeling that he represents as an ornamental Envoy, if not as a real Plenipotentiary, the most prosperous of communities. The internal animosities which survived the war have actually or apparently subsided since Congress became tired of the process of reconstruction. There is much probability that the formal restoration of Virginia to the Union will be completed, in consequence of the judicious policy adopted by the PRESIDENT. In conformity, as it is supposed, with the advice of General LEE, General GRANT has provisionally authorized a separate vote on two obnoxious articles inserted in the proposed Constitution for the avowed purpose of disfranchising the best citizens of the State. Notwithstanding the exertions of Radical agitators, it is believed that the disfranchising clauses will be rejected, at the same time that the Constitution is adopted by the necessary majority. Although the ultimate decision rests with Congress, it is probable that, if General GRANT's suggestion is adopted by the Conservative party in Virginia, public opinion will require the admission of the State to the full exercise of its federal rights. Since the death of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, and the disappearance of Mr. JOHNSON from political life, the angry passions which influenced the conduct of the Republican party have in great measure been forgotten. For the present the Southern Senators and Representatives will justify the expectations of the authors of negro suffrage by supporting the policy of their patrons. There can be little doubt that, sooner or later, the white population will recover their natural supremacy; but parties will in the meantime arrange themselves with reference to new issues, and the census of next year will readjust the balance of representation by [illegible] to the power of the Western States. [illegible]
troversy acquires the importance which the subject deserves, the South and the West will find it their interest to combine against the selfish legislation of the manufacturing States. It is only because the vast territory of the United States forms a little world in itself that the anomalous taxes imposed on the masses of consumers by petty combinations of producers have been patiently endured. No perversity can seriously check the material progress which almost exceeds the boasts of grandiloquent patriots. In ten years the debt or its residue, if it is not swelled by the demands of some unnecessary war, will have become a comparatively insignificant burden, by the distribution of the charge over a larger and wealthier body of debtors. Within the same time it is not impossible that San Francisco may rival New York in trade and prosperity, while New Orleans will grow in proportion to the population of the great basin of the Mississippi. The touchy and exacting diplomacy which has so often threatened the maintenance of peace seems unworthy of a Republic which will in a few years be the most powerful nation in the world. The risk of disruption which might otherwise have been imminent has been indefinitely postponed by the injudicious and premature attempt of the Southern States to secede.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE BANK.

IT is strange that a Chancellor of the Exchequer who is a master of lucid speech should be driven to explain in the Times the meaning of his Parliamentary language; but the oddity is accounted for by Mr. LOWE's taste for the form of epigrammatic expression which is popularly known as a snub. With the impatience of a rapid intellect, he resents the dulness of his hearers in not understanding some novel statement, by repeating the same proposition in a more condensed and difficult shape. To the complaint that five quarters of Income-tax will have been paid in the current year he lately answered, with a complacency which represented the combination of a fiscal infliction with a verbal paradox, that on the same assumption there were always five quarters due in the year. Turnpike-keepers, according to a philosophic theory recorded by Mr. DICKENS, are misanthropes who have adopted the profession partly for solitude, and partly to avenge themselves on mankind by taking the tolls. There is a trace of the same kind of cynicism in Mr. LOWE's desire to bewilder the taxpayer's intellect, as well as to demand his money at the most inconvenient season. In his letter to the Times he is content with the sound argument that the last April payment, being in no way connected with the present Budget, ought to be left out of the calculation. The same amount would have been paid if the Income-tax had been either doubled or abolished, or if it had been determined to levy five years' taxes in a single sum. The true comparison is between payment in three or four instalments and a single collection in January; and Mr. LOWE shows that one half of the tax will be postponed, while only one quarter will be paid in advance of the period formerly adopted. The objection remains that a large demand will be made at one time, and that it will immediately follow the drain on private resources which is caused by Christmas bills. The advantage of receiving a quarter's interest on the instalment which would have been payable in October is purely imaginary, except in the rare cases in which provident taxpayers keep their money ready for the collector on a deposit account. In defending another provision of his Budget, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER professed a well-founded faith in the soundness of general principles even where it was difficult to verify the detailed results; but political economy, like law, disregards trifles; or, rather, it would proceed on a false assumption if it calculated interest on every petty sum which a man may keep in his desk, or add to his balance at his banker's. It is nearly certain that Mr. LOWE or his successor will be compelled, by the experience of a single year, to modify the arrangement by which all direct taxes are made receivable at the same time. It would be well worth while to incur some additional expense of collection for the purpose of separating the term at which the assessed-tax licences are to be issued from the period of collecting the Income-tax. The best excuse for the new arrangement is that it provides the means of reducing the nominal percentage of the Income-tax before the agitation against indirect taxes has seriously commenced. The repeal of the duties on Fire-insurance and on different modes of locomotion will be highly beneficial, and perhaps Mr. LOWE's faith in the expediency of abolishing the Corn-duty may be justified by an ultimate reduction of price. It was on various grounds desirable to remove the last protective tax from the English tariff; but perhaps it would have been better to postpone the reform for twelve months than to add half a year's charge to the assessed taxes, and a quarter of a year's charge to the Income-tax. On the other hand, it may be suggested that it is prudent to conciliate general support to a fiscal project by distributing relief among as many classes as possible of the community. Corn-merchants, shipowners, and eventually consumers, will share the benefits which are bestowed on insurers, on cab-owners, and on travellers, and which are extended, in consideration of a payment in gross, to possessors of incomes and payers of assessed taxes.

In the course of the late discussion Mr. LOWE more than once exhibited a disregard of the arts of popularity which is more characteristic than laudable. If it was indiscreet to perplex the House with phrases which seemed to include five quarters in the year, the repeated expression of disregard to the interests of the money-market was equally useless and more impolitic. Truth is often sufficiently disagreeable in appearance without the addition of a repulsive costume. A Chancellor of the Exchequer is fully justified in confining his attention to the interests of the Treasury; but there is no need to affront capitalists and money-dealers who may be affected by his fiscal operations. Mr. LOWE's extenuation of the alleged inconvenience which is supposed to be a probable consequence of his proposed arrangements amounts to an admission that he committed a mistake in telling the money-market to take care of itself. It is to a certain extent true that the private deposits will be increased in amount at the time when the balances in the Exchequer are lowest, but practical authorities hold that the compensation will be insufficient; and if no harm was to be done, it was unnecessary to disclaim responsibility for an imaginary mischief. The contrivances by which the Savings' Banks are to be made applicable to meet the temporary wants of the Government would have been explained when the Budget was introduced, if they had not been a mere afterthought. It may be conjectured that the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER had overlooked some of the practical effects of his plan until it was criticized by the representatives of City interests. It may perhaps be practicable for the Government to act in some respects as its own banker, instead of relying for accommodation on the Bank of England; but when Mr. LOWE discovered that he was, in his official character, a great capitalist, he might advantageously have inferred that he could not safely regard with indifference the fluctuations of the money-market. As a banker, a Chancellor of the Exchequer is subjected to the serious disability of not being a lender as well as a borrower or holder of deposits. Much technical ingenuity will be required in avoiding the risk of loss from the alternate inflation and depletion of the balances; and the most skilful advisers and auxiliaries of the Government would be found among the bankers and dealers who are alarmed by Mr. LOWE's uncompromising language. It is his pleasure to declare that the Bank of England is a private institution, in the same spirit in which he formerly denounced school-inspectors as pedants, and school-managers as greedy claimants on the public purse. In a certain sense, it is of course notorious that the Bank is a joint-stock association, conducted for the benefit of its shareholders; but it is not less true that it is at the same time almost a department of the Government, providing a singularly effective and economical agency for receipt and distribution. All wise men consult as far as possible the convenience of those with whom they have relations of business, on the general assumption that they will have to pay in some form for any avoidable trouble or annoyance which they may cause. The Bank of England will endeavour to recoup itself at the expense of the Government for any loss which it may sustain through a change in the conduct of fiscal transactions. The Directors will probably not be influenced by merely verbal taunts; but Ministers, as well as private persons, ought to remember that civility costs nothing. In provoking adverse criticism from a Governor of the Bank who happens to be a warm supporter of the Government, a Chancellor of the Exchequer, new to his office, is almost certain to have committed a blunder.

During the interval which has elapsed since the introduction of the Budget, there has been time to ascertain the opinion which is formed of its merits; and, although the collection of all the direct taxes at the same time is generally condemned, the selection of taxes for reduction or abolition has received and merited approval. The benevolence or forced loan of next January may perhaps not be too high a price to pay for a saving of half the total cost of fire insurance, and for a supply of vehicles for hire in villages and at railway stations; and though the Income-tax for the year is really increased, an ostensible diminution is valuable as a recognition of a sound principle. It is provoking to reflect that, even in the absence of new provisions, there would have been a small surplus if Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI had not been bent on the pedantic crotchet of converting Consols into terminable annuities. The money would have been more advantageously spent as a contribution to the cost of the Abyssinian war; or, if it had been applied to the removal of the exceptional duty on hackney carriages, that portion of the deficiency would not have required to be met in the present year. If Mr. LOWE has the fortune of producing a second Budget, he will probably be able to substitute a still more cheerful statement for the agreeable surprise which he lately offered to the House of Commons. The further reductions of the Army and Navy Estimates will be not inconsiderable; and as three full years have elapsed since the great panic, it may be fairly hoped that the increased returns of exports indicate some revival of trade. The financial condition of the country, as distinguished from commercial prosperity, is essentially sound. Although the reduction of the debt has been recently suspended, a sum of ten millions, which in any other European country would have been charged to capital, has been applied from revenue to the exorbitant demands of the short Abyssinian campaign. If peace continues, the agreeable task of reducing the public burdens may be resumed at the point where Mr. GLADSTONE left it on his last retirement from office. The first duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1870 will be to repeal the remaining Abyssinian penny of the Income-tax; and perhaps the sugar duties may come next in order. It is fortunate that the conduct of the finances will probably be entrusted for a few years to statesmen who were trained during the period in which political economy was a national creed. While democratic communities in all parts of the world incline more and more to protective systems, not a single tax now remains in the English tariff which confers an undue collateral advantage on any class of producers. It is not impossible that sound traditions may survive the practical supremacy which still remains by sufferance to the wealthier section of society; and the risk of pernicious fiscal experiments will be still further reduced, if the House of Commons is careful to reduce, as far as possible, the burdens which press most heavily on the bulk of the population. The probable rise in the cost of sugar in Cuba, through the approaching emancipation of the slaves, furnishes an additional reason for dealing with the tax.

THE FRENCH ELECTIONS AND THE EMPEROR.

THE Imperial Government has gained one advantage from the elections. The triumph of the Radical candidates in the great towns has proved that the alarm of the authorities at the BAUDIN demonstrations last winter had more to justify it than was generally thought at the time. The MINISTER of the INTERIOR had so often flaunted the possible resurrection of Socialism before the eyes of the middle-classes that the warning had almost become a joke. Well-to-do citizens have large capacities for being frightened when the danger is not too impalpable, but they are hardly imaginative enough to conceive that a system which they find so comfortable may have revolutionary forces working at its base, and threatening to bring it down about their ears. The elections in Paris and Lyons may bring conviction to sceptics of this class. The subversive passions about which the EMPEROR has talked so often that his hearers began to doubt their existence have suddenly started up in full force. Universal suffrage has been appealed to, and, as regards Paris, its answer is unmistakeable. The official candidates have been rejected by an immense majority of those who voted, and by a decided majority even of the registered electors, while of this majority something like half is exactly of that type the dread of which has for seventeen years been the best card in the EMPEROR's hand. The spectre about which so much has been said turns out to be made of veritable flesh and blood. The Democratic and Socialist Republic is no longer the dream of a few enthusiasts; it is the creed of thousands of Frenchmen, who ask for nothing better than an opportunity of proving their faith by their works. Who can now blame M. PINARD for turning Paris into a besieged city on the 3rd of December? who can wonder that the police lost their heads when the "Marseillaise" was sung in the streets a week or two back?

Whether the authorities knew the full truth or not, the elections have justified their precautions. That out of more than 400,000 registered electors, only some 86,000 should care enough for the powers that be to take the trouble of voting for their nominees; that more than this number are irreconcilably hostile to the Empire; that of those who are not so, the best that can be said is that they are admirers of M. THIERS or M. JULES FAVRE—are facts which the Government may fairly plead in its defence when it is accused of having too keen a scent for coming danger.

It remains to be seen, however, whether, in assuming these lifelike proportions, the ghost has not lost those mysterious horrors with which the thought of it was formerly surrounded. The elections of Sunday week showed that Socialism is again a reality; the elections of to-morrow will help us to ascertain whether it still excites the same blind and unreasoning consternation that it excited in 1851. In many of the fifty-nine constituencies where there has to be a second ballot the moderate Opposition, though it cannot return its own candidate, has it in its power to determine whether the victory shall lie with the Government or the Radical Opposition. The Liberal leaders have shown no hesitation as to the line to be followed in this position of affairs. They have made up their minds that, where the remedy is Personal Government, the disease itself must be encountered as the preferable alternative. M. THIERS in particular has been true to the programme of the Liberal Union, and has recommended his supporters at Marseilles to transfer their votes to M. GAMBETTA. But, after the unmistakeable evidence which the elections have afforded of the strength of the Republican party, will even M. THIERS's influence avail to secure for M. GAMBETTA the votes of the middle-class electors? This is, in effect, the question which will be answered to-morrow in other constituencies beside Marseilles. If, as seems likely, the Liberal Opposition stands by its leaders and its professions, and votes for a Socialist rather than for an Imperialist, the obvious inference will be that the Conservative reaction which ensured the success of the Empire has spent much of its force, in which case the one consolation the Government can find in the elections will be deprived of all its value. If, on the contrary, an official candidate steps in here and there because the middle-class Liberals are more anxious to ensure order than to regain liberty, the authorities will argue, with some show of probability, that if the elections were to be held over again, some of the constituencies which have shown a majority for the Opposition would now see cause to reverse their judgment, and to rally once more round the protector whom they have only deserted because they wrongly thought they could do so without danger.

If we assume that the more probable of these results will be the one actually shown by to-morrow's ballot, the next question that presents itself is the influence which the completed elections will exert on the policy of the Government. It seems hardly possible that the EMPEROR should continue to act as though nothing had happened. No doubt, like other autocrats, he has those around him who will be ready to prophesy smooth things. But though NAPOLEON III. has of late surrendered himself more and more to the guidance of his Ministers, he is very greatly their superior alike in keenness of vision and in breadth of conception. He is not the man to overlook the significance of the verdict which France has just given, or to rest satisfied without some new effort to meet the new demands which the situation makes on him. In 1863 the Imperial vote stood to the Opposition vote in the proportion of three to one; in 1869 it stands to it in the proportion of five to four. It is true that, as a matter of area, France is still Imperialist. The 4,000,000 voters upon whom the Government can count are distributed over the whole country; the 3,200,000 voters who have thrown in their lot with the Opposition are mostly collected in the larger towns. But it is a hazardous business to rule any people in the teeth of its most intelligent and best-organized classes, and that, too, just when it has been shown that they are gaining fresh strength every year. Yet this is what the EMPEROR must attempt, if he is to govern from 1869 to 1875 as he has governed from 1863 to 1869. Supposing him to shrink from such an experiment as this, he has, like an English Prime Minister, three courses open to him. He may conciliate the Liberals, properly so called, by the grant of "necessary liberties." Unfortunately, as we pointed out last week, the time for doing this to any purpose seems to have passed, and even if M. PRÉVOST-PARADOL is right, and the vote of Paris indicates impatience only, not Socialism, it must be remembered that the EMPEROR has as genuine a distaste for Parliamentary government as Professor BEESLY or Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON. Englishmen often speak as though it were wonderful why NAPOLEON III. should take so much trouble to be an Emperor when he might easily be a constitutional King. The simple explanation is that the position they marvel at his rejecting is in his eyes too contemptible to be worth taking. A second alternative is to conciliate the Socialist democracy. That he has for some time cherished some scheme of this sort is evident by his relations with the Peuple, and the bitter hostility of the Radical Opposition to the Parliamentary Liberals which is indicated by M. D'ALTON-SHEE's determination, in the teeth of his own professions, to oppose M. THIERS at the second ballot, certainly suggests a reconciliation between it and the EMPEROR on the basis of a common enmity. But the dangers of such an attempt are great and obvious. The fanatical hatred which the Radical Opposition bears towards NAPOLEON III. could only be changed into friendship, or even softened into indifference, by the adoption of an actively Socialist policy at home, which would alienate the whole property-holding class, and an actively anti-Papal policy in Italy, which would excite the implacable wrath of the clergy. Is it worth while to make two certain and powerful enemies for the sake of the chance, doubtful as it must be at best, of winning to his side the democrats of Paris and Lyons? If he rejects both these expedients, he may revert to the policy of the earlier years of his reign, and try to weaken the strength of the Opposition by giving the nation something else to think of. Much of the dissatisfaction manifested by the elections is probably attributable to the ill-success which has of late attended all the foreign enterprises of the Empire. A large number of Frenchmen consented not to be free at home, on the understanding that they were to be great abroad; and now they complain, not unjustly, that the EMPEROR has not kept to his bargain. It is likely enough that, if he were now to do his part handsomely, they would condone his past negligence, and allow politics as well as laws to be silenced by the clash of bayonets. Besides the loss of strength to the Opposition which would ensue from such a diversion as this, a war would have the further effect of making the EMPEROR additionally popular with his troops. If a great army is to be kept in good humour, it must from time to time have fame and promotion found for it; and when every other class seems falling from him, NAPOLEON III. has more cause than ever to keep this fact in mind. Where the risks on all sides are so many, an irresolute mind will usually either remain immovably balanced between them, or will make its ultimate selection almost at random. We do not think the EMPEROR will do the first; we are by no means sure that he will not do the last.

THE DEBATE ON THE THIRD READING.

MR. DISRAELI enlivened, or at least marked, the debate of last Monday by finding something new to say on the Irish Church. He must be tired, and he may well be disgusted, with a discussion in which he knows he can win no credit, and in which he must feel he is taking the wrong side. He sought, therefore, to escape from the twinges of his own intellectual judgment or conscience, and from the fanaticism and platitudes of his supporters, by taking refuge in a new set of paradoxes on Irish history. His last theory is that the Irish Church has been wantonly sacrificed to the ignorance of a Ministry who did not understand the true character of the Fenian rebellion. The rebellion, he thinks, was of purely American origin, and failed because no Irishman would have anything to do with it. Unfortunately, the Ministry, in their blindness, chose to treat it as a symptom of real Irish discontent, and, not knowing what other bone to throw to the dog, flung the persecuted Irish Church in its way. The dog will of course eat its bone, and the Irish Catholics, although thoroughly happy before, will permit themselves to be represented as likely to be made still happier by having the Protestant Church humiliated and robbed. This is the startling paradox on which Mr. DISRAELI has chosen to rely in order to conceal, if possible, from himself and others the position in which he really stands. Ireland not only has no grievance, but does not think it has any. It is only a foolish Liberal Ministry that whispers to EVE in Erin that there is something she might properly long for. The theory worked out by Mr. DISRAELI only such a short time ago has been discarded, and he no longer admits the melancholy of the Irish, and accounts for it by that proximity to the ocean on all sides which they share with so many inhabitants of small islands. He would not now allow they are melancholy. On the contrary, they are well off, and they know it. They have been educated into this happy frame of mind by the genial influence of time and wise legislation. Slowly and surely England has laid the structure of Irish prosperity. Gradually Ireland has been made all that could be wished by forty years of a policy of conciliation. This gentle and most successful process has been rudely interrupted by the present Government, which, scared and panic-stricken by the Fenian rebellion, the character of which it wholly misinterprets, has introduced a revolutionary measure, the precursor of others still more violent and radical, as the only means of saving a country that did not need saving at all. This is the summary of what Mr. DISRAELI ventured to offer as his final judgment on the origin of the Irish Church Bill; and that he should have been bold enough to offer it shows how completely he has realized that a leading speaker in a popular assembly is quite safe in ignoring facts, however recent and however notorious, provided that at the moment he seems to make out something like a good case for his party. It was easy for Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply, to remind his hearers that Lord MAYO had given in the House of Commons a totally different account of the Fenian movement, and had said that its real danger lay in the amount of sympathy it awakened even among those who had no intention of taking any overt part in it. Not a single person of either party could have failed to remember that Mr. DISRAELI's Premiership was ushered in by Lord STANLEY's declaration that the Irish question was the question of the day, and that the first thing Mr. DISRAELI did was to announce that the Cabinet had an Irish policy which Lord MAYO was commissioned to reveal. Mr. DISRAELI did not run the risk, but faced the certainty that his paradox would fade away, like a ghost at cock-crowing, directly Mr. GLADSTONE dwelt on a few facts of indisputable notoriety. But he nevertheless thought the paradox worth starting. It enabled him to throw a vast amount of vague general blame on the Ministry, and to assume an attitude of conscious superiority towards them, while it saved him from all necessity of explaining to his party whether he was really prepared to ask the House of Lords to rally round the Altar and the Throne and the Orange flag.

Mr. DISRAELI always forgets, what Mr. GLADSTONE always remembers, that there is such a thing as the country, and that party speeches and party paradoxes and party triumphs are judged by a vast body of men who are not much affected by the passing struggles of the House of Commons. The speech which Mr. DISRAELI thought wise to make may have been adroit as regards his party, and not ineffective as regards the House of Commons, but the country could not get a single hint from it that was worth having, or find the slightest gleam of statesmanship in it. Mr. GLADSTONE, with all his faults, has the great merit of thinking and speaking in harmony with the Liberal constituencies. His speech was not, perhaps, a very brilliant effort as part of a Parliamentary debate, but it put the Liberal case relating to the Irish Church in a shape which will satisfy and confirm the judgment of the Liberal electors. After sweeping away Mr. DISRAELI's cobwebs, it went on to expose the hollowness of the assumption that the triumphant passage of the Bill through the Commons was not to be taken as the expression of the views of the English people. Mr. DISRAELI, who very seldom makes a constitutional mistake, is far too cautious to hint that a majority so often repeated just after a general election can be put aside as the fruit of a cabal or a clique successfully intriguing for office. But many of his supporters, in and out of the House, are constantly haunted by the idea that there is a great, dim, silent Protestant power in reserve, which is always just going to show itself, and which has shown itself already enough to rob the decision of the House of Commons of all its significance. This idea is not susceptible of being put into any definite shape, or of being tested by the touchstone of common sense. The most ardent of these believers in the gigantic might of concealed Protestantism do not affect to say that Mr. GLADSTONE would not have a large majority if a new election were held now. They can only fall back on an indistinct assertion that the forces of Protestantism are gathering; that there is a cloud on the horizon which will soon overshadow the sky; that something Protestant, of a most surprising kind, is going to come off much sooner than could be easily imagined. Mr. GLADSTONE invited his supporters to agree with him in thinking that they may be very sceptical about this fancied reaction. The voice of the House of Commons is primâ facie the voice of the nation, and not a single Liberal constituency has given the smallest sign whatever of wavering. It was quite right, even if superfluous, for the leader of the Liberal party to confirm his adherents in their confident determination, by making it clear that there are no grounds whatever for the arbitrary hypothesis that England is repenting of the course taken last November. As Mr. GLADSTONE put it, after last Monday night it was not the House of Commons, but the House of Lords, that stands face to face with the nation. Perhaps, too, as Mr. GLADSTONE was addressing the country rather than the House, it was prudent once more to insist upon what ought to have become a platitude with educated men by this time, that there is no such thing as a higher principle which those who earnestly set themselves to do the best they can for the nation can admit that they are violating. There is nothing higher than the highest expediency. If the good government of the British Empire demands the downfall of the Irish Church, there is nothing known to man here below more right or higher or nobler or more just than to promote the best system of conducting human affairs. To repress the impulses of an inopportune sentimentalism is just as much a duty in politics as it is a duty not to give money to a beggar in the streets to gratify a whim, or to purchase the cheapest of tickets to heaven. The Liberal party may be quite wrong in any of its conclusions, and so many wise and good men are Conservatives that Liberals should be always willing to own the possibility of error and to submit their opinions to every conceivable test; but Liberals would be content to eat very humble pie indeed if they ever admitted that there was something high and holy which other people had got hold of, but which was denied to them.

There was one portion of his speech in which Mr. GLADSTONE touched on a part of the history of the Irish Church Bill where what he said was quite true, but where what he said might have been expanded in order to give the whole truth. He said that the people of England had been brought into a frame of mind ready to do ample justice to Ireland, not only by the Fenian movement, but by finding themselves exposed to peril at home by the murderous outbreak at Manchester and the awful atrocity at Clerkenwell. There is much truth in this, but it is not the whole truth, and perhaps the whole truth ought to have been stated on such an occasion as that of the passing of a Bill which is eulogized on one side of the House, and stigmatized on the other, as revolutionary. But as Mr. GLADSTONE put it, an enemy might say that the simple fact is that England has been frightened into passing a revolutionary measure to please Ireland, because Irishmen hit on the successful notion, not of shooting soldiers and policemen in Ireland, but of murdering English policemen in an English town, and blowing up the houses of English artisans in the metropolis itself. Irishmen might very much misconceive language like Mr. GLADSTONE's. There was a great change wrought in English opinion by finding how very intense the feeling of Irishmen at their grievance really was, and nothing could have brought home to Englishmen the intensity of this conviction so much as finding it to be the cause of crime of a most appalling kind in English cities. But, in the first place, the appeal to English fears would have fallen wholly dead if it had not happened that an appeal was at the same time made to the English sense of justice, and if for many years changes of thought had not been going on as to religion and politics generally which had made it possible for England, when it asked itself whether a new policy towards Ireland might not be at once right and expedient, to answer in the affirmative. The Liberal constituencies have been having the seeds of a Liberal view on the Irish Church sown in them for the last twenty years, although they knew nothing of it, nor did those who sowed these seeds realize what effect they were producing. In the next place, the good results of acts of violence are always accidental. Up to a certain point a nation may be profitably frightened, but directly that point is passed, very different feelings come into play, and the wish to do justice fades away before the determination to maintain self-respect, and the resolution to resist extortion. Most Englishmen were bent on doing justice, and perhaps a little more than justice, to America in the matter of the Alabama, but when Mr. SUMNER chose to try how much kicking we would stand, and launched into an utter extravagance of statement and demand, the whole English nation fired up into a wholesome anger. Let the Irish profit by the lesson. The House of Commons, speaking in the name of the nation, has passed the Irish Church Bill, and remotely terror may have contributed to its passing; but any further attempts at intimidation or outrage will produce a totally different result, and the Irish will find themselves confronted by the implacable obstinacy with which Englishmen refuse to change their position when their just pride has been wounded by their sincere efforts and desires to do what is right and just being repaid with attempts to overawe them.

NEW ZEALAND AND THE HOME GOVERNMENT.

LORD GRANVILLE'S despatch to Sir GEORGE BOWEN in answer to the application for a guarantee to a New Zealand loan, though it is pointed, vigorous, and logically conclusive, will not be considered by the colonists as satisfactory. Mr. FITZHERBERT, who represents the New Zealand Government, states that the colony will be compelled to spend 200,000*l.* a year for seven years, for the special purpose of arranging the affairs of the Maori population. As might be expected, the amount is too large to be raised in the form of revenue, and the credit of the colony is not sufficiently high for a loan to be raised at a moderate rate of interest. Mr. FITZHERBERT consequently asks for an Imperial guarantee on a loan of a million and a half, on grounds which have seemed to the Treasury and to Lord GRANVILLE inadequate to justify the demand. Nothing can be more natural than the antagonistic views of the Home Government and of the colonies on all similar questions. It is possible to frame two entirely opposite theories of a history which scarcely extends over thirty years. Mr. FITZHERBERT, expressing probably the opinion which prevails generally in New Zealand, contends that the Imperial Government, notwithstanding the concession to the colony of the entire management of its own affairs, is still bound by the engagements which had been previously contracted with the natives. It appears from Lord GRANVILLE'S letter that Mr. FITZHERBERT had in conversation further contended that the original emigrants had established a moral claim to Imperial aid by anticipating the French who were at the time preparing to settle in the islands. In his official letter Mr. FITZHERBERT confines himself to the argument that the transfer of authority to the colonists was made at a time when the relations between the new-comers and the natives were still unsettled. The colony was consequently never able to obtain a fair start, and certain obligations remain from which, according to the New Zealand agent, "Great Britain sought to free herself." A reference to the undoubted loyalty of the colonists, and to "their belief "that they formed part of a great Empire," may be interpreted as a hint that loyalty has its limits, and that Imperial rights imply a readiness to incur corresponding pecuniary burdens. In public as in private transactions, a proposal that a friend should back a bill is invariably regarded by the applicant as a request for the kind of accommodation which calls for the smallest possible return of gratitude. On the assumption that the collateral security is merely formal, the endorser will suffer no loss; and, if he is ultimately compelled to honour his signature, the demand may be easily attributed to unforeseen circumstances. If Mr. FITZHERBERT'S contention is well founded, the expenses of the Maori war ought to fall, in the first instance, on England; and it seems therefore not unfair to assume that he intends that the guarantee shall, to some extent, result in actual payment. A guarantee of a million passing through the phase of a loan into an absolute gift would be a benefaction of 5*l.* per head to all the English inhabitants of New Zealand; and it seems hardly worth while to maintain the temporary relation of patron and client at so costly a rate. If Mr. FITZHERBERT could have shown that the Mother-country is bound to put down Maori rebellions, he would not have been content with vague insinuations of a liability measured by a mere guarantee. It would have been impossible to prove a claim on the Imperial Treasury, and at the same time to admit that the Colonial Government was primarily responsible.

Lord GRANVILLE, in reply to the application, adopts an entirely different version of past transactions, and of the respective duties of England and of New Zealand. He states with literal truth that the first settlers were mere volunteers, and that the Home Government afterwards interfered for the purpose of providing them with orderly administration and protection; but it appears that Sir WILLIAM HUTT and his friends were only anticipating the decision of the Government when by their vigorous action they prevented France from converting New Zealand into a penal colony. It is not perhaps surprising that adventurers who have extended the limits of the Empire should consider that, although they may have been influenced by motives of private interest, they have performed a national service; but, if it were desirable to re-open the account, it would perhaps be found that the outlay which has since been undertaken by the Home Government has been enough to purchase the islands in fee simple. It is possible and probable that mistakes were committed; but, as Lord GRANVILLE observes, the colony was governed only with a view to the real or supposed advantage of the inhabitants, and no political or pecuniary advantage was acquired or sought by the Mother-country. The Imperial expenditure may, according to Lord GRANVILLE, be considered as the price paid by England for the territory lately appropriated by the colonists; and he adds that, "so far as there is any equitable "claim unsettled, it is not a claim on the part of New Zealand "against Great Britain, but the reverse; a claim, and a very "heavy claim, if we thought proper to urge it, on the part of "the Mother-country against the colony." It was in accordance with the wish of the colonists, which happened to coincide with the modern policy of England, that New Zealand was entrusted with the control of its own affairs. For a considerable time afterwards a large military force was maintained at great expense in the islands for the protection of the settlers, and it necessarily followed that the Imperial Government continued to regulate the relations of the white inhabitants with the Maori tribes. In deference to colonial remonstrances, the local Government was allowed eventually to assume the management of native affairs, and of course the colony thenceforth became liable to the burden of its own defence. From the recent speech of Dr. FEATHERSTONE, Provincial Superintendent at Wellington, it appears that some of the ablest of the colonists have acknowledged their mistake in demanding the withdrawal of the QUEEN'S forces. The local levies which have necessarily been substituted are at the same time more costly and far less efficient. Dr. FEATHERSTONE virtually admits that the colonists have no ground of complaint against a Government which merely complied with their wishes. The only fault of Lord GRANVILLE'S despatch is a tone of not unprovoked harshness, which will perhaps annoy the colonists as sensibly as the peremptory refusal of a guarantee. It is not difficult to understand why dependencies are prone to take offence when their estimate of their comparative rights and duties is not accepted at home. It is not a customary error of Lord GRANVILLE'S to be deficient in the suavity which renders force inoffensive. A few conventional compliments would not have impaired the validity of his decision, and they might have disposed the residents in New Zealand to give a more dispassionate attention to his arguments. As long as English statesmen have not finally resolved on the abandonment of the Colonial Empire, demonstrations of the irresponsibility of the Home Government ought not to be pushed to extremes.

Mr. RICHMOND, a resident of Wellington, has explained with much clearness, in a letter to the Times, the special difficulties which prevent the settlement of the Maori dispute. The resistance of thirty or forty thousand natives to a colonial community of more than five times the number has often been noticed as a discreditable paradox, but prudent politicians habitually see in a practical anomaly a demand for explanation rather than a ground for ridicule. New Zealand is divided, by legislation based on natural circumstances, into a number of self-governed provinces. The majority of the colonists, secure from molestation in the Southern island, are not disposed to afford active assistance to their Northern neighbours; and even in the island which is exposed to native disturbances the various districts are geographically isolated by hills and forests. The local Superintendents, with their Councils, frequently thwart the action of the Colonial Government; and "the safe settlements are not all of them unwilling to adopt the "Imperial attitude, and to protest in the interest of local self-"government against interference with those who get themselves into difficulties." It also happens that, in pursuit of profit or convenience, settlers, instead of remaining within reach of friendly neighbours, have penetrated into districts where they are largely outnumbered by the natives. The Hauhau fanaticism, which Mr. RICHMOND rationalizes into a passion for retaining independence, sometimes extends into regions where the Maoris are intermixed with English inhabitants. The colonists are far too fully occupied to share the taste for warlike pursuits which is shared by the Maoris with all uncivilized races. "Our industrious settlers sicken of militia service, and "are often seen in disturbed districts to risk their lives madly "in their old pursuits, rather than remain shut up in posts." Mr. RICHMOND, whose knowledge and ability deserve attention, defends himself and his fellow-colonists with doubtful success from the charge of undue sensitiveness to English comments on the affairs of New Zealand; but there is some justice in the complaint that the abdication of liability is not accompanied by the discontinuance of criticism. A suggestion that New Zealand should be allowed to raise a Volunteer Corps from the English army seems entitled to consideration, if the simpler plan of paying the expense of a garrison not adopted in preference. If the volunteers were allowed to retain their military rank, and to return at the end of their term of colonial service, no burden would be thrown on the Treasury. The objections to the further proposal of guarantee for colonial loans have been forcibly stated by Lord GRANVILLE. Any inquiry which proved that such a security might be granted without risk would show at the same time that it was superfluous.

The policy of allowing the colonies to govern themselves, although it has thus far succeeded, is still an experiment. The process of concession can seldom be retraced, although New Zealand would probably be willing to purchase renewed protection even by a sacrifice of modern constitutional privileges yet it is uncertain whether the fabric of Empire will be long held together when all the ties by which it was formerly united have been relaxed or severed. The ancient system was happily relinquished in time, before outlying dependencies in all parts of the world had rebelled against the impracticable supremacy of the Colonial Office. When an intelligent colonist calls on English statesmen to say "what is to be the sequel, or for what "our race, scattered over the globe, are to strive as their "common future," it is impossible to give a definite answer. The future will solve the problem for itself, probably by converting autonomy into independence; but it is not expedient to accelerate the separation which may perhaps be inevitable. It would be a grave misfortune if American rancour against England were to extend to Canada, to Australia, and to New Zealand. Common ancestry and common language have during eighty years only inflamed the traditional animosity of a community which, until lately, had no history except of contest with England. There is no danger of future Wars of Independence, and it is possible that the nominal connexion which amounts to a perpetual alliance may be prolonged for a considerable time. The smooth words which may facilitate the attainment of such a result ought not to be grudged.

THE PATENT LAW.

IF the interesting debate on Mr. MACFIE's motion proved, what scarcely needed proving, that our existing Patent Law is extremely unsatisfactory in its working, it equally proved that the arguments against having any Patent Law at all are not less unsatisfactory. If it were practicable to discriminate between true and sham discoverers, and to ascertain with accuracy to whom the merit of every new invention really belonged, and if it were at the same time easy to secure to the man who increased the common stock of useful knowledge the fruit of his own brain, no one would dream of questioning the moral claim of an inventor to this peculiar kind of property, any more than we now question the justice of giving to an author a copyright in his own work. But when it is found or supposed to be extremely difficult to do justice to one man without causing much inconvenience and some occasional injustice to a thousand others, there is a strong temptation to sacrifice individual rights to public expediency. The advocates of a total repeal of the Patent Laws generally insist (as Sir ROUNDELL PALMER did in his ingenious speech), not only that they do a great deal of indirect mischief, but that the discoverer of the most valuable invention has no claim to any reward except the consciousness of having enabled a number of other men to make colossal fortunes. That such arguments should be used at all proves little more than an uneasy consciousness that the proposed repeal would work a certain amount of real injustice. Men who are strongly impressed with the expediency of ignoring the claims of inventors struggle to escape the reproach of injustice by stoutly denying the rights which they desire to disregard. We would rather see the subject discussed with more courage and frankness. There are undoubtedly instances in which private claims must yield to public expediency, and any persons who think the case of inventors to be one to which this rule is applicable would do better to say so openly than to try to persuade themselves and others that those who have created the means of making wealth have no claim to share in the fruits of their discovery. Sir ROUNDELL PALMER affected to dispose of the whole difficulty by saying that there were essential differences between copyright and invention; but a principle is not the less sound because you may illustrate it by a case which is not on all-fours with that to which you apply it. And the distinctions between copyright and invention are by no means so radical as is sometimes assumed. The Copyright Laws give an author a special monopoly because it is conceived that the production of a new work entitles him to a return proportioned to its merit, as tested by the demand for it in the market. The Patent Laws give an analogous monopoly to an inventor on precisely the same moral grounds. To say, as Sir ROUNDELL did, that a book was a new creation, whereas an invention was merely the application of the facts and the laws of nature which are common property, was to speak like a lawyer rather than like a philosopher or a man of science. Whatever other distinctions may be insisted on between copyright and invention, this, at any rate, will not bear a moment's examination. It may have a colour of plausibility in the case of a poem, a play, or a novel, though even there it is not altogether sound. But literature includes history, science, philosophy, mathematics, and the like; and every book on these and most other subjects, so far as it has any value, is based entirely upon facts and laws which are no more the creation of the author than are the facts and laws on which an invention may be founded. In each case there is creation in the same qualified sense. Say that a man creates what he reveals, or what he proves, and the author and the inventor are equally entitled to be called creators. Say, on the other hand, with perhaps more accuracy, that to proclaim a previously unnoticed truth is only to announce what has all along existed in nature and nature's laws, and some more modest title than creator must be assumed by author and inventor alike. The difference between the two cases is not a difference of principle, but of convenience. The thing created, either in the book or the machine, is the thought or the method; but property in a thought or a method is not what the law allows in either case, simply because it would be impossible to give effect to such an enactment. What the law does is to lay hold of the most profitable mode of using the idea, and say that for a limited time no one but the originator shall be at liberty, in the one case, to print the book or a colourable imitation of it; or, in the other, to manufacture or use the machine, or any colourable imitation of that. It is impossible, we think, to deny the abstract right of a real author or inventor, and more palpably impossible to deny it in the one case while you admit it in the other.

Apart from his abstract reasoning, there is much in Sir ROUNDELL PALMER's argument to show wide differences in practice between the cases of authors and inventors. It is undoubtedly true that in a vast majority of instances the patentee of an invention is not the person to whom the largest share of the merit belongs. The rule, equally in scientific discovery and in practical invention, has almost always been found to be that, when a great step in advance is completed, no one man can claim the entire merit. If one wins the race, there are mostly several competitors who get a place. Even NEWTON had rivals treading on his heels, and his great discoveries would not have been lost, though they would certainly have been delayed, if his marvellous intellect had never been directed to science. The thought of the world, as represented by a little cluster of inquiring minds, was fast ripening for the harvest which NEWTON was the first to reap. But no one on this account seeks to deprive NEWTON of his glory. And we do not see why the pioneers of practical invention should be deprived of the reward for which they work merely because what they have done is but to forestal what would have been accomplished, sooner or later, without them. The real vice of the Patent Laws is that they give a full fourteen years' monopoly to the first inventor who proclaims himself, even though it may be clear that he has not a week's start of a host of competitors. In order to make sure of adequately rewarding a very few real benefactors of mankind, you give an inordinate privilege to a great many who have done nothing at all in proportion to what they receive; and not only do you prohibit every one from borrowing the patentee's ideas, but you actually forbid a second inventor, who has arrived at the same result without ever having heard of the first, to make any use for fourteen years of the conclusions which he has worked out by his own unassisted thought and labour. This, of course, is a gross injustice, and the opponents of the Patent Laws say that no machinery can be devised by which it can be escaped. Another serious objection to the system, as worked in this country, is the indiscriminate grant of a patent to any one who claims it, leaving it to future litigation to determine whether the patent is good or bad. The law officers of the Crown receive an enormous amount of fees for patent business, and it is their function to determine in the first instance whether a primâ facie title to the privilege is made out. It might be supposed that, if the identical invention has been patented or publicly used before, or if, on the face of it, it is no invention at all, the application would be refused. Nothing of the sort happens. No examination of the records at the Patent Office takes place to ascertain the existence or non-existence of earlier patents for the alleged discovery; and even when there is an opposition, and it is clearly proved (as in the case of the bullet which Mr. METFORD devised and Mr. WHITWORTH afterwards patented) that there is nothing new in the invention, the patent is allowed to go, in order that the claimant may have the privilege of a jury to try an imaginary right. This is the way in which the crop of litigation is raised which is so often pointed to as a reproach to the law. The present ATTORNEY-GENERAL, it seems, has introduced the innovation of rejecting the claims of patentees where the alleged inventions are palpably frivolous, but something much more decided than this is needed to make the preliminary investigation of any real value. The vast number of worthless and catching patents taken out merely as traps for manufacturers is perhaps the greatest nuisance incidental to the system, but it is by no means the most difficult to suppress.

All these evils must be cured, or sensibly abated, if the Patent Laws are to survive; and if this is to be done at all, it can only be by an effective preliminary inquiry. That there are difficulties to be encountered in such a scheme cannot be denied, but it is not yet shown to be so complete an impossibility as Sir ROUNDELL PALMER assumed it to be. With the best machinery a few patents would slip through which, on closer investigation, would be held to be bad; but even the clumsiest methods of bonâ fide inquiry would have sufficed to weed out some 90 per cent. at least of the existing patents. A mere search by proper officials at the Patent Office, with the aid of the excellent indexes which they possess, would settle the fate of the great majority of applications, and the opposition of rival inventors or manufacturers would expose a great many more if it were not understood, as it is now, that any opposition before the law officers is a mere waste of time. Under the existing system we have a tribunal which is not, as a rule, competent for the work, and which makes no real effort to do it. The law officers give up the investigation in despair; but it by no means follows that a scientific tribunal, with all the aids which the Patent Office could supply, might not be found extremely useful. The experiment, at any rate, has not been tried; and it is scarcely fair to inventors to deprive them of all protection merely because a perfunctory inquiry by an unscientific and busy lawyer may have failed to exclude from the list of patentees a formidable body of mere impostors.

We take it to be quite clear that the attempt to do justice ought not to be given up until the impossibility of putting the law on a satisfactory footing is clearly made out. Mr. MUNDELLA is probably as ingenious as most manufacturers, but he says that all the inventions in which he is interested came out of the brains of his workmen, and that they are sharing with him and the public the benefit of their discoveries. Apart from the serious inconveniences caused by the law as it is now administered, no one could desire to confiscate the ingenuity of artisans for the benefit of master manufacturers. As matters stand now, a poor patentee is generally helpless to turn his invention into money without the assistance of a capitalist; but to allow a master, because he is rich enough to use an invention, to pick the brains of a clever artisan without making him any acknowledgment, would be to aggravate the plutocratic tendencies of the age, which most serious thinkers would gladly mitigate as far as possible. The product of invention and thought is a very difficult kind of property to protect, but it is not on that account the less deserving of protection, if any means can be devised for granting it without too grave an interference with the commercial freedom which public expediency demands. The subject requires a more searching investigation than it has yet received. Lord STANLEY's Commission scarcely touched the root of the matter, and no attempt has even been made to test the feasibility of such suggestions as the Report contained. It is for those who attack the law to make out a conclusive case, not merely against the particular system in force, but against every possible scheme for securing to inventors the benefit of their own work. And this has certainly not yet been done.

MR. BRIGHT AND THE RAILWAY INTEREST.

EVERYBODY knows that in the process of canonization, as practised in the Latin Church, there is an official popularly, and not reverently, termed the Devil's Advocate. It is his business to scratch holes in the postulant saint's character. His function is the reverse of that of apostolic charity, which thinketh no evil. It is his business to think every evil. Of course the institution of this singular personage is only complementary to that of the suitors on the saint's behalf. Theirs it is to magnify his virtues and to exaggerate his holiness. There is nothing, theoretically, unfair in this; and the principle of it works among ourselves. There are those whose position and place in the economy of things is to beatify railway management. With them all Boards of Directors are inchoate, if not actual, saints; and they not unnaturally stigmatize anybody who wags a tongue against the perfection and sanctity of railway management as mere Devil's Advocates—hirelings whose venal business it is to disparage and vilify. There is no great harm in all this. All public institutions benefit by this collision of criticism. But there is great harm if a great public personage, and the head of an important State Department whose place is to adjudicate on vexed and disputed points, happens himself to hold a brief for the party alone concerned in the suit of merits and demerits, and if, in consequence of his partisanship, he considers his own officials and subordinates the natural and prejudiced enemies of the cause which he, very conscientiously perhaps, espouses. This is Mr. BRIGHT's case. He is a consistent, firm, and devoted champion of railway management as it is. He has more than once exhibited his bias. It is perfectly astonishing to Mr. BRIGHT that there are so few railway accidents. It is a popular delusion to believe in railway accidents. When it was suggested or clamoured that some improvements should be introduced into railway management, such as the establishing a connexion between the passengers and the guard, Mr. BRIGHT pooh-poohed the whole matter. Railways did very well. They were better when not interfered with. So was all trade. It was perfectly ridiculous to be so over-nice and scrupulous about adulteration, and false weights and measures, because, if a retail tradesman were to be subject to this sort of interference, his life and his business would not be worth a day's purchase in an obstinate and unenlightened country where the law perversely required him to be true and just in all his dealings. This is the right spirit with which a mere partisan and advocate might approach the whole matter of railway management. But then the question arises whether this spirit is exactly convenient, and conduces to the public good, when it is exhibited by the President of the Board of Trade. Mr. BRIGHT has a right to his peculiar view of railway arrangements, but one especial function of the Board of Trade is to stand between the railways and the public. Mr. BRIGHT stands by the railways, and against the public; a position which has just led to an ugly complication. Attached to the Board of Trade are certain official persons, men of very high scientific attainments, and great practical knowledge and experience. The duties entrusted to them by Parliament are, summarily speaking, to keep railways in check. They are all of them Colonels of Engineers—men not only of high rank, but of high character. They and the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE belong to and represent one and the same State Department. They ought to represent the same duties—duties seriously and advisedly conferred on them by Parliament. As a matter of fact, Mr. BRIGHT, President of the Board of Trade, represents the Railway Interest, and nothing else, and considers his inspectors, the Colonels of Engineers, as so many advocates merely employed against the Railway Interest, and has treated at least one of them accordingly.

Everybody remembers the too famous Abergele calamity. It only killed thirty-one passengers and two railway servants. Colonel RICH was "appointed to inquire into the circumstances "connected with this accident." He inquired, and reported, and we, and probably every newspaper in the kingdom, called attention to his Report. This Report was sent to the Directors of the North-Western Company, for their "early and "careful consideration," and they were required, "as soon as "possible, to forward to the Board of Trade"—Mr. BRIGHT's office—"any observations which they might have to offer on "the subject." Whether such careful consideration and such observations have been made by the North-Western Directors, we are not aware. Their observations or defence have not at any rate been made public. No reply of any Railway Board to any Report of the Board of Trade Inspectors ever has been made public. As far as the public knows, the Directors always let judgment go by default, and show that they know that their best policy is to hold their tongues. But this Report of Colonel RICH has been made the subject of a question in the House of Commons. Sir H. SELWIN-IBBETSON asked Mr. BRIGHT whether his attention had been drawn to Colonel RICH's very remarkable Report, whether he had called upon the North-Western Company to explain, and, if not, whether it was his intention to do so. Certainly Sir H. SELWIN-IBBETSON had an ample and peculiar justification for his inquiry. His questions were only those which everybody else has been constrained to put; but he was the very man to urge them.

Haud ignarus mali. He has been present at many railway accidents, including this fearful Abergele accident. He would not attempt to dispel Mr. BRIGHT's happy security with respect to railway directors and railway accidents; but still he must say that somehow or other there were people who looked at railway accidents with a certain feeling of dread. And then he called attention to the particulars of Colonel RICH's Report one statement of which charged the Company with "a gross "fraud practised on the public."

Mr. BRIGHT replies that he regretted Colonel RICH's Report; especially did he regret Colonel RICH's observation that "he feared it was only too true that the rules printed and "issued by Railway Companies to their servants, and which "are generally very good, are made principally with the "object of being produced when accidents happen from the "breach of them, and that the Companies systematically allow "many of them to be broken daily, without taking the "slightest notice of the disobedience." This was serious certainly, and Mr. BRIGHT pronounced this to be an "imputation "which ought not to have been made, but which would "probably not have been made by Colonel RICH but for the "great excitement produced by the accident." As to Sir H. SELWIN-IBBETSON's other question, whether Mr. BRIGHT had called upon the Company to explain the charges made in the Inspector's Report, or whether he meant to do so, Mr. BRIGHT treated the matter with superb contempt, and vouchsafed no reply at all. His whole answer consisted in throwing a most serious imputation on Colonel RICH, and one which, if it be true, shows that that valuable public servant is unfit for his office. But what are the facts? Colonel RICH not only made the charge, but specified the proof of it. He showed that, as regards this very accident, there were admirable rules, but they were never enforced. For example, there is a regulation in print on this line—namely, "shunting within ten minutes of "the arrival of a passenger train"—but "the breach of this very "regulation led to this sad accident." There were also other rules regulating the business of the signalman, breaksman, and stationmaster, which, if they had been carried out, would have averted the Abergele accident; but they were not carried out; hence the accident. But do "the Companies systematically "allow their rules to be broken daily"? This is what Colonel RICH complains of, and he enforces his complaint by pointing to the system of feeing guards and porters, which is always winked at, and to the fact that the North-Western Company have no travelling or stationary inspector to look after the guards and overlook them in their duties, and see that they perform them. So that Colonel RICH not only casts an imputation on the Companies, but gives his proofs of the necessity of casting it. Mr. BRIGHT does not pretend to say that the North-Western Company have refuted, or even considered, Colonel RICH's charges; still less does he say that the Directors have met them with any indignation, or have succeeded in disproving them. Not a single counter fact does Mr. BRIGHT produce. He only regrets that the charge was made against his valued clients, the Companies, and suggests that Colonel RICH made it under excitement. Excitement; yes! All England was certainly excited; but Colonel RICH was calm, collected, and judicial; his language does not bear a trace of being excited or prejudiced; his Report is long and elaborate, and goes through the usual rigmarole of the doings of this breaksman and that signalman according to the card. If anything, it is rather tedious than excited. And as to the North-Western Company, he says that it is one of the best in the country, and that its general management is equal to that of any other line. But, in reviewing the details of this particular accident, Colonel RICH discovered a vast and general system of railway fraud of a very definite and grave description; and, as it was his duty to do, he exposed it, and called upon the authorities to reform it. And this is how he is met by Mr. BRIGHT. He is snubbed; he is told that he is partial, prejudiced, passionate, unjust, and goes out of his way to discuss points with which he had no business to concern himself. His influence and authority are compromised, and his judgment not only questioned, but severely condemned. And all this without a shadow of proof or argument advanced by Mr. BRIGHT impugning Colonel RICH's discretion or truth. We are by no means prepared to say that the Head of a great Department of State is bound always to uphold his subordinates. But, when he censures them, he is at least called upon to assign some reasons for that censure. And we are bound to add that, as regards the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, the present President has on more occasions than one, but in this Abergele matter especially, shown that he considers public feeling and public safety of less consequence than the private interests of the Railway Companies.

THE ETHICAL STANDARD OF CHARACTER.

IN a brief introduction to a second edition of her volume of Biographical Sketches, Miss Martineau has interpreted the favour which her work has won as signifying a growing willingness on the part of the public to refer the final judgment of the characters of eminent personages to an ethical standard. How far this may be a just explanation of a particular circumstance we need not here discuss, but such a remark opens up a vein of highly interesting reflection as to the conditions which mark and guide the ordinary estimates of the worth and respectableness of conspicuous people, who have, in one way or another, given the world some reasons for thinking well or ill of them in a more or less emphatic manner. It may be admitted, to start with, that everybody who is not exceptionally cultivated or else exceptionally latitudinarian by temperament, if wont to take the trouble to judge character at all, usually judges it by a single standard—by reference to a single principle or point of view. Perhaps the persons who are most lavish of such declarations of judgment are those whose standard is the consistent adherence to a given religious creed. The number of virtues which are assumed to flow from a declared assent to a certain set of propositions in theology would be amazing and incredible if one did not reflect upon the inevitable inclination which exists in human nature to identify rightmindedness upon the most precious subject with rightmindedness all round. Even if the vices of a man who happens to be rigidly orthodox are unfortunately too conspicuous to be denied or blinked, still it will generally be found that confessors of the same faith and the same branch of the faith hold the same vices of such a man to be venial which in anybody of a different description they would unhesitatingly pronounce to be mortal in the eyes of heaven, as well as unforgivable by men. With another set of people, again, or with the same people, the one test, to satisfy which is to get credit for all other things that command admiration, is soundness upon some social question. For instance, one of the most thoughtful and outspoken of American journalists has just been complaining of the evil effect upon public judgment which is being exerted by the old habit of measuring every man and woman in the United States by the degree of his soundness on the question of slavery. When this was the main question of the time, a large number of excellent folk thought of hardly anything else about anybody, except his or her attitude in this tremendous controversy. Slips of private morals, defects of temper, language, dignity, veracity, were all as dust in the balance when there was unflinching intensity of opinion on the desirableness of upholding or removing the "peculiar institution." The same rule of moral judgment is said to prevail still, when the excuse which there may once have been for it can no longer be anything but retrospective; so that men who do uncommonly questionable things, or even things that are unquestionably dirty, dishonourable, or criminal, go scot-free in the opinion and esteem of a large class of the community, just because in the old days they were staunch on the right side. Policy may perhaps in critical times prescribe a wide charity towards all who are of your own way of thinking, but this is clearly not a trustworthy substitute for sound and candid judgment as a general rule. Apart from the theological standard and the political standard, perhaps swiftly engendered prejudice, for or against, is the most universal principle of what is counted a judgment of character. People rashly trust to that erratic marsh-light or will-o'-the-wisp which they call their instinct. They cherish a truly imbecile faith in first impressions of sympathy or antipathy, and in extreme cases do not hesitate both to hold and declare opinions about this person or that which they formed on the strength of a glance, a tone of the voice, an overheard phrase, a line of the face, or something else equally unfit to support so wide and weighty a superstructure. It is a great comfort to think that this rough-and-ready fashion of judging character is reduced by the natural operation of things to a tolerably harmless condition. What comes lightly is said to go lightly; and we may say of these over-rash estimates, that they fall pretty softly upon everybody affected by them, either object or listener, and a certain indifference to floating reputation is thus far promoted.

Everybody who has thought about human life to any purpose perceives that a man's character is simply the most important thing about him, both to himself and to all who are round him. To him, as to them, the main question turns on what he is, rather than on what he has done or has failed to do. Then it may be asked what type, model, or ideal that is to which the most widely social and acceptable kind of man conforms; by being of what sort is a man's character the best, in the largest human sense? Miss Martineau's remark which we began by quoting perhaps points too exclusively to what is, after all, only a single element or side of this type, whatever we may decide it to be; and it is just because some of the most excellent and praiseworthy people in the world share the same exclusiveness, that it is worth while to remind them that character has other than its moral aspects. As character possesses other than its moral aspects, so a too close attention to these aspects either in any age or any person or set of persons, to the exclusion of the others which have fully as much right to be taken into account, is more likely than almost anything else to stunt the nature and dwarf the capacity of the critic, and of everybody who comes within reach of his influence. It is certain that no character can be satisfactory, still less can have any claim to be held an admirable type, which is not morally sound and healthy. Considering that morality denotes the difference between right and wrong in action, it is tolerably clear that nothing can be more important than conformity to the requirements of this particular standard in the particular side of character proper to it. The first thing that we ought to want to know about anybody is, how deeply imprinted these moral distinctions of right and wrong are in his nature, and with what constancy we may reckon upon seeing them recognised in his conduct. The reason for the pre-eminence conferred on this special quality, in taking stock of people, is obvious enough. To have a keenish impression of the fact of the difference between right and wrong, and to pursue the motives and habits that conduce to right action and sentiment, are just the things which distinctively mark off a civilized member of society from tigers, foxes, and other creatures of rapine. It is precisely because conscience, duty, and the like have taken an established place among the stock of human conceptions that society is possible; and when we consider the good gifts which a state of society brings to us all, even to those who seem to profit least by it, there can be no difficulty in understanding the value that current language, expressing current feeling, sets upon the notions and practices which keep so valuable a fabric in good order and repair. In judging all men, and particularly men of such eminence as those with whom Miss Martineau has dealt, the morality of their general influence, alike through personal example and work actually done and left behind them and apart from them, is all important to a favourable or tolerant opinion. If, when the balance comes to be struck, it should not appear that their conduct has sprung from conscious and steady preference of what is morally right over what is morally wrong—nay, more than this, a preference, not only of right, but of the highest kind of right which the man's intelligence, fairly exerted, could be expected to receive and appreciate—then the verdict must unquestionably be condemnatory on the main issue. Its morality is emphatically the salt of character.

But then it is well worth remembering that character is not all salt. The identification of character simply and wholly with morality is as narrow as its identification with this or the other form of orthodoxy. It is a distinctive defect of earnest people, and we are perhaps now drawing terribly near to the reign of the Earnest, that they are nearly always indifferent to the many questions which wider minds ask about men, besides their moral conduct. They do not care to ask of anybody whether he is genial and sympathetic; whether he has a love of intellectual culture; whether he has fineness and delicacy of nature. They would not think the worse of a man who should have these excellent qualities, principally for the reason that they would be unconscious of their existence. But, in describing the character of such a one, it would never occur to them that these were matters worth setting down and taking into full account. The fact is that he who has nothing but his correct morality to recommend him is, of all men, least worthy of that general eulogy which is so frequently bestowed on such characters. And it is a mere pretence of taking a likeness to dwell on this feature and no other; such a likeness is no more a portrait than one of those snipped bits of black paper which may give an outline of the profile, but which leave out complexion, expression, mobility, and most of the other things which go to the total impression of the living countenance. The man is more than his profile, and, in character, he is more than a simple thermometer of moral rectitude. He has much more than the single quality of rising and falling in a particular groove. The ethical standard, used alone, leaves untested a score of fine qualities which, more strikingly than his rightness or wrongness, make a man what he is. Either in biography, therefore, or in that miniature form of biography which consists in criticizing or describing our private friends, it is the very thinnest of blunders to think only of the outlines, and leave out all the minor shades which in truth are precisely what impart their genuine significance to the outlines. To describe the form, colour, history, of a flower is to give no idea of the fragrance, which is possibly its chief charm and interest. And so in character, the most attractive or impressive of its influences may be, and not unfrequently is, something of which an exclusive attention to its moral side would have left us no sort of notion.

This consideration explains the profound delight which young men feel in such writings as Mr. Carlyle's essays on Johnson and Burns. Mr. Carlyle has sinned terribly in depressing the moral view of conduct and character, but this is an error which his readers will be pretty sure to correct for themselves, as life and its conditions become clearer in their eyes. And, after all, anybody can enforce the moral view, while it needs both a certain faculty of poetic vision, and a very wide range of human sympathy such as we do not secure in combination once in a generation, to reproduce a character and to judge it, or maybe deliberately to abstain from judging it, in all its diversified completeness. Hence the charm and the greatness of Shakspeare. He is never directly moral, yet his power of attraction is infinite, because he takes character all round, high and low, austere and jocund, in every shade, and with fulness of every quality. Above all things, he is not careful to refer character to any standard at all, but only to present it as it is; and this is why the poet has so much greater power over mankind than the professed moralist, though the one aims directly and urgently after the improvement of his fellows, and the other, when at his best, works without any such aim.

THE BLACK PARLIAMENT.

WHILE the members of both Houses of Parliament have been amusing themselves during the Whitsuntide vacation and the Epsom week, Scotland has been in the enjoyment of its annual Parliament of Parsons. The General Assemblies of the Kirk have been in full swing, and the metropolis of the North has suffered in consequence. Edinburgh presents a quaint appearance during this annual clerical visitation. The quiet grass-grown streets of the town swarm with clergy of all Presbyterian denominations. Country ministers, attended or followed by their wives, and their plump, healthy-looking daughters, oddly dressed, and fresh from the dairy of the country manse, meet you at every corner. The old Palace of Holyrood is furbished up for the occasion. The portraits of the early Kings of Scotland, taken from life many centuries before portrait-painting had penetrated so far north, are cleaned up in the picture-gallery, and look down upon the pious frolics of the Scottish Kirk. A carpet is thrown over the traditional spot where—so the cicerone tells you—Rizzio's blood still stains the floor of Queen Mary's boudoir, and a Royal Commissioner, as representing Majesty, holds Court and banqueting in the palace at an expense of some 2,000*l.* a year to the Exchequer. The General Assemblies are in full swing, and for ten long days and nights the Scottish clergy hold high carnival in the capital—a season of solemn feasting for them, but of much discomfort to the rest of the community. For not only are the streets of the city given up bodily to them, and the clubs and hotels taken by storm; not only are the ordinary arrangements of society altered for their convenience, and the day made melancholy and the night hideous by their continual presence; but even in the privacy of a man's own room there is no escape from them. You retire after breakfast with the newspapers, but the newspapers—what are they? Double copies of them all are published at this crisis, and they contain nothing—hardly even advertisements—nothing but the speeches made during the previous day and night by the ministers at the two General Assemblies. "It is," as Mr. Jefferson Brick says, "by such enlightened means that the bubbling passions of that great country find a vent." Day after day, night after night, the General Assemblies of the Church of Scotland and of the Free Church carry on their grave deliberations. The tone and temper of the Covenanting times still linger in these venerable halls. The spirits of Gabriel Kettledrummle and of Ephraim Macbriar hover over the congregations and animate their controversies. Time-serving Peter Proudtext is there, willing as of old to reap where he has not sowed, to follow the Gospel for the loaves and fishes, and to make the best of this world and the next. Habakkuk Mucklewraith, too—"his brain a wee bit ajee, but a braw preacher for a' that"—still burns with a holy zeal to uplift his voice against "Popery, Prelacy, Antinomianism, Erastianism, Lapsarianism, Sub-Lapsarianism, and all the sins and snares of the times." And even the fierce enthusiasm of Mause Headrigg in a subdued form may be seen in the galleries, where the lambs of the sheepfold, with their knitting or their needlework on their knees, listen for many hours every day and every night to the truth as expounded by their pastors. But the truth is abstract, and becomes monotonous unless relieved by the piquancy of something personal. And this too is provided, though the lambs may have to withdraw. A clerical scandal from the outer Hebrides, or a case of alleged intemperance from the far North, is sure to turn up, and then the House is crowded, and there is a glorious contest. Counsel are employed, the wigs and gowns of the Bar mingle incongruously with the sober garments of the Kirk, and the subtle pleadings of the Forum take the place for a time of the fervid declamation of the pulpit. "Overtures" on Church patronage, questions as to "Quoad sacra parishes," reports upon augmentations of livings, and other matters affecting the interest or incomes of the clergy, rank second in importance to the special cases affecting the character of individual delinquents. These questions draw full houses, and they are discussed with zest. On the question of Church patronage, for instance, the Established Church Assembly carried on a debate for twelve long hours upon the Derby Day, and twenty-one reverend and honourable members lifted up their testimonies upon the subject. Some general questions come up for discussion in the course of business, but they are not so popular, and, as a rule, only one side is heard upon them. The reverend orators may represent anything in any light they please, and it seldom happens that any one will find it in his heart to controvert them. And if any erring brother should be contumacious, and think for himself and speak out his thoughts, his remarks are apt to be deemed irrelevant, and to be listened to in silence. Ecclesiastical Assemblies are often like packed meetings where none are admitted without tickets, and only friends of the cause are invited to attend. The clerical mind in the North will not look at general questions from more than one point of view. You cannot persuade a Scotch parson to form a judicial opinion upon any question. The training of his mental faculties, though it may be controversial, is never judicial. Speak to him on questions of practical philosophy or politics, and the chances are that he will answer you exclusively from the clerical point of view. He will not consider how such questions affect the people, but only how they affect the cloth. If he thinks that the Kirk will suffer ever so little by any measure which may be beneficial to the public, nothing will induce him to look on it with favour. Hence it comes that the deliberations of the Scottish Assemblies on questions of general importance are uninteresting both to the members of Assembly and to the public. The former care little about them, and the Scottish laity agree with Clarendon that "clergymen understand the least, and take the worst measure of human affairs, of all mankind who can read and write."

It is a curious relic of the past this black Parliament of Parsons. The time was when it was omnipotent in Scotland. Now, except on matters purely ecclesiastical, it is powerless. There is still a sort of tawdry pomp about the formalities by which the Royal Commissioner opens the Assembly; and he drives about the streets of the town in a faded coach-and-four, while the Moderator, who represents the Speaker of the House, still wears knee-breeches and a cocked hat. But when that is told there is little else to tell. On politics the General Assemblies no longer exercise any influence. The Assembly of the Established Church discussed the Irish Church Bill. A leading lay member proposed a resolution that the Assembly should petition both Houses of Parliament against the Bill. He was supported by another, who announced that "they had nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the Irish Establishment, but as members of a Christian Church they were bound to lift up their voices against the measure." And in the face of a plain-spoken statement by one Liberal member that they were an assembly of monomaniacs, they carried the resolution by a majority of 99 in a house of 173. The people of Scotland have declared at the general elections in favour of the Irish Church Bill in the ratio of ten to one, and now the Established Church of Scotland in their General Assembly has declared against it in the ratio of nearly four to one. It is, therefore, not difficult to calculate the exact relation that exists between the opinions of the Established Church and those of the Scottish nation, and to estimate the amount of political influence that such a body ought to exercise. It was the same with education, a subject long treated as a shuttlecock specially invented for clerical disputation. Both Assemblies discussed it. The Free Church carried resolutions in favour of National as opposed to Denominational Education without one dissentient voice, showing that in this matter at least it is in harmony with the popular feeling in the country. The Established Church negatived a similar resolution by an overwhelming majority. This was to be expected. The Established Church, as we have indicated, is about as much in sympathy with the people of Scotland as with the people of Peru. It is only fair to add that, however much that body dislikes the Education Bill before Parliament, the Establishment now sees that the measure is inevitable. There were some hints about the necessity of a clause providing for the teaching of the Bible and the Shorter Catechism, but a resolution to petition against the Bill even in its present mutilated form could not find a seconder. They stand therefore committed to Denominational Education and nothing else, but, as their view is diametrically opposed to that of the more popular Assembly, they neutralize each other.

If on politics their influence is small, on social matters it is even smaller. Individual ministers from remote parishes, given to intemperance or other kinds of evil living, may be subjected to the pains and penalties of ecclesiastical law, and suffer accordingly every year. And to that extent the General Assemblies leave their impress on society, whether for good or evil. But nowadays the relation of the ordinary Scotch minister, whether of the Established or of the Free Church, to the every-day society of Scotland is very different from what it used to be. In the old days the Scottish minister fulfilled the modest requirements once necessary for election to the much-prized fellowships of a well-known College. Well born, well dressed, and tolerably educated, he was on terms of equality with the lairds and their friends, and was a welcome guest in the country and town houses of all classes of society. But of late two agencies have been at work to cause a change in this respect. Since the Disruption of the Kirk in 1843, a somewhat different class of men have entered on the ministry. Though some of the old stock still devote themselves to the Church of their fathers, the majority of the parish ministers belong to a different circle. Men of the humblest parentage have gone to the Universities, and from them passed out into the Church. Some of these have done well in their profession, and have been useful parish ministers. But many of them settle down in the safe anchorage of a country manse, and never care to improve in mind or body. All the growth that was in them died out when they reached the haven of their content. They reached the summit of their ambition, and, like Dominie Sampson, lived "to wag their heads in a pulpit." Unaccustomed to the ways of society in youth, they dislike them in middle age, and prefer the secluded atmosphere of the manse, and the tender solicitude of their "most household and parturient wives"—to use an expression of Sydney Smith's—to the more worldly attractions offered to them by the great ones in the land. The other agency is the influence of the Episcopal Church. "It may be Apostolical succession," said a leading Scotch Episcopal divine, "that fills our churches, but I fear it is fashion." He was not far wrong. The Episcopal churches are the fashionable churches throughout Scotland, and Episcopacy is the fashionable form of belief. The majority of landowners are Episcopalians, and though they are bound to support Presbyterianism by Act of Parliament, they do not support it by their presence. They pay for the church they do not attend, and do not pay for that which they do attend. The Established Church fattens on the "teinds" sucked out of the land, and the Episcopal Church starves upon the extremely mean subscriptions which the landowners give to it. And not only is Episcopacy the profession of the landowners, but the bulk of leading professional men and more wealthy merchants adopt the same denomination. Many of them have been educated in England, and there got accustomed to the Church service, and prefer it to that which was good enough for their fathers. And if the men have not shown this tendency, their wives and daughters have done it for them. And it comes to the same thing in the end. From these two circumstances the hold of the Scottish Church on what is called society is small. The heart of the country is still strongly Presbyterian, but society is not. And thus it comes to pass that the General Assemblies exercise no more influence upon social than they do upon political matters.

If this be so, a question forces itself upon the mind, and demands an answer. What is the use of these Assemblies? Can they show cause for their existence? They do not exhibit the learning of Convocation; and they are not more useful. They are the highest Courts of the Presbyterian Church, and as such exercise some ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and exercise it badly. They form an excuse for the country parsons to come to town once a year, and rub some of the country cobwebs off their brains by contact with other brains, and they only cost 2,000*l.* a year or thereabouts to the State. They make Edinburgh somewhat disagreeable for ten days every year, but otherwise they do no harm. Whether or not that is a sufficient answer to the question is a matter upon which it is not for us, but for the people of Scotland, to pronounce a decision.

POOR-LAW AMENDMENT.

MR. GOSCHEN'S proposal for the amendment of the Act of 1867 throws some light upon the difficulties by which reform of the Poor-law is beset. The apology with which he introduced the measure to the attention of the House of Commons was surely unnecessary. That body has managed to do one good stroke of work in the Session; but it has scarcely earned a right to sit down in idleness, or to neglect one of the most important matters to which its attention can be called. Everything, indeed, shows that before long we shall be in need of more systematic and extensive changes than can be introduced at a moment's notice; the whole subject of pauperism, not only in the metropolis but throughout the country, will have strong claims upon the attention of Parliament; but the machinery already in operation requires some immediate patching and tinkering that it may carry us on satisfactorily till the adoption of a better system. The Poor-Law Board is getting into difficulties with restive guardians and grumbling ratepayers; and it is desirable that causes of quarrel should be removed, so far as it is possible to deprive angry men of a cause of quarrel. The qualification is a large one, for the guardians have left us little room for doubt as to their state of mind; they are already practising the attitude of village Hampdens, and are anxious for any opportunity of hurling foul scorn at Mr. Goschen's devoted head. A guardian indeed has his virtues, or perhaps we should say his virtue, for he considers the whole code of morality to be summed up in a dogged objection to expenditure. Keeping down the rates occupies in his mind the same position, amongst cardinal virtues, as doing as you would be done by occupies in that of the ordinary Christian. And we are far from denying that this view of the case has its merits. It is perhaps a necessary corrective to the good-natured impulses of the public. When the poor are suffering wholesale demoralization from indiscriminate charity, it is as well that there should be a class inclined to look at both sides of a halfpenny. The frugality of guardians is a great force, if only it can be turned on in the right place; it would act as an excellent drag upon the wheels, if we could regulate the time and mode of its application. Guardians, however, have a passion even stronger than their love of economy. They exhibit that jealous regard for their privileges which used formerly to distinguish the House of Commons. The ex officio guardians are to them what the King's Friends were to Burke. If they had the power, we have no doubt that they would commit reporters and impertinent journalists to the casual ward, as their great prototype sent them to the Tower. They grudge the establishment of Dispensary Committees, because they will not part with a fraction of their power. They hold it to be a personal hardship if a pauper is removed to a short distance from them; not only because they cannot overlook the expenditure, but because it deprives them of one of their subjects. Mr. Goschen relates a most instructive anecdote of the Unions in the City of London. If the two smaller of the three Unions into which the City is divided were incorporated in the larger, the effect would be to lower their rates to one-third of the present amount. The guardians, however, object decidedly to the proposal. They would rather bear undisputed sway in their own little section than be swamped in the larger body. They have a parochial pride, which they cherish as tenderly as other patriots cherished the national sentiment which made the Union unpopular in Ireland, or the love of their own State which led South Carolina to secede. To be a guardian of the West London Union is to hold so proud a position that no worthy citizen would barter his dignity for a seat in a general City Union, even to gain a reduction of two shillings in the pound. It is a curious study in human nature; one would hardly have supposed that the same sentiment which sanctifies the rocks of a Swiss canton to the patriotic inhabitants would gather round so unpromising an object as the West London Union, and that grocers and butchers would be ready to sacrifice even their money to the love of what, in our point of view, seems to be a mere geographical expression. We should like to know whether an inhabitant of the West London Union, when transported to foreign climes, yearns after the lanes and alleys of his former abode, and feels his bosom thrill with emotion when he hears of the patriotic resistance made by his compatriots to their would-be oppressor, Mr. Goschen. We can only hope that none of them may take it into their heads to win undying fame by treating Mr. Goschen as Tell treated Gessler, and lay an ambush for him in some of the gloomy defiles leading into Chancery Lane.

The fact that guardians are susceptible to this emotion is worth remembering. We must be tender not only of their pockets, but of their hearts. But however singular and interesting may be the love of a particular segment arbitrarily carved out of this wilderness of brick and mortar, we cannot, from regard for it, sacrifice the interests of paupers. An objection on the ground of economy deserves attention; but we cannot go out of our way to flatter the self-esteem of every London Union. The outcry raised against centralization and other bugbears of the local press frequently covers nothing but a desire of the existing guardians to preserve their own petty privileges. Every step in reform seems hitherto to have resulted in the formation of new Boards, and every Board becomes in its own eyes a sacred institution, to be touched at the peril of the rash intruder. Mr. Goschen, it is obvious, will have to encounter a good deal of opposition, resting, in fact, upon grounds too childish to be openly avowed; and it is plain that genuine reforms cannot be effected without disregarding prejudices of this order. The general nature of his proposal is simple enough, and explains the real nature of the difficulties to be encountered. It is admitted, in the first place, that the workhouses are overcrowded, and that they do not fulfil the most essential requirement of securing a proper classification of the inmates. According to Mr. Goschen's figures, 28,640 persons were in one night sleeping in 27,840 beds. The amount of cubic space actually provided was so much less than the minimum which has been declared essential, that the excess of inmates above the proper number was 4,500. Children and infirm and sick paupers had to sleep in the same ward with ablebodied. Children who were constantly going in and out with their parents were mixed up with those who had been deserted, and introducing diseases and contaminating influences. The evils which led to the provision, by the Act of 1867, of separate lunatic asylums and fever hospitals are still in existence. That these evils urgently demand a remedy is beyond dispute. The recent increase of pauperism has of course thrown many difficulties in the way; but we are bound to remove these gross abuses; and if we wish it with sufficient intensity, we can manage to do it. Considering the vast sums which are thrown away in London annually, we ought to be able to secure a sufficient amount of accommodation to enable us to classify paupers judiciously, and treat them efficiently. Mr. Goschen admitted that he was startled at the enormous total of 1,400,000*l.* demanded for the various improvements; and his audience apparently shared his surprise. Yet it was only the other day that we were told that just five times that amount was spent annually in London upon charities the effect of which, for the most part, is to do positive injury, and increase instead of diminishing the mass of pauperism. Even the 1,400,000*l.* would be well spent if only it would secure an approach to more rational principles of administration. We have no desire, however, to depreciate the importance of the sum. It is hard, we fully admit, for parishes to find themselves suddenly saddled with an expenditure upon new buildings equal in amount to all that they have spent since the adoption of the Poor-law. We only say that it should be laid down as essential that the ends sought for should be attained in some way or other; whilst, of course, any mode of attaining them by a smaller expenditure should be welcomed if discovered. Whether so many new schools and infirmaries and fever hospitals should be built, is open to dispute; but it is plain that schools and infirmaries and hospitals and asylums should not, as at present, be muddled together, with the greatest possible amount of moral and physical contamination. We require to abolish, at any price, the existing workhouse, as a jumble of half-a-dozen incompatible institutions. The only method by which economy can be reconciled with efficiency is, according to Mr. Goschen, by the amalgamation of Unions. It will evidently be possible to secure some approach to classification by using the existing buildings. By bringing together three or four workhouses, and using them for different purposes, we should avoid the necessity of many of the proposed new buildings, we should get rid of a number of small Boards, and effect a considerable saving in expenses of administration. Without going into details, it is plain that such a scheme would enable the Poor-law Board to meet the rational objections of guardians to extravagant expenditure, and at the same time to secure the chief improvements demanded. We fear that Mr. Goschen would still have to count upon the undying opposition of patriots of the West London Union, and upon the hostility of various officials and Boards whose importance would be diminished. But as the hospitals and schools have to be got somehow or other, and the proposed plan offers a feasible method of doing it, we should hope that the irritable vanity of such gentlemen will be disregarded.

It is obvious, as Mr. Goschen admits, that these changes look in the direction of some extensive reforms. They increase the strength of the demand for an equalization of the poor-rates in the metropolis, and may lead to other changes in the Poor-law, upon which it is unnecessary to dwell. This is far from being an argument against them. Mr. Goschen will have sufficient power to secure a more effectual working of the Poor-law than we at present enjoy, and may turn the flank of some of the most annoying obstacles. But much will remain to be done; and one most probable and beneficial effect of the passing of the proposed Act will be to enforce upon us, before long, a thorough consideration of the whole system.

A DISSENTING PREACHER'S DIFFICULTIES.

A CURIOUS example of the working of the voluntary system has lately been presented in the Court of Chancery. A suit had been instituted by the trustees of an Independent Chapel at Reading, for the purpose of obtaining a declaration of the Court that the Rev. Samuel Clarke Gordon was duly dismissed from office as co-pastor of the chapel by a resolution passed at a meeting of the members of the congregation. The choice of Mr. Gordon as a co-pastor was very deliberately made, for we are told that during upwards of a year candidates for the office were invited to preach in the chapel; but nevertheless that choice began before long to be repented of. A year after it had been made, dissensions arose in the congregation. A large party, including a majority of the trustees, were dissatisfied with Mr. Gordon, while another party, including a number of ladies, were in his favour. A meeting was held, at which a resolution was passed dismissing Mr. Gordon from his office. Every person present, except one who remained neutral, voted for the resolution. Mr. Gordon's supporters protested against the regularity of the meeting, and abstained from attending it. Other meetings, smaller in number, were afterwards held by the supporters of Mr. Gordon, at which unanimous resolutions were passed in his favour. Ultimately a suit was instituted in the Court of Chancery, asking for an injunction to restrain Mr. Gordon from preaching.

There is a familiar but rather profane story of a Frenchman, who had been a teacher of his own language to undergraduates at Oxford, and was asked whether he would return thither and seek his livelihood in the same way. We do not know what were the Frenchman's reasons for declining to return to Oxford, but all who have heard the story will admit that he expressed them with uncommon force. It strikes us that the repugnance of any one who may have tried it, to preaching in this Independent chapel at Reading, would be nearly as strong as was felt by the Frenchman to teaching at Oxford; but, of course, a minister of religion would express his feelings in a wholly different way. If he said that he would much rather go to heaven than preach before such an exacting congregation as meets at Reading, we should quite believe him; because even if he had to preach in heaven—and it rather conflicts with our ideas of heaven to suppose that there would be either preachers or hearers in the abode of rest and peace—there would at any rate be some things ascertained which are now doubtful, and thus the limits of discussion would be narrowed. To take an example from a popular writer, it would be no longer open to a New England farmer, being in heaven, to remark by way of criticism upon a sermon there delivered, that if he paid for hell-fire he liked to have hell-fire for his money. We believe that in the Established Church incumbents are liable to receive anonymous letters from members of their congregations animadverting upon the sermons of their curates, and it may even happen that such letters are forwarded to incumbents when they have gone away on a holiday, and are received by them when they are lying on their backs half slumbering in the summer warmth, and wishing that under the groves and in the grassy meadow they might find rest. But we do not think that the troubles of the parson can be compared to the troubles of the Dissenting minister. It is hard no doubt to see, while you are giving out your text, that an elderly gentleman of stern aspect is sitting close to you in a llery, and adjusting his spectacles so as to get what sportsmen ll "a fair lay-on" at the desk before you, and to discover whether you are about to preach from an honest manuscript or from a print or lithograph, which may have been purchased, as advertisements suggest, for eighteen-pence. But we do not think that a preacher of the Establishment is often troubled with a formal protest against his doctrine, and, if he were, he might venture in many cases to imitate the independence of a late Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, who told a protester against his jurisdiction to protest and be quick about it, and go about his business. But in a Dissenting chapel it appears that it takes a man a year or more to preach himself into a pastoral office, and rather less time to preach himself out of it. We are told that a member of the congregation handed to Mr. Gordon a paper containing eight reasons for the resignation that was required of him, or, in other words, eight heads of objection to his sermons. There were 116 persons who voted for dismissing Mr. Gordon, and, so far as we know, they were all equally capable of giving reasons for their conduct. Now eight times 116 is 928. The multiplication table is here the highest eloquence, for how more forcibly than by using it can we picture the wretchedness of the minister who has to please every member of his congregation? We do not forget that there was a minority, including a number of ladies, which supported Mr. Gordon; but even this consolation is not unqualified, for we do not forget also that Mr. Gordon was unmarried, and that a time would be likely to come when all the ladies except one would begin to dislike his sermons. The ladies, moreover, would be able to claim the privilege of their sex to dislike without giving reasons. They would not even be called upon to say, as the objector who has got into print did, that Mr. Gordon's sermons were deficient "in unction, in Gospel power, and in Christian experience." and that "the work of the Spirit" was not dwelt upon sufficiently. We do not exactly understand whether these, and six other objections which are stated, are all applicable to every one of Mr. Gordon's sermons. But it appears probable that a contributing member of the congregation would say that he paid for unction and he expected to have unction. Nobody can define seasoning, and yet a high authority has declared that it is seasoning which makes all the difference in pies. The public cannot exactly describe what they expect pies to taste of, but if they are not pleased at one shop they will try another. A skilful preacher will take unction, and Gospel power, and Christian experience, and mingle them with the body of his sermon, just as a cunning cook compounds oil and vinegar and mustard, and other ingredients, to dress a salad. The oil must be present throughout, clinging to every leaf, and making it slide pleasantly over the palate, and yet the most acute taste shall not be able to say decisively "here is oil." It must be equally impossible to point to a passage in a sermon and say that it is or is not unctuous, but one can tell on coming out of chapel whether one has undergone spiritual lubrication. But other complaints against Mr. Gordon are more easily capable of being tested. Thus it was alleged that in some of his sermons "there was nothing said to unconverted sinners." Now, with the help of a shorthand writer, it might be quickly ascertained whether Mr. Gordon did or did not in the course of a sermon allude once or oftener to coals; and, if he did not, members of the congregation might reasonably object that their supply of spiritual provender, although perhaps adequate in quantity, was inferior in quality to the article for which they supposed themselves to have contracted. They might say that they paid for coals, and coals they desired to have.

It appears that a sermon which will satisfy the demands of the majority of this exacting congregation must not be too argumentative, but adapted to ordinary comprehension; it must not set up too high a standard of Christian life, but must take account of the influence of trials; it must not verge too closely on Arminianism; it must appeal for its motive not to dry, rigid duty, but to Christian love; it must dwell on the work of the Spirit; it must have unction, Gospel power, and Christian experience, and it must "awaken" unconverted sinners. This, we believe, is all. For the sake of the judges of the Court of Chancery, we are happy to be able to say that it is no part of their duty to decide whether this catalogue of requirements is satisfied by a preacher. But the judge before whom this case came has decided that the will of the majority of the congregation must prevail, and that if the sermons of their minister are not sufficiently unctuous and awakening they may dismiss him, and may obtain, if necessary, an injunction from the Court to prevent his occupying their pulpit. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gordon will obey the decree of the Court, and will not either go himself or send his solicitor on his behalf to claim the position of minister in the chapel, so that he may not incur the censure passed upon a litigating pastor by the late Lord Justice Knight Bruce, "that he had attended Divine Service, so to speak, by attorney." The trustees of this meeting-house are at liberty to seek for unction and Gospel power and Christian experience where they please, and we wish that they may get them. The Court could find nothing in the trust-deeds of the chapel to countenance the notion that the choice of a minister by the congregation was irrevocable, or that he was to continue to hold his office for life or during good behaviour. The evidence adduced to prove a usage to the same effect failed to satisfy the Court. The trustees, who were plaintiffs, alleged that it was a fundamental principle of their communion, that in the absence of any special usage or agreement to the contrary, the power of electing and dismissing their ministers resided entirely with the body of church members, and that this power was to be exercised by the majority. The defendant, Mr. Gordon, on the other hand, alleged that, in the absence of special agreement, all appointments of ministers were for life, so long as the persons appointed abstained from preaching doctrines at variance with the tenets of the body, and were not guilty of immorality or other gross misconduct. Between these two conflicting views of the position of ministers in Independent chapels, the Court had to decide upon the evidence. The question would be purely one of evidence, as there can be no general rule applicable to all bodies of Dissenters. Many of these bodies have constitutions under which ministers hold their offices during life or good behaviour, and provisions regulating the procedure which is to be adopted to deprive a minister for misconduct. When any religious association has agreed on the terms of its union, and has constituted a tribunal to determine whether the rules of the association have been violated by its members or not, and what shall be the consequences of such violation, then the decision of such tribunal will be binding when it has acted within the scope of its authority, has observed such forms as the rules require, if any forms be prescribed, and, if not, has proceeded in a manner consonant with the principles of justice. The law was thus laid down by the Privy Council in a well-known case, and it is exemplified by many previous cases. Thus, in Dr. Warren's case, which arose in the Wesleyan-Methodist communion, Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst said that he was of opinion that the District Committee of the body had the power to suspend, and that they acted legally, and that he was not called upon to say whether they acted wisely, discreetly, temperately, or hastily. In the absence of a regular constitution, the will of the majority of church members must prevail, as it has done in the case of Mr. Gordon. But it might perhaps have been expected that in a numerous body like the Independents a regular constitution would have been established.

This question receives further illustration from the case of the French Protestant Church in the City of London, which has been before the Court of Chancery from time to time during the last ten years, and reappeared during the present week. The Master of the Rolls, when that case was originally before him, said that it depended "on the construction of the rules and regulations by which the institution was guided as applicable to the conduct of the minister"; and he decided that the minister was improperly dismissed. In that case there were rules and regulations under which the minister had rights, and a governing body had a power of dismissal. The Master of the Rolls considered that this body had acted rather as partisans than as judges, and therefore he was called upon to interfere. Thus it does not appear that there was any difference between Sir John Romilly and Lord Lyndhurst as to the principle upon which the Court proceeds, and both those judges were dealing with bodies having a regular constitution.

BRITISH COAST DEFENCES.

THE Royal Engineers have come very fairly out of the ordeal to which they have lately been subjected. It is somewhat unfortunate for them that the constitution of the Committee appointed to criticize their great work, the Coast Fortifications, should be subject to the reproach that many of the members were officers who had an interest in proving the excellence of the forts; but it would be unfair to make too much of the objection, seeing that the favourable Report is unanimous. It would have been nothing more than customary to find protests against some part or other of the decision appended to the document which has lately been laid before Parliament. The absence of any such record of varying opinion may be taken as proof of the general accord felt by the gentlemen who have declared that "the works have been constructed with a due regard to the conditions necessary to secure their stability and permanency," and that "the failures and mistakes have been much fewer and of less importance than might have been anticipated" in works of such magnitude.

The coast fortifications have been attacked by two sets of critics. On the one hand, it was said that the country was indulging in an unwarrantable extravagance, that we needed no such defences, or that at least they need not have been of such a permanent character. On the other hand, a whole army of engineers and writers for the press asserted that culpable carelessness had been shown in building works too weak to resist the powers likely to be brought against them, that they were already tumbling down or threatening to be swallowed up bodily by the marshes of the Thames and Medway. To the critics of the latter school a sufficient answer has been given, but the powers of the Committee did not extend so far as to include a general criticism on the original designs in relation to the position and magnitude of the forts. This is again unfortunate, and leaves many points of controversy unsettled. Is it indeed necessary to have these enormous and costly erections, bristling with heavy guns, on so many points of the British coast-line? In some respects we believe not, but as the works have advanced so far, and the most doubtful are those wholly or nearly completed, the wisest course will probably be to finish the whole series out of hand. England will then at least possess some of the grandest military structures in the world, and her principal harbours will, according to the best judges, be safe from all dread of molestation. The fleet will be freer to roam as may be advisable in war, without fear of finding its ports of refuge occupied by an enemy, its arsenals and dockyards burned during its absence. It is hardly consolatory to be told that an enemy landed on English soil will now be certain to march directly upon London; but, on the other hand, it appears that a landing would be more difficult, and far less likely to be attempted. The great object of fortification is to render the place fortified secure for at least a considerable time, and nothing can carry out this idea better than a body of defences strong enough to render any attack upon them so dangerous that it could only be regarded as a reckless undertaking. Portsmouth and Plymouth will soon be in a position to warn off a hostile fleet, and this is far preferable even to beating it. The other ports are less completely guarded, but then they are of less importance, and in their case also defensive power bears such a ratio to the value of the position that no enemy would think it worth while to attack them.

The plan of the Committee, in making their Report, was to take each position, sketch the history of its defences, and then go carefully into each one of them in detail, winding up with a summary wherein a general opinion is expressed. After the examination of the various works, there is a short summary embracing the Committee's views on the whole question. They consider "that great skill has been shown in adapting the original designs of the works to the altered circumstances of the times; that the arrangements for the service of the guns are good, and that the increase of resisting power in the works has kept pace with the increase in the power of the guns." But the said increase of power in works and guns has involved an increase of cost which, though perhaps necessary, is decidedly unpleasant. There is an increase in the demand for money of no less than 1,091,437*l.* since the amended estimates of 1862. The excess on the estimate of the Act of 1867 will be 481,437*l.*, and the total amount required to complete the works is now estimated at 2,832,599*l*., a sum of 5,118,838*l*. having been expended up to the 30th of June last. The total cost of our harbour defences will therefore be 7,951,437*l*. It appears, according to the Report of the Committee, that, generally speaking, this great cost has been unavoidable, and in that case it is certainly not too much to pay, considering the benefits to be obtained by the security given to the great depôts of our fleets. The ships which will be set free to cruise in distant waters will be worth far more than this sum, and not only so, but the addition of their strength to the active fleet may make all the difference of a naval battle gained or lost. We should, however, like to know exactly what Captain Moncrieff says to this matter; he was examined only on the question of the Thames forts, and his evidence, though cautious, admits of no other interpretation than that he is dissatisfied with the manner in which his system is to be partially applied to them. He says that, "by the adoption of the proposed plans, the principles of my system are entirely lost. . . . The raising of the crests of the parapets to such a height above the ground level precludes the idea of concealment, by making these batteries the most prominent object in the landscape. . . . I would respectfully submit that a hybrid fort, partly on my system and partly on another, is unsatisfactory to both systems. . . . If thought desirable, I am ready to submit plans for the placing in position of any number of guns in the vicinity of the present sites, the works to cover which would not exceed 840*l*. per gun." Now, considering that we are spending all but 8,000,000*l*. on the fortifications, we cannot but think that Captain Moncrieff's very moderate proposition might be accepted. The invention is of purely English, or rather Scotch, origin. Like Palliser's shells, it is being adopted in some form or other by every civilized nation. A very few hundred pounds would enable Captain Moncrieff to show us what are really his own designs for the formation of protected barbette batteries. He might be assisted by a small committee composed of officers drawn in equal proportions from the two scientific corps, and wh for the time being, should have no other work to do but to develop the Moncrieff invention in a practical form.

It is somewhat curious to observe the different methods of treating fortification questions adopted by various nations. Most of the Continental Powers are fortifying their coasts, but they try by every possible means to keep secret the position and strength of their forts. The result is, that their own public is in a state of complete ignorance, while the agents of other Governments have comparatively little difficulty in keeping their War Offices well informed. Blunder after blunder is made, and sometimes never corrected. It requires sharp criticism to make men confess that they have erred in designing the national defences. England, on the contrary, appoints numerous committees, publishes reports and maps, which are at the disposal of any one who likes to invest a few shillings in them; but, in the end, the light of public opinion is thrown upon all errors or blunders, and the designers are forced to correct them. It follows that foreign Governments know little more about our works than we do about theirs, and what they do know is, it may be hoped, of a nature to render them extremely disinclined to attack us.

In the course of their investigations the Committee found it necessary to make some very interesting experiments. One of them was intended to test the liability of shell piled in heaps to be exploded by the impact of an enemy's projectiles. Forty-two common 9-inch cast-iron shells were filled with powder, and piled within the experimental casemate at Shoeburyness, directly opposite the embrasure, so that any shot fired through the opening must strike them. Eight others were arranged on end, where they would most probably stand when raised from the shell stores below, before being put in the gun. A 9-inch Palliser loaded shell was fired at the pile from a distance of 70 yards, with a full charge of 43 lbs. One loud and violent explosion in the casemate was heard. Out of the fifty shells nineteen burst, others were thrown violently about, some even flying out of the casemate both to the rear and sideways. Four of the eight placed standing on the floor were thrown to the rear without exploding, the other four were scarcely disturbed. Some of the shells had been struck very severely by splinters, and one was even cracked, without having exploded. Splinters were picked up at 200 and 400 yards from the casemate on its flanks. Another experiment of the same nature was made, with similar results; and the opinion of the Committee was, that though common shells will explode when struck directly by heavy projectiles, there is no danger to them from any but the largest splinters. They imagine that Palliser's shells would be even safer, but this is somewhat doubtful.

Another important question into which the Committee entered was the prevention of damp in magazines by improved ventilation. The standing orders for artillery magazines direct that "magazines are to be aired upon every favourable opportunity, Sundays excepted." It naturally occurs to the officers in charge of a magazine that a favourable opportunity has arrived when the weather is fine and warm. Not a bit of it. The earth below a building is in summer colder, in its upper surface, than the surrounding ground which receives the rays of the sun. At one inch below the surface the daily variations of temperature are reduced one-half; at three feet they do not exceed half a degree. So it comes to pass that the heat of the outer air and ground in fine summer weather is always greater than the floor and the walls of closed buildings. Every one has experienced a chill in entering thick-walled buildings during summer. Here, then, you have a ready-made condenser, capable of reducing the current of warm air which enters when the door is opened below its dew point. It deposits part of its moisture, passes out and leaves room for more warm air, and then more condensation. We believe that this simple truth was first pointed out by Lieutenant Innes, R.E., in the sixteenth volume of the Royal Engineer Corps' Papers, and notwithstanding that it commends itself at once to every man who has ever so small an amount of scientific knowledge, notwithstanding also that he had successfully treated a provokingly damp magazine at Halifax on the new principle, it was long before his conclusions found acceptance. Of course the remedy is to keep the magazines hermetically sealed during hot weather, and to open them when the external air is cold and dry. Nothing would be easier than to issue strict regulations based upon the registers of thermometers inside and out, and so place the dryness of magazines beyond the region of haphazard.

The money spent upon fortifications may be considered as devoted to life insurance, but there is no reason why the ordinary rules of economy should not apply to this as well as to the other affairs of ordinary life. What the Department of Works has done it appears to have done well. Let us now see that the same authorities are ready to accept further improvements, otherwise they will fall short of deserving the gratitude and esteem of their countrymen.

AN AMERICAN FOX-HUNT.

UNTIL very recently Englishmen might have consoled themselves with the reflection that, however much they had fallen behind America in some things, there was at least one institution in respect of which they were still ahead of the United States, as of all the rest of the world. They might have taken a semi-barbarous pride in the belief that they were still superior in sport, if in nothing else. Americans might be the only really great and free people on the face of the earth; they might be the only people now capable of producing famous statesmen, preachers, authors, and generals; but we had at any rate one institution which they had never yet ventured to imitate. The joys of fox-hunting were not yet revealed to them. Hopeless as the English cockney might feel his case to be when he compared himself with the citizen of Boston or of Philadelphia, there was still something left for which our country gentlemen might thank heaven. But last March an event happened in the Western States the news of which will carry a sense of the pressure of American competition home to the heart of Leicestershire and the bosom of Bucks. Advices from Chicago inform us that on the 17th of last March a fox-hunt took place near the town of St. Louis, in Illinois, a town which is no doubt destined to be the future Badminton or Melton Mowbray of America; and which, if we may judge by the accounts of the sport afforded on this first occasion, as given to us in the St. Louis Republican, is likely next season to cause a perfect stampede of sportsmen from Leamington and Northampton to the Far West. The last hunting season in this country was no doubt a good one; and many of the runs of January and February, 1869, will be affectionately remembered by the squires of Lutterworth and the officers from Weedon; but we may safely venture to declare that the best run of the season with the Atherstone or the Quorn was not to be compared with this St. Louis fox-hunt, either in variety or piquancy of incidents. But there is so much difference of detail between the English and American methods of fox-hunting that the superiority of the American method cannot be adequately appreciated without a little description, which it may be hoped will tend to clear the reader's mind of prejudice, and enable him to take an impartial view of the American mode of hunting the fox.

The first prejudice of which an English reader must divest himself is the belief that to the sport of fox-hunting a Master of Foxhounds is necessary. Ordinary English squires could probably almost as easily imagine the existence of a son without a father as of a pack of foxhounds without a master; and although the master is the only absolutely essential functionary to the hunting of a pack of foxhounds, yet one is not apt to suppose that the master would be able to show his friends or subscribers very much good sport without the assistance of a huntsman, and one or more whips. But, in "inaugurating" this noble sport at St. Louis, the men of Illinois have struck out an entirely novel and most original line. They have arranged and organized their sporting staff on a different and vastly improved system. The chief personage in the sport does not, at St. Louis, write M.F.H. after his name, but receives the much more dignified titles of "Projector" and "Grand Marshal." The hounds do not, as in England, belong to him, or to any body of subscribers whom he represents; but a plan is adopted much more in accordance with the spirit of the age. The hounds are jobbed. Peace to the souls of Sir Richard Sutton and of the late Mr. Assheton Smith! We would not in the lifetime of those worthies have called attention to this matter, as it would perhaps have pained them. But, now that they are gone, no such delicacy prevents our pressing upon our readers the advantages of this practice of jobbing hounds; though it is unnecessary to describe these advantages in detail, inasmuch as many persons in this country have already adopted the parallel customs of jobbing their horses, their carriages, their pointers and retrievers, their clothes, and their servants; and the jobbing of foxhounds must obviously be even more convenient than the jobbing of these things, by so much as foxhounds are a more troublesome and wasteful class of instruments to keep in stock.

Next after the Grand Marshal and the Foxhound job-master, the most important functionary in an American hunt appears to be the Special Correspondent of the local newspaper. The presence of a journalist is as necessary at a fox-hunt as at any other important or interesting meeting in America. But the reader may perhaps wonder what arrangements can be made at a fox-hunt for the convenience of the gentlemen of the press; how, in fact, the nature of the sport can permit of the proper facilities being afforded to them for discharging their important duties to the public. In order to understand this, it is necessary to bear in mind some important differences between an English and an American meet, or "rendezvous," as it is more elegantly termed in Illinois. In the first place, the Americans have most judiciously dispensed with the English practice of drawing a cover in order to find their fox. In Illinois the fox is purchased of a fox-catcher some time before the hunt is to take place, "is put for some weeks under the scientific supervision and charge" of a fox-keeper, and is eventually brought to the rendezvous "in a fox-waggon." It is probably while he is under the scientific supervision of the keeper that the fox acquires the art of climbing trees—an art which adds a novel variety of incident to the American sport, and which, as we shall see, the fox at St. Louis practised with the greatest éclat. But, at any rate, the advantages of the American method are obvious. As there is no drawing, there can be no blanks, and no tiresome waste of time in cover-beating. And indeed it is difficult to believe that our fashionable hunts will not next season adopt the American system, and start their foxes in prime condition from a fox-waggon. It cannot be supposed that in this scientific age intelligent and sport-loving Englishmen will long be content to allow that which is absolutely essential to their sport, the finding of a fox, to depend upon chance. No doubt, too, the whole influence of the ladies and of the local press will be thrown into the scale in favour of the fox-waggon system, since it will be remarked, secondly, that this system enables the start to take place from the top of a high hill, whence an almost bird's-eye view of the run can be obtained. The reader is now in a position to understand how it is possible for a Special Correspondent to attend and report upon an American fox-hunt, without the necessity either of being a first-flight man across country, or of knowing how to manage a balloon. And it may be interesting to him to learn that on this occasion, at St. Louis, the projector of the hunt was one Mr. Macdonald, who hired the hounds, bought the fox, fixed the hour and place for the rendezvous, and for the find, or start, as, under all the circumstances, it is perhaps more aptly named; that the foxhound job-master was one Mr. John Stumpf, "a rather old gentleman in grey suit," who brought "five or six dogs, named Carlo, Waltman, Pascha, Hector, and Pluto, to the rendezvous," and whom the Special Correspondent of the St. Louis Republican represents as "regarding his dogs with affectionate interest, and expressing his confidence that they would kill the fox, if they had a fair show"; that the fox-keeper was one Barney O'Connor; and that the fox provided for the occasion was named "Ben Butler," a name "probably suggested by the silvery metallic glisten of his silken coat." Nor let the Leicestershire man be surprised at the small number of hounds—two couples and a half—considered necessary for the sport in Illinois. Doubtless the deficiency in numbers is more than counterbalanced by the superior excellence engendered in the hounds through the competition which is caused by the practice of jobbing them. But, however this may be, enough has probably now been said by way of preliminary explanation to enable the reader to enjoy a few short extracts from the narrative of the Special Correspondent of the St. Louis Republican. This gentleman, who was mounted on "a smooth-running buggy from the St. Nicholas livery-stable, drawn by a three-minute mare," on receiving private information that the fox-waggon had started, and that the exciting scene was about to commence, set out for the hill where the start was to take place, and thus describes the event:—

> The hill is to the north of the road, and no fences render the ascent of the mild declivity troublesome. This spot was selected as there are no woods of any amount in the vicinity, and the view is unobstructed. On the top of this hill, about two o'clock, the hunters and spectators gathered. After some little delay, Mr. Macdonald gave the order for the hunt to begin. In tones of stentorian command he addressed the crowd. The fox was about to be let go. It would be taken to the brow of the hill, and there set at liberty; but in order to secure a successful hunt, it would be necessary to preserve order. The dogs were to be held—a boy to hold each hound—the horsemen were to form in line on the hill where they now were, and at a given signal to start forward. "Then," said the speaker, in a voice of heroic determination, "every man for himself." These words produced a visible effect, and some few of the horsemen looked nervously at each other, and evidently felt as if something serious was about to transpire. After some hauling and snapping, "Ben Butler" was flopped out of his barrel upon the ground, Barney O'Connor holding him by the chain. The next step was to give him a good start; so he was led across the field, Mr. Macdonald and two other parties accompanying, to the point before designated. During the route the fox was dragged over a few fences, the presumption being that the hounds would follow in exactly the same course, and so try the metal of the horses and riders. A piece of woods, a quarter or a mile or so from the crowd, having been reached, the fox was let go, a blow on the side being given him to convey the idea that the faster he went the better.

The reader will not fail to remark that, in this scientific method of opening the hunt, the sportsmen of Illinois have borrowed some characteristic features from several English sports. In the practice of bringing the fox up in a fox-waggon and starting him with a rap on the flanks, we see something akin to scenes which have been witnessed before now with Her Majesty's Buckhounds. The trick of hauling the fox over some fences, with the special design of affording better sport to the riders (or to the spectators), may remind old Oxonians of the Christ Church drag. The dodge whereby the necessity for the services of a huntsman and his whipper-in is obviated—namely, by confiding each hound to the care of a small boy to hold—seems to be remotely derived from our practice of using slippers at coursing-matches, and is at any rate an excellent contrivance, as it substitutes for the permanent and expensive employment of full-grown men, the cheaper alternative of occasional, and perhaps voluntary, child-labour. And, lastly, in the marshalling of the horsemen and requiring them to start by a given signal, it is easy to discover a feature borrowed from Epsom, and a feature, too, of which many an unlucky sportsman, who has been temporarily or permanently thrown out by getting a bad start from the wrong side of the cover, will appreciate the utility. The fox being thus started in the bran-new American fashion, the hounds were laid on, and the hunt commenced. Like the life of Achilles, it was short, but glorious. On arriving at the first fence, the hounds, with a consideration which would never be shown by an English pack, stopped short, and proceeded to offer a variety of diversion for the entertainment of the ladies and of the Special Correspondent. One sat down and bayed, another tried unsuccessfully to execute "circles of recovery," and a third proceeded to chase some loose horses which were in another corner of the field. All this time, the reader might suppose, the fox was making play across country, and the chance of a kill was ended. And so it would have been, no doubt, in the case of an English vermin. But at this interesting juncture the event occurred at which we have already hinted, which shows the superiority of the American to the English fox, and which afforded a charming variety in the sport never even dreamed of by English fox-hunters. The fox went up a tree! But we must again summon the Special Correspondent to describe such a scene as this, as he witnessed it, on arriving at the first fence in his buggy:—

> "What of the fox?" This was the question we asked on arriving at the spot; but nobody could answer it. On looking around, we saw a man on the other side of a moist soft field of nursery plants, gesticulating wildly. [This is apparently the American substitute for crying Tally Ho.] "What's the matter?" we shouted. "He's up a tree," was the reply, pointing upwards; and sure enough, on looking intently at a tree near him, we spied the fox seated among the branches, and calmly enjoying the scene.

But the enjoyment of this amazing fox was not destined to last very long. For now we come to the kill, or the dénouement, as it is called in America, which was as different from our English termination as was every other part of this strange sport. Suppose—if we may be permitted to suppose an utter impossibility—that a Quorn or a Pytchley fox should on any occasion ascend a tree, what would be done under the circumstances? The laws of English fox-hunting do not apply any solution to such a puzzle. There is probably not a squire in Leicestershire who could say offhand what ought to be done in the event of such astounding behaviour on the part of a fox; and we doubt whether even the great Tom Payne himself would have been equal to such an occasion. But the wary Illinois fox-hunter comes to his sport fully prepared for such an occurrence. He carries a revolver with him to the hunting-field, and thus is prepared to deal with the fox as he would with a man who had offended him in the streets of St. Louis or Chicago—namely, "to shoot him on sight." On the present occasion, the first sportsman who got within reach of the treed fox happened to be the judge of the St. Louis Probate Court, who, after a couple of shots, succeeded in bringing down the game, just as the Special Correspondent and the rest of the field arrived underneath the tree. As any reflections upon such a unique termination to the sport would be superfluous, we shall conclude by quoting, and earnestly recommending to the unprejudiced consideration of readers in the Midland counties, the excellent remarks of the Special Correspondent:—

> It may strike some minds as a little odd that, after so much elaborate preparation, the fox should have been so summarily disposed of. But Judge Vastine, no doubt, intended to illustrate the original idea of hunting before modern romance corrupted it. When we pursue anything, the object is to catch it, and the sooner the better; and this is the genuine American idea.

OUR FOOD PROSPECTS.

THAT important period of the year has now arrived when the aspect of the sky and the changes of the weather are regarded by observers more anxious than those who study only their comforts or their pleasures. The farmer whose crops flourish or are in jeopardy perhaps looks on with somewhat of stolid indifference, knowing that if the crop is good it will probably sell at a low price, while if it is a bad one he will obtain a high price; but the speculator in corn (and the activity shown at the end of last week demonstrates that late reverses have not exterminated the species), the merchant whose business depends on the prosperity of trade and the abundance and low price of food, the manufacturer whose very life depends on the ability of his workpeople to live in contentment on moderate wages, the stockjobber, and a crowd more, watch the weather as they do other signs of the times by which to govern their affairs. The corn-market, ruled for months past by the varying conditions of demand and supply, now enters on a fresh phase. Operations which up to this time have been based on calculations of the quantity of the home-growth and of importations from abroad now rest on speculations as to what the new crop will be; and all changes of the weather, favourable and unfavourable, are so well reflected in similar changes in prices during this epoch of "weather markets," that it would almost appear to be a desirable simplification of affairs if the business were reduced to wagers upon the rise or fall of the barometer and thermometer, or the direction of the wind, or the number of inches of rainfall within a given time. This system would have the advantage, or disadvantage, of permitting outsiders to join in the game as they can in horse-racing, or in speculations in the share-market, without being troubled or deterred by complications of "cost, freight, and insurance," or "to arrive" transactions in commodities about which they know nothing. Not, perhaps, that such speculators as we have in view know anything about the stocks or shares that they purchase, but still they fancy that they do, which at any rate gives them confidence. Poor Mr. Stefanos Xenos, that innocent plucked dove who has just confided to us his tale of woe, though evidently a well-skilled man in mercantile affairs, ready to enter on the vastest transactions at a moment's notice, found the corn-market too much for even his great mind. Other speculators of weaker powers may therefore well be thankful to find such simple "events" as the rise or fall of the mercury on which to stake their money. There is, however, this little drawback to the contrivance—namely, that if it be the goodness or badness of the crops which are reckoned upon, it is not in the power of the finest summer weather to produce a good crop from an unhealthy plant; so that the speculator in corn, in making his reckoning, has to decide the previous question of what the autumn and winter may have done for the vitality and vigour of the plant before he enters on the question of what the summer weather does for it. Among the old school of farmers there was an opinion—almost, indeed, amounting in force to an axiom—that a good crop of wheat never followed a wet winter. The conditions of agriculture are now, however, so much changed, extensive and thorough drainage has left its mark so unmistakably on the face of the country, that we believe it would be very illusory to reckon on the truth of the old saying in these days. It is easy to understand that wet, retentive soils were so saturated with water in former times, when there was a rainy winter, that the seed rotted in the ground; it was offered the conditions of life of an aquatic plant rather than those which wheat loves. It is almost an axiom that the season cannot be too dry for wheat. Take, for an example, last summer in Great Britain, or the climate of the country which, from the experience of the last few years, appears to be most sure of its crop, and where the cultivation of corn is in consequence developing most rapidly—we refer to California. Provided that the three or four weeks' rains arrive in their season, a crop large in quantity and fine in quality appears to be a certainty. But even with the improved culture of this country, if the seed should have escaped the decay consequent on excessive moisture, and there should be a fair "plant," there is still the danger in a moist season that there should appear with the wheat so strong a growth of weeds as to rob the wheat of its light and air, thus "choking" it, and at the same time exhausting the soil. And if the moist winter is also, as this last has been, a mild one, then the insects escape death by frost, and the crops become a prey to the ravages of swarms a hundred or a thousandfold increased.

Altogether, then, it is not to be wondered at that the reports of the wheat crop are not quite so promising of plenty as they frequently are at this season. Mr. Turner of Richmond, whose opinions, however, in former years we have had to expose as fallacious, wrote last week to the Times:—

> Wheat got good hold, tillered well, and up to the end of April looked very promising. May brought us cold north and east winds, and although upon first-class land wheat still maintains a vigorous appearance, yet upon middling and strong undrained clays the cold weather has told very injuriously, and changed the colour of the plant from a pleasant healthy green into a sickly yellow. It is, of course, too early to form a precise opinion about the wheat harvest; but two points may be regarded as tolerably certain—there cannot be an early harvest, and the crop on the average cannot be a great one.

We think Mr. Turner is pretty near the truth this time, for although there appears generally to be abundance of plant upon the ground, yet it can scarcely be doubted that, as the season advances and the ears are displayed, it will be discovered that the cold, ungenial weather of the month of May has checked their healthy development, and that they have not attained the size necessary to the production of a large crop. If there should be a warm forcing June it will be interesting to observe whether the ears which were formed under the protection of the envelope in one of the coldest of Mays can avoid that stunting of growth which it is natural to expect. If they do attain to their natural size the crop may be expected to be above an average per acre, because the "plant" is regular, and even thick. This regularity of plant would compensate even for a slight deficiency in the heads, and thus, even if there were a slight deficiency in the ears, we may expect an average crop per acre. To arrive at the whole result of the crop something must be known of the acreage. Mr. James Sanderson helps us on this point. He says:—

> The excess of area under wheat last year, which alone yielded one-tenth of our average produce, will probably be reproduced this year. Under ordinary circumstances, and according to the principles of a rotation system of cropping, a large area under one description of crop cannot occur two years in succession. The failure of seeds, however, forced farmers to sow wheat on a large area of land that had thus failed. The failure of the root crops also added a large breadth to the wheat area, as farmers in many instances ploughed up the turnip failed fallows, and sowed wheat on land which would otherwise have been seeded with barley.

If this estimate be correct, and if the yield per acre be an average, the crop will be ten per cent. above an average; and even if there be a slight deficiency in the yield per acre, we may still look for an average crop of wheat. These are the data which must guide us to the formation of an opinion as to the future price of wheat, for so far it is too early to gather trustworthy information as to the crops of any foreign country which influences our markets. It may, however, be remarked that while the reports from the South of Spain promise a harvest of unusual abundance, those from the South of France complain of the unpropitious blooming time.

The first point to be considered is whether we have abundance to feed the country until the new harvest shall be available. As to this there can be no question. We started with a large crop in measure, still larger if estimated by weight, producing a very large percentage of flour on account of the fineness of the skin of the grain, and there was an extra acreage of ten per cent. Our importations have been on a large scale, reckoning from September 1, at the rate of 7¾ million of quarters per annum, the quantity required, according to Mr. Caird, being only 6,800,000 quarters of wheat and flour. These imports have gone into consumption because no large stocks remain, and as from universal testimony the consumption of bread has been small, it follows that a considerable quantity must remain in growers' hands. It is to be noted, on the other hand, that thirteen months' consumption have to be provided for (and were provided for in Mr. Caird's estimate), as we began on the new crop a month earlier than usual, and the next crop will not be ready before the average time. There is no reason to expect a lack of importations, for although there is but a small quantity likely to come from the Mediterranean or Black Seas, America is shipping freely on the Atlantic side, and the Baltic is in the full activity of its shipping season; and thus sufficient supplies of our home and of foreign produce to meet the demand may be expected in our markets between this time and the end of August. Apart from any anxieties as to the safety of the coming crop, there appears to be no justification for an advance in prices. As to the course of markets after the ingathering of the new crop, that depends on what it may yield, and that no man knoweth. The whole question is one of weather. There is no reason to be found in the present appearance of the plant, why it should not turn out an average crop, though it seems probable, from the check it has received and from its apparent lack of vigour, that it will not be a great one. Spring-sown crops it is too soon to speak of; suffice it to say that they do not suffer very much from moisture or low temperature at this early stage of their growth. Winter beans are in bloom, and promise abundance. The meadows are very promising for a good hay crop, and graziers have every reason to be contented with the progress of their stock. It is not, however, likely that there will be any fall from the present high prices of meat until the young animals shall have reached that early state of maturity which in these days fits them for the butcher. During the winter all lean stock was so determinedly got rid of and killed when producing perhaps 25 per cent. less weight of meat than usual, that there are now very few full-grown frames ready to be covered with meat. We have to grow the frames, as well as cover them with meat. So that, while the animals are growing, we must still pay dearly for the few that are ready, on account of the scarcity. In the same way, pigs were not fed or bred last year, and consequently bacon still fetches a high price, from the small supply. Pig food has fallen 30 per cent. in value; there is a large profit on fatting pigs, instead of the heavy loss of last year; and by the fall of the year we may expect to buy our bacon cheaper. Abundance of pasturage should give plenty of butter and cheese, and bring down the extravagant prices of those articles. Thus, while with fine weather it appears certain that the present moderate prices for bread will continue, it also appears certain that a considerable reduction will take place in the values of beef, mutton, and bacon.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

IV.

THE present Exhibition gives palpable proof of the change which for some little time has been coming over our English school of painting. Within comparatively few years we have seen a succession of art phases of which the traits are still patent in the leading features of the Exhibition. First, the old and conventional style to which painters were wedded twenty years ago is scarcely yet extinct. Then we may observe, not without satisfaction, that the reaction or revolt designated "Pre-Raffaellite" has left its marks both within and without the Academy. And now we witness yet another of the transformations that happen periodically in the history of art, under laws which out of things old re-fashion forms new. Thus this hundred-and-first Exhibition brings us into the presence of fresh developments; we see that Pre-Raffaellite elaboration, grown painfully wearisome, is giving place to breadth and generalization; we find that our artists, instead of bending in blind devotion to the early painters of Italy, are ready to surrender themselves rapturously to Titian and other masters of the romantic Renaissance; finally, we observe that the mediævalism which threatened to take possession of the English school is giving way to classicism, and accordingly we mark for better and for worse a tendency to exchange naturalism for idealism, to substitute individual forms for generic types, to surrender styles which were illusive to the eye in favour of treatments which appeal to the imagination. We will now proceed to examine some leading examples of the new school, contributed by Mr. Watts, R.A., Mr. Leighton, R.A., Mr. Simeon Solomon, Mr. Albert Moore, and others.

The Academy is this year doubtless all the more pronounced on the side of classic form and Venetian colour because the hanging has been virtually committed to the school of Holland Park. Mr. Watts and Mr. Leighton, while showing themselves superior to selfish interests, have given proof that they are zealous partisans of their own principles and party. We believe them to have been at once scrupulously honest and unintentionally unjust; yet we scarcely know how to quarrel with what they have done, because we happen to admire the result. Mr. Watts contributes four pictures—"The Return of the Dove," "The Red Cross Knight and Una," "A Portrait," and "Orpheus and Eurydice." The first and last give best manifestation of the artist's genius. In the last the painter has seized upon the moment in the well-known legend when Orpheus, having redeemed his wife from torment by the spell of his lyre, beholds her caught back into the infernal regions. Anguish almost more than that which mortals suffer gives intensity to the scene; the composition is studious of accordant lines; the colour is emphatically Titianesque, only the objection may be raised that this is Venetian colour stained and blackened by three hundred years. Mr. Watts falls into a common error; in emulating the Old Masters he takes as his guide old pictures, forgetting that Titian painted, not what was old and time-subdued, but what was new and bright as the morning and living as actual nature. Turning to another poetic creation by the same painter, the eye rests on that solitary dove, weary of wing, wending her way across the waste of waters to the far-off home in the ark, her only refuge. The artist awakens interest in the fate of the poor bird, the spectator thinks of her long search from early morn to close of day; the dove is ready to drop into the sea that covers the earth, and there is no help in the silence and solitude. This suggestion of thought shows what power is obtained over the imagination even by materials the most scanty. Yet, as is often the case with this painter, the idea is the picture, for the execution barely suffices to give expression to the conception. Mr. Watts is strong in the act of creation, but weak and possibly hasty in hand, as if impatient of finish; content, evidently, to leave his picture while yet halting in the stage of grand suggestion. The artist takes us back to the generic style and the intellectual mode of study extolled by Reynolds. In the eleventh discourse we read, "The great business of study is to form a mind adapted and adequate to all times and all occasions; to which all nature is then laid open, and which may be said to possess the key of her inexhaustible riches."

Mr. Frederick Leighton, R.A., has, it is well known, matured an academic and eclectic style which presents points of approach to, yet of divergence from, the manner just described as characteristic of Mr. Watts. There are no painters among us better versed in historic precedents, none more intent on transfusing the principles and practice of the great schools into our modern phases of art. That either of them is absolutely successful it were of course absurd to pretend. Still, in Mr. Leighton's four contributions—"St. Jerome," "Dædalus and Icarus," "Electra at the Tomb of Agamemnon," and "Helios and Rhodus"—every mind at all prepared to receive themes removed from the routine of ordinary life will gladly welcome scholarly thought, classic form, and academic treatment. "Dædalus and Icarus" may be likened to a Greek cameo, so pure is the form, so clear the outline; yet the figure of Dædalus [illegible]

[illegible] pery is after classic types, while the repose preserved, even in agony, is entirely consonant with the spirit of Greek art. "Helios and Rhodus" softens into more expressly pictorial and romantic styles; the nude, treated with refined voluptuousness, is carried rather far, yet kept within permissible limits by delicacy and subtlety in outline and modelling. Such are the merits for which these works may be commended, yet, on the other hand, the defects are scarcely less apparent. It cannot but be felt that the forms are frequently so subtilized as to be refined away, and lost to breadth, decision, power. Classic artists, whether sculptors or painters, took care, by firm line, salient point, and sharp decisive shadow, to pronounce their figures boldly. These characteristics of the grand style become of still more importance now that the increased dimensions of the new building throw figures into greater distance. We cannot but think that even the "St. Jerome," Mr. Leighton's "Diploma work," grand though it is, would be better for more decision and force in the outline. And here we may proceed to remark upon the contrast between the otherwise allied styles of Mr. Leighton and Mr. Watts. Mr. Watts is a colourist, whereas Mr. Leighton, however much colour he may use, misses the harmonies, at least in the Venetian sense. Thus the "St. Jerome" would seem to be painted in emulation of Titian; but we feel the want of Titianesque blue, and of those moderating cool tones which in Venetian pictures are specially delicious. As to management of colour and the use of texture, it is curious to observe upon what totally different principles Mr. Leighton and Mr. Millais paint. Mr. Leighton eschews textures, he scarcely permits himself a reflected light or colour; and the law of complementary contrast in shadow, recognised by the painters of Pompeii, by the Roman school of Raffaelle, and especially by Veronese in Venice, would seem to involve a decorative treatment irreconcilable with Mr. Leighton's mode of procedure. Yet our English Academician gains high and rare results; art is a surrender and a compromise; to unite brilliant colour with pure form has always proved an impossibility, even to Tintoret. It is but right to make great allowance for the injury inflicted upon these works in the hanging. Mr. Leighton, himself one of the hangers, has, with oblivious generosity, excessive yet above all praise, committed, as it were, a species of art suicide.

Classic styles are rising, as we have said, into the ascendant. Thus, with Mr. Leighton and Mr. Watts may be associated Mr. Solomon, Mr. Sandys, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Stanhope, Mr. Albert Moore, and Mr. H. Wallis. The "Toilette of a Roman Lady," by Mr. Simeon Solomon, comes as yet another sign of prevailing classic proclivities. The artist has evidently caught the manner of ancient Rome, as manifest in the mural paintings of Pompeii, even to the swelling throat, the majestic bearing, and noble type of countenance. Accordingly, though the colour may approach the decorative, the general style reaches a certain monumental dignity, immobility, and massiveness. Yet, judged historically, the picture allies itself to a period of decadence; the artist, however, has evidently striven to render his treatment acceptable to modern tastes. The picture attains, as we have indicated, to considerable grandeur, and the colour approaches splendour. Another happy result of this reversion to the classic is Mr. Poynter's "Proserpine," in the act of gathering flowers, according to traditional story. The artist here turns a poetic myth to modern uses; the treatment has none of the severity of ancient art, but much of the persuasive charm pertaining to romantic schools. We may, in passing, call attention to another illustration, somewhat extravagant, of the same story, "The Rape of Proserpine," by Mr. Stanhope. Mr. Sandys will, we should suppose, find it hard to reconcile an English public to "Medea," though this time the Hanging Committee has been induced to reverse the verdict by which this abnormal picture was excluded a year ago. The style is wholly exceptional; its merits may possibly be unexampled, but to the uninitiated the flesh would seem waxy and the expression spasmodic. Too spasmodic, also, especially for the nude, is "Andromeda," by Mr. Calthrop; repose, we have been taught, is essential to classic treatment. Other artists there are who follow a like bent. Thus, by the law of reactions, or of contraries, whereby Pre-Raffaelitism has flown to the opposite pole of classicism, Mr. H. Wallis, who of yore found sufficing grandeur in a "Dead Stonebreaker," now courts romantic beauty, even in the classic story of "Marsyas." Strange to say, the artist in this last consummation is lost to nature, and he would seem to seek compensation in colour. We may complete this somewhat lengthy list with a couple of works by Mr. Albert Moore. The "Venus," by this artist, is assuredly a novelty. Other Venuses may have erred on the side of being over alluring; this, on the contrary, if it has a fault, is only somewhat too repulsive. The best part is the torso, taken apparently from the Venus of Milo. The general manner is hard and crude, with this advantage, however, that like tempera and fresco, the artist gains by his method light and force, especially at a distance. By the same artist, "A Quartet," or "A Painter's Tribute to the Art of Music, A.D. 1868," deserves notice as a further [illegible] ultra sign of the times. This assuredly is a "tribute" passing strange; the first violin is all but nude, and the protection sought by another performer to his unclad torso and extremities is not the prescriptive and somewhat scanty fig-leaf, but an ample violoncello of noblest dimensions. Such draperies as seem permitted to this choice assembly are eminently diaphanous, with the strange disadvantage of revealing charms disagreeable to discover. Yet at least one figure may be extolled for classic symmetry and dignity. The artist, in common with certain of his brethren, has caught the merits with the attendant defects of the late Roman manner, as seen in Pompeii. The perversity is strange which often drives painters, not to the simple and pure, but to the most ultra and corrupt manifestations of the school they happen to affect. The classic mania which has set in has not yet reached its height; more alarming examples may be looked for.

Classic styles find, of course, numerous and strong opponents, partly from the followers of romance, and in part from such painters as may pay at least occasional devotion to religious art. Mr. Herbert, R.A., has strong claims to respect, though his somewhat hard, dry style may seldom warm to ardour. This studious Academician, with a son who follows in his footsteps, paints with literal truth, both as to detail and atmospheric effect, desert tracts of sand and of arid rock, such as may be seen in that faithful and brilliant picture "Gazelle Hunters of North Africa." Yet we prize Mr. Herbert most when he dedicates his serious, but somewhat severe, style to such themes as that of "Mary Magdalen, on the Day of Crucifixion, at the Tomb of our Lord." The head is bowed, the hands are clasped; there is the wasting away of watching, the agony of despair. Perhaps even the abstinence of colour is best in keeping with the desolation of soul; the face is blanched, and, after long hours of weeping, tears have ceased to flow. Mr. Herbert's mode of painting is peculiar to himself—it is thin even to poverty; yet in this picture deep expression reconciles us even to technical defects. Opposed, as we have seen, to the classicists, are not only religious painters like Mr. Herbert, but the followers of mediæval and romantic styles, such as Mr. Donaldson, Mr. Poole, and Sir Noel Paton. Mr. Poole, as we have already said, treats the Biblical story of "The Prodigal Son" after a picturesque manner. The painter is still more at home in the romantic, though by this time hackneied, scene, "Lorenzo and Jessica at Belmont." Mr. Poole usually puts subjects together with dramatic show and significance; moonlight spangled by stars is an effect here managed almost as poetically as in the dioramas formerly seen in the Regent's Park. Yet the intention is better than the execution. Sir Noel Paton, too, is a poet, save when he goes astray, as in following after

"Caliban." A figure thus abhorrent to nature and to art ought never to have been put on canvas. Even the realism, though inimitable after its kind, is unpleasing by reason of feeble polish and endless triviality; the colour, too, is wholly opposed to the scale adopted by the schools most esteemed. Finally, as representative of that ultra school of mediævalism which stands opposed to classic as well as to romantic styles, comes Mr. Donaldson, who is fortunate to obtain admission for two of his eminently anti-naturalistic compositions; the one "Vespers," the other "Music during a Banquet." The fatal faults of this artist—want of form and truth to nature—are too well known to need reiteration. Yet, especially in the last of these works, we recognise traits which often attach to mediæval revivals—rich harmonies in colour, intense expression, and mysteries unfathomable, which, when not absolutely ridiculous, may possibly be grand.

Twenty years ago Mr. Millais and Mr. Holman Hunt were as brethren passing together through the purgatory of Pre-Raffaelitism; how much of dross and how much of refined gold remains to themselves, or rather to their art, may be judged by the works they now severally contribute to the Academy. "The Birthday" and the "Portrait of a Lady," by Mr. Holman Hunt, are pictures of a style which some might think would be improved by still further refining through "purging fires." Yet "The Birthday" is a work of amazing power; the lady bears presents in her hand mournfully, as under the burden of sad thought and the shadow of dark misgiving. Why the figure should be so far removed from beauty we cannot say, especially as we may suppose that the artist could easily have added to the lady's charms had he desired thus to augment the interest of the spectator in her story. We fancy, however, as we turn to a certain volume, Art and Poetry, "conducted principally by artists" of a peculiar way of thinking, that it becomes evident that ugliness formed part of the creed of the distinguished brotherhood whereof Mr. Holman Hunt is all but the last survivor. Thus peculiar interest attaches to "The Birthday" as a specimen of a school, and as an index to mental idiosyncrasies which certainly have proved themselves close upon genius. In this figure the mental expression is profound, the colour intense, the realism forcible. On the whole, however, the art may be said to be more repellent than enticing. Now just the opposite is true of the manner of Mr. Millais, a painter who long since forsook his early devotion to ugliness in favour of a beauty which the world at large is able to appreciate. The artist has been ill, and therefore the six works before us—two being small water-colours—are, in size at least, of less than usual importance.

colour-box might have been upset upon the canvas, yet it is consummate in art treatment, refulgent, transparent, but solid. Perhaps, for the painting of flesh, Mr. Millais is without rival; his pigments are more pure and liquid than those of Mr. Watts. "Nina" is a little too négligée in attitude, even for a child; but here, again, how consummate is the art for texture, transparency, dexterity, and what affluence of colour has been thrown into a background which seems to catch the subdued and balanced splendour of Oriental decoration. These triumphant powers are fitly moderated in "The Gambler's Wife," a work of touching tenderness which, with true taste and much pathos, combines technical qualities found more frequently in Continental than in British galleries. Mr. Millais, for colour and for touch, may be called the Veronese of our English school, though in composition he has never shown resource comparable with the exuberant Venetian.

We have directed attention to three distinctive phases presented by the Academy of the year. We have seen certain of our artists in the act of assuming classic styles, combining generic or ideal types with consonant elevation in treatment. We have marked others still addicted to mediævalism, seeking profound expression, stiff attitude, and colour deep in harmony as an old tapestry. We have also encountered painters of romantic proclivities, sensitive to sentiment, redolent in fancy, decorative in colour, and altogether musical. Thus, whatever may be the shortcomings of our English school—and they are many—at all events it continues to maintain national independence, and to give proof of abundant variety.

RACING AT EPSOM.

IT was bad luck for Sir Joseph Hawley, after having lost the Derby by a couple of inches, to lose the Oaks by the fearful state of the ground, to which we fancy Morna's defeat is attributable. The ladies' day at Epsom was, indeed, the most miserable that could be conceived. The rain fell incessantly; the course was very heavy, and for the last fifty yards was little better than a quagmire. Morna had been so highly tried that, after Pero Gomez's running in the Derby, her owner and trainer regarded her success in the Oaks as a matter of certainty. Had the race been run on the Wednesday instead of the Friday she would undoubtedly have won; but, as it was, after making the whole of the running, she literally and truly stuck in the mud at the finish, and could scarcely keep on her legs. There were fifteen runners, or six more than last year, and seven more than in 1867, but some of them must have been started on the chance of the favourites tumbling down in the dirt. With few exceptions the field was of most moderate quality, added to which the loss of form, so common to fillies at this season of the year, materially diminished the interest of the race. Year by year it is becoming more and more apparent that the spring is not the season for the great filly contest; and it would be an excellent piece of Turf reform if the Oaks should be postponed till the autumn, and be run at Newmarket, over the last mile and a half of the Cesarewitch course. The fifteen runners this year were Scottish Queen (the winner of the One Thousand), Morna and Brigantine (respectively second and third in the same race), Martinique, Toison d'Or, Miss Foote, Curieuse, Dryad, Crocus, Minaret, Teeswater, and four more whom we need not trouble ourselves to mention. Of these Brigantine was the best public performer as a two-year-old, but it was understood that her wind was affected, which is a fatal bar to success over the Derby course. She looked, however, uncommonly well, and having quite recovered from the slight ailment from which she was suffering at Newmarket, her friends were sanguine that she would avenge her defeat there. Of Scottish Queen's roaring there was not the shadow of a doubt, and it was only the extreme easiness of the Ditch mile that enabled her to win the One Thousand. Fit and well as she was, it was almost certain that, like Belladrum in the Derby, the first hill would be sufficient to stop her, while the moist and muggy atmosphere and the heavy going were additional impediments in her way. Morna was as perfectly trained as Porter's horses usually are, but she is rather deficient in substance, and strength was wanted this day, as well as quality, to struggle through the tenacious mud at the finish. Martinique was the most improved filly in the early part of the season, but she went amiss suddenly just before the One Thousand, and the time that has elapsed since seemed scarcely sufficient for her to have regained her form. Crocus, on the contrary, had made immense improvement during the month. At Newmarket she looked a mere scarecrow, and her coat was as rough as a Scotch terrier's, but now her appearance was altogether different. The others scarcely deserve separate mention. Dryad was decorated with a hood and blinkers, and partook of a bottle of spirits—whisky, we believe—before the race; but a jade will always be a jade, and we have little faith in either blinkers or whisky. Besides, on her public running she had no pretensions to take a prominent part in the race. Brigantine, for instance, gave her 10 lbs. last autumn over the Rowley mile, and beat her by two lengths; yet, at that very time, Brigantine's wind was known to be affected. Curieuse and Miss Foote are known as speedy animals over short distances, and Minaret looks built for coming in last—a position for which, in any important race, she might be not imprudently supported. The canters were speedily got over, and Martinique, Morna, Brigantine, and Crocus were all more or less admired. The first in particular is a mare of beautiful action. There was fortunately little delay at the post, the flag falling after one false start, and the story of the race is soon told. Morna made all the running; Scottish Queen was beaten just like Belladrum at the top of the hill, and though she did not give up so utterly as he did, she was out of the race, as far as winning or being in the first three was concerned, a long way before Tattenham Corner. On entering the straight Morna, Brigantine, Martinique, Crocus, and Teeswater were the only ones left with a chance, and, the first two drawing away, the issue became a match between them. Up to the Stand, Morna had considerably the best of the struggle, but there the deepest dirt began, and then Brigantine came out, and, Beadsman's daughter being quite unable to work her way through the mire, the daughter of Buccaneer passed her and won, easily at the last, by two lengths. Martinique, six lengths from the second, ran into third place, but only by a neck from Crocus, whose forward position testified to the improvement she must have made since the One Thousand. It is, we should fancy, a curious fact in equine history, that an animal should so completely recover from a serious affection of the throat as to be able to compass the Derby course, under the most unpropitious circumstances of weather and of going, with such success. There is no doubt that Brigantine "made a noise" last autumn; but we are informed that her malady suddenly left her during the winter, and that she is now perfectly sound.

The Epsom programme was this year materially strengthened by the generous liberality of Mr. Studd, whose firmness in compelling the directors of the Grand Stand Association to part with a portion of the money of which they relieve the public, and whose disinterestedness in applying the greater part of the sum thus gained to the improvement of the week's sport, cannot be sufficiently commended. Mr. Studd gives twelve hundred and fifty pounds—seven hundred and fifty to the Walton Manor Stakes, and five hundred to the Six Mile Hill Handicap. The penalties and allowances in the former race make it partake of the nature of a handicap; otherwise, in the present degenerate state of the Turf, it would be impossible to ensure a contest even for so valuable a stake. The distance is the last mile and a quarter of the Derby course, and all the best horses of the day were entered; but, from various circumstances, only eight came to the post. Blue Gown is taking a well-deserved rest, and Knight of the Garter has at last succumbed, for the present, to the effects of the work he has done in the early months of the year. Some horses were reserved for the other race enriched by Mr. Studd's bounty, and some were going to start in the Derby. Hence, despite the value of the stakes, it so happened that the field dwindled down to eight. These were Trocadero, Vagabond, who took all the allowances, both as never having won and as a gelding, Rupert, the dark hope of Newmarket, Lumley, Vespasian, See-Saw, Leontes (better known as the colt by Tim Whiffler, out of Hermione), and one of the Young Melbourne fillies, out of Maid of Masham, bequeathed by Lord Glasgow to Mr. Payne. The conditions of the race were purposely framed to prevent it from becoming a certainty for any distinguished winner; for though nominally, the horses were to carry weight for age, yet a Derby or St. Leger winner would be penalized 14 lbs., a winner of a stakes of 2,000 sovs. would have to carry 10 lbs. or of 400 sovs. 7 lbs. extra, while maidens were allowed 7 lbs. and geldings 3 lbs. Thus Vagabond, though of the same age as Lumley, received from him 17 lbs.; and Blue Gown, had he run would have had to carry 10 st. Accordingly, as in the Middle Park Plate, the conditions were all in favour of the animals receiving allowances, as the days of weight-carriers have nearly passed. If Vagabond had run up to his private form, or even up to the public form he showed for a mile and a half in the Metropolitan Handicap, the race must have been at his mercy; but he is the most arrant cur that ever disappointed an owner or trainer and though he came sailing up the straight with a clear lead, and might have had everything beaten at the distance, he refused to move a yard when called upon, and appeared more inclined to jump over the rails than to pass the winning-post. Consequently he allowed himself to be beaten by Trocadero, a good, honest, wear-and-tear horse, who was unpenalized, although he must have won many stakes on the Continent of the value of a thousand pounds or upwards. Rupert made his début in this race. We noticed last week how prominently he ran in the Derby, and certainly, if he had been properly ridden, he would have been successful on the day before. When lying pretty well up with his horses, he was suddenly pulled back into the extreme rear, and then, when seemingly out of the race, was sent out again at the last moment, and made up an immense deal of ground, finishing third. Any one can imagine how difficult it is for a big unfurnished horse to recover himself, after having been once pulled out of his stride; but when we saw him come again, pass his horses one by one, and finish full of running, we felt convinced that there was the making of a racehorse in him. With health and a better rider, Rupert will distinguish himself next year over a long course. Far better, in point of numbers, was the field for the Six Mile Hill Handicap, for which nineteen started, including Hermit, Martyrdom, Trocadero (with 7 lbs. extra), and The Ægean. The remainder were of not more than average handicap ability, and Nine Elms, 5 yrs., 6 st. 10 lbs., the most favoured of all, secured an easy victory from Martyrdom, nothing else being near the pair. It appears as if Hermit, the luckiest Derby winner of modern times, would never again win so much as a fifty-pound plate. Though the speculative aspects of racing are out of our province, we may mention, as a curious fact, that out of nineteen runners not one could be selected as favourite; but this does not say much for their goodness.

There was little else during the week that claims remark except the two-year-old racing. The Woodcote is the first important two-year-old race of the season, and it will be remembered that last year Mr. Merry won it with Belladrum, who forthwith was elevated to a position among the Derby aspirants, which he held for nearly nine months. This year the race again fell to Mr. Merry, by the aid of Sunshine, a very light bay filly by Thormanby, out of Sunbeam, who beat her nineteen antagonists with consummate ease. She is not exactly a beauty, for her colour is somewhat against her, but she is finely framed, and with plenty of room for growth. She ran rather raw, and had to be roused up at the finish, but when once called upon, she raced away and won in a canter. Mr. Merry's good luck with his two-year-olds is as remarkable as his bad luck with his three-year-olds. We do not fancy that the field behind Sunshine was as good as that behind Belladrum last year; but still there were several—Mahonia, for instance, Elsham, and Bruce—who will much improve on their performance last week. Mr. Graham had nothing running, and we must wait awhile before attempting to judge of the relative merits of the leading two-year-olds. Pâté beat Guy Dayrell and Roquefort on the Thursday, because the distance exactly suited her, and Roquefort beat Pâté in return on the Friday, partly because the distance, three-quarters of a mile, was more suited to him, and partly because on such heavy ground it was impossible to expect the filly to give him 10 lbs. Pâté is a brilliant half-miler, but Roquefort, we are inclined to think, will prove a good horse over any considerable distance. Elferon ran more than once during the week, but is quite done up already by constant work.

Quite a panic was created on Monday by the propagation of a report that Mr. Sadler, the nominator of Pretender for the Derby, had died before the day of that race. His friends displayed an unwonted anxiety as to his bodily health, and the telegraph-wires were occupied during an entire morning by messages from Jones, London, to Sadler, Doncaster—"Are you alive?"—to which Sadler, Doncaster, replied with pardonable tautology—"I am quite well, and in good health." The fact is that if Sadler, Doncaster, had been removed from this world before May 26th, or even at five minutes to three on the afternoon of that day, Pretender would have been disqualified for the Derby, and the stakes and bets would have been paid to the owner and backers of Pero Gomez. Hence this strange exhibition of humanity on the part of the frequenters of Tattersall's. The rule that a nomination for the Derby should become void by the death of the nominator is so obviously unreasonable, that it will probably be abrogated at no distant time. The purchaser takes on himself all liabilities to which his purchase may be subject; he ought, therefore, in all justice, to acquire all the privileges also.

At the meeting of the Jockey Club, at the end of last week, Sir Joseph Hawley and Mr. Chaplin brought forward their resolutions on the subject of two-year-old racing. They had previously recommended them to the public judgment in a very able and argumentative letter published in the leading daily and sporting papers. They showed that though there are twice as many foals now as in 1843, and though the country is covered with a network of railways, the number of runners has not proportionately increased, but that there are four times as many two-year-old runners, six times as many short races, and only half as many races of two miles and over. While not disposed to believe that the breed of horses has degenerated at present, they expressed themselves as convinced that, if the present system should be persisted in for twenty years more, the degeneration so often prophesied would be surely effected. On these grounds they urged that no two-year-olds should be allowed to run before the 1st of July. Lord Derby was not present at the meeting, but addressed a letter to Sir Joseph Hawley giving his cordial approval to the proposed alteration. But Lord Derby went far deeper into the question of the evils that are threatening the very existence of the Turf as a national institution, and showed most convincingly that, bad as the early racing of two-year-olds is, it is only one of many Turf vices:—

> I take it that the deterioration of the Turf in public estimation, of which there is no doubt, is mainly owing to the fact that the majority of horses are now in the possession of men who run for profit and not for sport, who care nothing for the animal horse, who cannot afford to wait for a return of their money, but who, in the language of the Manchester school, prefer "a nimble ninepence to a slow shilling," and in whose hands a wretched animal, especially if not quite so wretched as he is thought, is as valuable as one of a high class, if not more so.

If these words are true, of which we have no doubt, we cannot be surprised at the non-acceptance of Sir J. Hawley's resolutions. Nay, more; we are surprised rather that even so limited a reform as the abolition of two-year-old racing before the 1st of May was adopted by a body so much interested in the retention of the present system. For Lord Derby's words apply unfortunately to many members of the Jockey Club as much as to many less distinguished owners of racehorses. Let any one look through the roll of the Club, and judge for himself. Some of its members, like Lord Derby, are in dignified retirement; some are in retirement by no means dignified. Of the thirty members whose colours are seen more or less frequently on race-courses, twenty at least are men who cannot afford to keep large studs without taking every legitimate means for getting their expenses back. Probably the three richest men on the Turf, after Baron Rothschild, are Mr. Naylor, Mr. Jardine, and Mr. Merry; and not one of the three is admitted into a Club on whose list names which there is unfortunately no occasion to specify are permitted to remain. It is scarcely likely that a body so constituted, among the active members of which wealth is almost the exception, and poverty or something worse than poverty almost the rule, should consent to a change the first result of which would be to increase considerably the expenses of a stud, to postpone the profits, and to make the competition for those profits more severe, and thus the chances of obtaining them more uncertain. Excellent as were Sir Joseph Hawley's resolutions in theory and spirit, it appears to us that he and Mr. Chaplin attempted to put the cart before the horse. Before we can hope to see the breed of horses improved, the breed of owners must be improved. Before the Jockey Club can reform the Turf, it must reform itself. Lord Derby pleaded his long and total retirement from the Turf as an excuse for not attending the meeting of the Jockey Club; but it strikes us that there are members of that Club whom he might not wish to meet. When merit, as well as birth, is considered in the selection or rejection of candidates for seats in the Supreme Council of the Turf, and when commoners who lavish thousands on racing are not superciliously excluded from it on account of their supposed connexion with commerce, better days may come. A better class of owners will be attracted to the Turf—men of substance, and not men of straw, men who will study the interests of their horses as well as of themselves, and who will use them otherwise than as mere instruments of gaming. It will not then be a matter of reproach that so many of our racehorses are in the hands of reckless spendthrifts, bill-discounters, publicans, and, for the matter of that, sinners too.

REVIEWS.

NEWMAN'S PAROCHIAL SERMONS.*

DR. NEWMAN'S Sermons stand by themselves in modern English literature; it might be said, in English literature generally. There have been equally great masterpieces of English writing in this form of composition, and there have been preachers whose theological depth, acquaintance with the heart, earnestness, tenderness, and power have not been inferior to his. But the great writers do not touch, pierce, and get hold of minds as he does, and those who are famous for the power and results of their preaching do not write as he does. His sermons have done more perhaps than any one thing to mould and quicken and brace the religious temper of our time; they have acted with equal force on those who were nearest and on those who were furthest from him in theological opinion. They have altered the whole manner of feeling towards religious subjects. We know now that they were the beginning, the signal and first heave, of a vast change that was to come over the subject; of a demand from religion of a thorough-going reality of meaning and fulfilment, which is familiar to us, but was new when it was first made. And, being this, these sermons are also among the very finest examples of what the English language of our day has done in the hands of a master. Sermons of such intense conviction and directness of purpose, combined with such originality and perfection on their purely literary side, are rare everywhere. Remarkable instances, of course, will occur to every one of the occasional exhibition of this combination, but not in so sustained and varied and unfailing a way. Between Dr. Newman and the great French school there is this difference—that they are orators, and he is as far as anything can be in a great preacher from an orator. Those who remember the tones and the voice in which the sermons were heard at St. Mary's—we may refer to Professor Shairp's striking account in his volume on Keble, and to a recent article in the Dublin Review—can remember how utterly unlike an orator in all outward ways was the speaker who so strangely moved them. The notion of judging of Dr. Newman as an orator never crossed their minds. And this puts a difference between him and a remarkable person whose name has sometimes been joined with his—Mr. F. Robertson. Mr. Robertson was a great preacher, but he was not a writer.

It is difficult to realize at present the effect produced originally by these sermons. The first feeling was that of the difference in manner from the customary sermon. People knew what an eloquent sermon was, or a learned sermon, or a philosophical sermon, or a sermon full of doctrine or pious unction. Chalmers and Edward Irving and Robert Hall were familiar names; the University pulpit and some of the London churches had produced examples of forcible argument and severe and finished composition; and of course instances were abundant everywhere of the good, sensible, commonplace discourse; of all that was heavy, dull, and dry, and of all that was ignorant, wild, fanatical, and irrational. But no one seemed to be able, or to be expected, unless he avowedly took the buffoonery line which some of the Evangelical preachers affected, to speak in the pulpit with the directness and straightforward unconventionality with which men speak on the practical business of life. With all the thought and vigour and many beauties which were in the best sermons, there was always something forced, formal, artificial about them, something akin to that mild pomp which usually attended their delivery, with beadles in gowns ushering the preacher to the carpeted pulpit steps, with velvet cushions, and with the rustle and fulness of his robes. No one seemed to think of writing a sermon as he would write an earnest letter. A preacher must approach his subject in a kind of roundabout make-believe of preliminary and preparatory steps, as if he was introducing his hearers to what they had never heard of; make-believe difficulties and objections were overthrown by make-believe answers, an unnatural position both in speaker and hearers, an unreal state of feeling and view of facts, a systematic conventional exaggeration, seemed almost impossible to be avoided; and those who tried to escape being laboured and grandiloquent only escaped it, for the most part, by being vulgar or slovenly. The strong severe thinkers, jealous for accuracy, and loathing clap-trap as they loathed loose argument, addressed and influenced intelligence; but sermons are meant for heart and souls as well as minds, and to the heart, with its trials and its burdens, men like Whately never found their way. Those who remember the preaching of those days, before it began to be influenced by the sermons at St. Mary's, will call to mind much that was interesting, much that was ingenious, much correction of inaccurate and confused views, much manly encouragement to high principle and duty, much of refined and scholarlike writing. But for soul and warmth, and the imaginative and poetical side of the religious life, you had to go where thought and good sense were not likely to be satisfied. The contrast of Mr. Newman's preaching was not obvious at first. The outside form and look was much that of the regular best Oxford type—calm, clear, and lucid in expression, strong in its grasp, measured in statement, and far too serious to think of rhetorical ornament. But by degrees much more opened. The range of experience from which the preacher drew his materials, and to which he appealed, was something wider, subtler, and more delicate than had been commonly dealt with in sermons. With his strong, easy, exact, elastic language, the instrument of a powerful and argumentative mind, he plunged into the deep realities of the inmost spiritual life, of which cultivated preachers had been shy. He preached so that he made you feel without doubt that it was the most real of worlds to him; he made you feel in time, in spite of yourself, that it was a real world with which you too had concern. He made you feel that he knew what he was speaking about; that his reasonings and appeals, whether you agreed with them or not, were not the language of that heated enthusiasm with which the world is so familiar; that he was speaking words which were the result of intellectual scrutiny, balancings, and decisions, as well as of moral trials, of conflicts and suffering within; words of the utmost soberness belonging to deeply gauged and earnestly formed purposes. The effect of his sermons, as compared with the common run at the time, was something like what happens when in a company you have a number of people giving their views and answers about some question before them. You have opinions given of various worth and expressed with varying power, precision, and distinctness, some clever enough, some clumsy enough, but all more or less imperfect and unattractive in tone, and more or less falling short of their aim; and then, after it all, comes a voice, very grave, very sweet, very sure and clear, under whose words the discussion springs up at once to a higher level, and in which we recognise at once a mind face to face with realities, and able to seize them and hold them fast.

The first notable feature in the external form of this preaching was its terse unceremonious directness. Putting aside the verbiage and dulled circumlocution and stiff hazy phraseology of pulpit etiquette and dignity, it went straight to its point. There was no waste of time about customary formalities. The preacher had something to say, and with a kind of austere severity he proceeded to say it. This, for instance, is the sort of way in which a sermon would begin:—

> Hypocrisy is a serious word. We are accustomed to consider the hypocrite as a hateful, despicable character, and an uncommon one. How is it, then, that our Blessed Lord, when surrounded by an innumerable multitude, began, first of all, to warn His disciples against hypocrisy, as though they were in especial danger of becoming like those base deceivers the Pharisees? Thus an instructive subject is opened to our consideration, which I will now pursue.—Vol I. Serm. x.

The next thing was that, instead of rambling and straggling over a large subject, each sermon seized a single thought, or definite view, or real difficulty or objection, and kept closely and distinctly to it; and at the same time treated it with a largeness and grasp and ease which only a full command over much beyond it could give. Every sermon had a purpose and an end which no one could misunderstand. Singularly devoid of anything like excitement—calm, even, self-controlled—there was something in the preacher's resolute concentrated way of getting hold of a single defined object which reminded you of the rapid spring or unerring swoop of some strong-limbed or swift-winged creature on its quarry. Whatever you might think that he did with it, or even if it seemed to escape from him, you could have no doubt what he sought to do; there was no wavering, confused, uncertain bungling in that powerful and steady hand. Another feature was the character of the writer's English. We have learned to look upon Dr. Newman as one of the half-dozen or so of the innumerable good writers of the time who have fairly left their mark as masters on the language. Little, assuredly, as the writer originally thought of such a result, the sermons have proved a permanent gift to our literature, of the purest English, full of spring, clearness, and force. A hasty reader would perhaps at first only notice a very light, strong, easy touch, and might think, too, that it was a negligent one. But it was not negligence; real negligence means at bottom bad work, and bad work will not stand the trial of time. There are two great styles—the self-conscious, like that of Gibbon or Macaulay, where great success in expression is accompanied by an unceasing and manifest vigilance that expression shall succeed, and where you see at each step that there is or has been much care and work in the mind, if not on the paper, and the unconscious, like that of Pascal or Swift or Hume, where nothing suggests at the moment that the writer is thinking of anything but his subject, and where the power of being able to say just what he wants to say seems to come at the writer's command, without effort, and without his troubling himself more about it than about the way in which he holds his pen. But both are equally the fruit of hard labour and honest persevering self-correction; and it is soon found out whether the apparent negligence comes of loose and slovenly habits of mind, or whether it marks the confidence of one who has mastered his instrument, and can forget himself and let himself go in using it. The free unconstrained movement of Dr. Newman's style tells any one who knows what writing is of a very keen and exact knowledge of the subtle and refined secrets of language. With all that uncared-for play and simplicity, there was a fulness, a richness, a curious delicate music, quite instinctive and unsought for; above all, a precision and sureness of expression which people soon began to find were not within the power of most of those who tried to use language. Such English, graceful with the grace of nerve, flexibility, and power, must always have attracted attention; but it had also an ethical element which was almost inseparable from its literary characteristics. Two things powerfully determined the style of these sermons. One was the intense hold which the vast realities of religion had gained on the writer's mind, and the perfect truth with which his personality sank and faded away before their overwhelming presence; the other was the strong instinctive shrinking, which was one of the most remarkable and certain marks of the beginners of the Oxford movement, from anything like personal display, any conscious aiming at the ornamental and brilliant, any show of gifts or courting of popular applause. Morbid and excessive or not, there can be no doubt of the stern self-containing severity which made them turn away, not only with fear, but with distaste and repugnance, from all that implied distinction or seemed to lead to honour; and the control of this austere spirit is visible, in language as well as matter, in every page of Dr. Newman's sermons.

Indeed, form and matter are clearly connected in the sermons, and depend one on another, as they probably do in all work of a high order. The matter makes and shapes the form with which it clothes itself. The obvious thing which presents itself in reading them is that, from first to last, they are a great systematic attempt to raise the whole level of religious thought and religious life. They carry in them the evidence of a great reaction and a scornful indignant rising up against what were going about and were currently received as adequate ideas of religion. The dryness and primness and meagreness of the common Church preaching, correct as it was in its outlines of doctrine, and sober and temperate in tone, struck cold on a mind which had caught sight, in the New Testament, of the spirit and life of its words. The recoil was even stronger from the shallowness and pretentiousness and self-display of what was popularly accepted as earnest religion; morally the preacher was revolted at its unctuous boasts and pitiful performance, and intellectually by its narrowness and meanness of thought and its thinness of colour in all its pictures of the spiritual life. From first to last, in all manner of ways, the sermons are a protest, first against coldness, but even still more against meanness, in religion. With coldness they have no sympathy, yet coldness may be broad and large and lofty in its aspects, but they have no tolerance for what makes religion little and poor and superficial, for what contracts its horizon and dwarfs its infinite greatness and vulgarizes its mystery. Open the sermons where we will, different readers will rise from them with very different results; there will be among many the strongest and most decisive disagreement, there may be impatience at dogmatic harshness, indignation at what seems overstatement and injustice, rejection of arguments and conclusions, but there will always be the sense of an unfailing nobleness in the way in which the writer thinks and speaks. It is not only that he is in earnest, it is that he has something which really is worth being in earnest for. He placed the heights of religion very high. If you have a religion like Christianity—this is the pervading note—think of it, and have it, worthily. People will differ from the preacher endlessly as to how this is to be secured. But that they will learn this lesson from the sermons, with a force with which few other writers have taught it, and that this lesson has produced its effect in our time, there can be no doubt. The only reason why it may not perhaps seem so striking to readers of this day is that the sermons have done their work, and we do not feel what they had to counteract, because they have succeeded in great measure in counteracting it. It is not too much to say that they have done more than anything else to revolutionize the whole idea of preaching in the English Church. Mr. Robertson, in spite of himself, was as much the pupil of their school as Mr. Liddon, though both are so widely different from their master.

The theology of these sermons is a remarkable feature about them. It is remarkable in this way, that, coming from a teacher like Dr. Newman, it is nevertheless a theology which most religious readers, except the Evangelicals and some of the more extreme Liberal thinkers, can either accept heartily or be content with, as they would be content with St. Augustine or Thomas à Kempis—content, not because they go along with it always, but because it is large and untechnical, just and well-measured in the proportions and relative importance of its parts. People of very different opinions turn to them, as being on the whole the fullest, deepest, most comprehensive approximation they can find to representing Christianity in a practical form. Their theology is nothing new; nor does it essentially change, though one may observe differences, and some important ones, in the course of the volumes, which embrace a period from 1825 to 1842. It is curious, indeed, to observe how early the general character of the sermons was determined, and how in the main it continues the same. Some of the first in point of date are among the "Plain Sermons", and though they may have been subsequently retouched, yet there the keynote is plainly struck of that severe and solemn minor which reigns throughout. Then theology is throughout the accepted English theology of the Prayer-book and the great Church divines—a theology fundamentally dogmatic and sacramental, but jealously keeping the balance between obedience and faith, learned, exact, and measured, but definite and decided. The novelty was in the application of it, in the new life breathed into it, in the profound and intense feelings called forth by its ideas and objects, in the air of vastness and awe thrown about it, in the unexpected connexion of its creeds and mysteries with practical life, in the new meaning given to the old and familiar, in the acceptance in thorough earnest, and with keen purpose to call it into action, of what had been guarded and laid by with dull reverence. Dr. Newman can hardly be called in these sermons an innovator on the understood and recognised standard of Anglican doctrine; he accepted its outlines as Bishop Wilson, for instance, might have traced them. What he did was first to call forth from it what it really meant, the awful heights and depths of its current words and forms; and next, to put beside them human character and its trials, not as they were conventionally represented and written about, but as a piercing eye and sympathizing spirit saw them in the light of our nineteenth century, and in the contradictory and complicated movements, the efforts and failures, of real life. He took theology for granted, as a Christian preacher has a right to do, he does not prove it, and only occasionally meets difficulties, or explains; but, taking it for granted, he took it at its word, in its relation to the world of actual experience.

Utterly dissatisfied with what he found current as religion, Dr. Newman sought, without leaving the old paths, to put before people a strong and energetic religion based, not on feeling or custom, but on reason and conscience; and answering, in the vastness of its range, to the mysteries of human nature, and in its power to man's capacities and aims. The Liberal religion of that day, with its ideas of natural theology or cold critical Unitarianism, was a very shallow one; the Evangelical, trusting to excitement, had worn out its excitement and had reached the stage when its formulas, poor ones at the best, had become words without meaning. Such views might do in quiet, easy-going times, if religion were an exercise at will of imagination or thought, an indulgence, an ornament, an understanding, a fashion; not if it corresponded to such a state of things as is implied in the Bible, or to man's many-sided nature as it is shown in Shakspeare. The sermons reflect with merciless force the popular, superficial, comfortable thing called religion which the writer saw before him wherever he looked, and from which his mind recoiled. Such sermons as those on the "Self-wise Enquirer" and the "Religion of the Day," with its famous passage about the age not being sufficiently "gloomy and fierce in its religion," have the one-sided and unmeasured exaggeration which seems inseparable from all strong expressions of conviction, and from all deep and vehement protests against general faults; but, qualify and limit them as we may, their pictures were not imaginary ones, and there was, and is, but too much to justify them. From all this trifling with religion the sermons called on men to look into themselves. They appealed to conscience; and they appealed equally to reason and thought, to recognise what conscience is, and to deal honestly with it. They viewed religion as it projected on a background of natural and moral mystery, and surrounded by it—an infinite scene, in which our knowledge is like the Andes and Himalaya in comparison with the mass of the earth, and in which conscience is our final guide and arbiter. No one ever brought out so impressively the sense of the impenetrable and tremendous vastness of that amid which man plays his part. In such sermons as those on the "Intermediate State," the "Invisible World," the "Greatness and Littleness of Human Life," the "Individuality of the Soul," the "Mysteriousness of our Present Being," we may see exemplified the enormous irruption into the world of modern thought of the unknown and the unknowable, as much as in the writers who, with far different objects, set against it the clearness and certainty of what we do know. But, beyond all, the sermons appealed to men to go back into their own thoughts and feelings, and there challenged them; were not the preacher's words the echoes and interpreting images of their own deepest, possibly most perplexing and baffling, experience? From first to last this was his great engine and power, from first to last he boldly used it. He claimed to read their hearts; and people felt that he did read them, their follies and their aspirations, the blended and tangled web of earnestness and dishonesty, of wishes for the best and truest, and acquiescence in makeshifts, understating what ordinary preachers make much of, bringing into prominence what they pass by without being able to see or to speak of it, keeping before his hearers the risk of mismanaging their hearts, of "all kinds of unlawful treatment of the soul." What a contrast to ordinary ways of speaking on a familiar theological doctrine is this way of bringing it into immediate relation to real feeling:—

> It is easy to speak of human nature as corrupt in the general, to admit it in the general, and then get quit of the subject, as if, the doctrine being once [illegible]itted, there was nothing more to be done with it. But, in truth, [illegible] [illegible] of the doc[illegible] [illegible]upt[illegible] [illegible] the structure of our minds, part by part, and dwell upon and draw out the [illegible] of our weakness, inconsistency, and ungodliness, which are such as can arise from nothing but some strange original defect in our original nature. [illegible] We are in the dark about ourselves. When we act, we are groping in the dark, and may meet with a fall any moment. Here and there, perhaps, we see a little, or in our attempts to influence and move our minds, we are making experiments (as it were) with some delicate and dangerous instrument, which works we do not know how, and may produce unexpected and [d]isastrous effects. [T]he management of our hearts is quite above u[s]. Under these circumstances [i]t becomes us to look up to God. "Thou, God, seest us." Such was the con[so]lation of the forlorn Hagar in the wilderness. He knoweth whereof we are made, and He alone can uphold us. He sees with most appalling distinctness all our sins, all the windings and recesses of evil within [illegible] only comfort to know this, and to trust Him for help against ourselves.—Vol. i. Serm. xiii.

The preacher contemplates human nature, not in the stiff formal language in which it had become conventional with divines to set out its shortcomings and dangers, but as a great novelist contemplates and tries to describe it; taking in all its real contradictions and anomalies, its subtle and delicate shades; fixing upon the things which strike us in ourselves or our neighbours as ways of acting and marks of character; following it through its wide and varying range, its diversified and hidden folds and subtle self-involving realities of feeling and shiftiness; touching it in all its complex sensibilities, anticipating its dim consciousnesses, half-raising veils which hide what it instinctively shrinks from, sending through it unexpected thrills and shocks; large-hearted in indulgence, yet exacting; most tender, yet most severe. And against all this real play of nature he sets in their full force and depth the great ideas of God, of sin, and of the Cross; and, appealing not to the intelligence of an aristocracy of choice natures, but to the needs and troubles and longings which make all men one, he claimed men's common sympathy for the heroic in purpose and standard. He warned them against being fastidious, where they should be hardy. He spoke in a way that all could understand of brave ventures, of resolutely committing themselves to truth and duty.

The most practical of sermons, the most real and natural in their way of dealing with life and conduct, they are also intensely dogmatic. The writer's whole teaching presupposes, as we all know, a dogmatic religion; and these sermons are perhaps the best vindication of it which our time, disposed to think of dogmas with suspicion, has seen. For they show, on a large scale and in actual working instances, how what is noblest, most elevated, most poetical, most free and searching in a thinker's way of regarding the wonderful scene of life, falls in naturally, and without strain, with a great dogmatic system like that of the Church. Such an example does not prove that system to be true, but it proves that a dogmatic system, as such, is not the cast-iron, arbitrary, artificial thing which it is often assumed to be. It is, indeed, the most shallow of all commonplaces, intelligible in ordinary minds, but unaccountable in those of high power and range, whether they believe or not, that a dogmatic religion is of course a hard, dry, narrow, unreal religion, without any affinities to poetry or the truth of things, or to the deeper and more sacred and powerful of human thoughts. If dogmas are not true, that is another matter; but it is the fashion to imply that dogmas are worthless, mere things of the past, without sense or substance or interest, because they are dogmas. As if Dante was not dogmatic in form and essence; as if the grandest and worthiest religious prose in the English language was not that of Hooker, nourished up amid the subtleties, but also amid the vast horizons and solemn heights, of scholastic divinity. A dogmatic system is hard in hard hands, and shallow in shallow minds, and barren in dull ones, and unreal and empty to pre-occupied and unsympathizing ones; we dwarf and distort ideas that we do not like, and when we have put them in our own shapes and in our own connexion, we call them unmeaning or impossible. Dogmas are bu expedients, common to all great departments of human thought, and felt in all to be necessary, for representing what are believed as truths, for exhibiting their order and consequences, for expressing the meaning of terms, and the relations of thought. If they are wrong, they are, like everything else in the world, open to be proved wrong; if they are inadequate, they are open to correction; but it is idle to sneer at them for being what they must be, if religious facts and truths are to be followed out by the thoughts and expressed by the language of man. And what dogmas are in unfriendly and incapable hands is no proof of what they may be in those who approach them as things instinct with truth and life; it is no measure of the way in which they may be inextricably interwoven with the most unquestionably living thought and feeling, as in th sermons. Jealous, too, as the preacher is for Church doctrines as the springs of Christian life, no writer of our time perhaps ha so emphatically and impressively recalled the narrow limits within which human language can represent Divine realities. No one that we know of shows that he has before his mind with such intense force and distinctness the idea of God; and in proportion as a mind takes in and submits itself to the impression of that awful vision, the gulf widens between all possible human words and that which they attempt to express:—

> When we have deduced what we deduce by our reason for the study visible nature, and then read what [illegible] His [illegible] id, and find the two apparently discordant, this is the [illegible] ng which I think we ought to have in our minds—not an impatience to d[illegible] beyond [illegible] to weigh evidence, sum up, balance, decide, r[illegible] the two voices of God, but a sense of the utt[illegible] as we are, our plain and absolute incapacity t[illegible] mplate things as they really are, a perception of our emptiness before the great vis[illegible] God, of our "comeliness being turned into corruption, and our retaining no strength," a conviction that what is put before us, whether [illegible] nature or in grace, is but an intimation, useful for particular purposes, useful for practice, useful in its department, "until the day break and the shadows flee away", useful in such a way that the one and the othe[illegible] be used, as two languages, as two separate approximations towards the Awful Unknown Truth, such as will not mislead us in their respective provinces—Vol ii Serm. xviii
> "I cannot persuade myself," he says, commenting on a mysterious text of Scripture, "thus to dismiss so solemn a passage" (i.e. by saying that it is "all figurative"). "It seems a presumption to say of dim notices about the unseen world, 'they only mean this or that,' as if one had ascended into the third heaven, or had stood before the throne of God. No, I see herein a deep mystery, a hidden truth, which I cannot handle or define, shining 'as jewels at the bottom of the great deep,' darkly and tremulously, yet really there And for this very reason, while it is neither pious nor thankful to explain away the words which convey it, while it is a duty to use them, not less a duty is it to use them humbly, diffidently, and teachably, with the thought of God before us, and of our own nothingness.—Vol. iii Serm. xxv.

There are two great requisites for treating properly the momentous questions and issues which have been brought before our generation. The first is accuracy—accuracy of facts, of terms, of reasoning; plain close dealing with questions in their real and actual conditions; clear, simple, honest, measured statements about things as we find them. The other is elevation, breadth, range of thought; a due sense of what these questions mean and involve; a power of looking at things from a height; a sufficient taking into account of possibilities, of our ignorance, of the real proportions of things. We have plenty of the first; we are for the most part lamentably deficient in the second. And of this, these sermons are, to those who have studied them, almost unequalled examples. Many people, no doubt, would rise from their perusal profoundly disagreeing with their teaching; but no one, it seems to us, could rise from them—with their strong effortless freedom, their lofty purpose, their generous standard, their deep and governing appreciation of divine things, their thoroughness, their unselfishness, their purity, their austere yet piercing sympathy—and not feel his whole ways of thinking about religion permanently enlarged and raised. He will feel that he has been with one who "told him what he knew about himself and what he did not know; has read to him his wants or feelings, and comforted him by the very reading; has made him feel that there was a higher life than this life, and a brighter world than we can see; has encouraged him, or sobered him, or opened a way to the inquiring, or soothed the perplexed." They show a man who saw very deeply into the thought of his time, and who, if he partly recoiled from it and put it back, at least equally shared it. Dr. Newman has been accused of being out of sympathy with his age, and of disparaging it. In reality, no one has proved himself more keenly sensitive to its greatness and its wonders; only he believed that he saw something greater still. We are not of those who can accept the solution which he has accepted of the great problems which haunt our society; but he saw better than most men what those problems demand, and the variety of their often conflicting conditions. Other men, perhaps, have succeeded better in what they aimed at; but no one has attempted more, with powers and disinterestedness which justified him in attempting it. The movement which he led, and of which these sermons are the characteristic monument, is said to be a failure; but there are failures, and even mistakes, which are worth many successes of other sorts, and which are more fruitful and permanent in their effects.

GRAHAM'S BOOK ABOUT WORDS.*

ANOTHER "Book about Words." Hardly a week passes but some "Book about Words" comes before us in the way of business—a fact which at least seems to show that the study of language is gaining a hold on the public mind. And the state of mind in which Mr. Graham writes is remarkable. It was, we think, Pascal who, when a boy, invented the science of geometry for himself and worked out a great number of propositions quite rightly without having seen or heard of Euclid's Elements So Mr. Graham, unless he strangely belies himself, knows nothing of Grimm's Law from books, but he has gone a good way towards finding it out for himself by his own mother-wit. He very often makes the truest remarks about the interchange of letters, but he makes them as remarks, as if they were something which had struck himself, but which might or might not have struck anybody else.

> Affinities [Mr. Graham tells us] also exist between certain letters of the alphabet, and this relationship may be often seen in words transferred from one language to another. For example, the labials, or lip-letters, are frequently interchanged Many English words beginning with an F are derived from Latin (or French) words having a P initial

He then gives a list of words, most of which, as father, fish, foot, few, are very well chosen, only it is plain that Mr. Graham does not fully distinguish between words derived from the Latin and words cognate with the Latin. "Another affinity," he goes on to say, "may be observed between g and w." This he shows by pointing out that "many French words beginning with a g guttural represent that letter in English by a w." Garde, gaultier, guerre, &c, are of course the examples, but it is not clear whether Mr. Graham knows that these are Teutonic words which have got into French. So again, he says most truly, "A relation is also to be seen between c guttural and h aspirate. The c hard initial in the Romance languages is represented in the Teutonic languages by an h." We have of course canis and hound and other examples—but why not the most perfect of all, καρδία, heart, herz? Mr. Graham seems somehow to shirk Greek. So we are told, most truly, that "the German z initial often corresponds with the English t," and that "the German t initial corresponds with the English d." All these positions are very true, except that the relation between g and w of which Mr. Graham speaks is of a different kind from the others. The odd thing is that he seems to put out all these truths as original and unconnected observations of his own. Does he know, or does he not know, that they are all merely parts of a well-ascertained system, about which no philologist has any doubts? Mr. Graham is something like the Spartan Isidas, whom the Ephors crowned for the valour which he showed in battle, but at the same time fined for going to battle without proper armour. So we are ready to crown Mr. Graham for having gone so near towards finding out Grimm's Law for himself, but at the same time we must fine him for not knowing that Grimm's Law has been long ago found out by other people. The state of mind is a curious one. We believe it is really not uncommon for students to make out detached pieces of Grimm's Law for themselves, just as Mr. Graham seems to have done. It is a thing very likely to happen when a learner who has some native philological tact is put, as in the present state of things he often will be put, under a teacher who has none. But such learners commonly come across the fully developed Grimm's Law sooner or later, and they then thankfully accept the finished shape of their own crude attempts. The odd thing is that a man should have reached the stage of writing a book, and a book which is certainly above the average of such books, without ever finding out that the whole thing was put into shape long ago.

Mr. Graham, then, is præ-scientific, but he is præ-scientific of the better sort—of the sort which, as we have said some weeks back, is not stiffly holding out against the truth, but gradually feeling its way towards it. Against such inquirers we have nothing to say, except that we doubt whether they have reached the stage at which they ought to write books. Now, does such a book as Mr. Graham's do more harm or good? We are not clear. Mr. Graham, though he makes some blunders, makes far fewer than usual. The particular propositions in his book are much oftener right than wrong. But, besides that he sometimes is wrong and seriously wrong, the whole thing lacks the order, clearness, and simplicity of a scientific treatment of the subject. We do want A B C books on most subjects; we specially want an A B C book of philology in general, and of English philology in particular. But then such an A B C book ought to embody in the simplest form the results of the latest and deepest philological research. Now Mr. Graham's book is a great improvement on the kind of thing which was usual some time back. Mr. Graham is many degrees above Lindley Murray and Mr. Washington Moon. He gives us what thirty years ago only a few very eminent people could have given us. Still, after all, it is not the real article. Then the question comes, Does anything short of the real article do more good or more harm? That is to say, Does it pave the way for something better, or does it simply hinder the way for something better? We do not profess to know. Most likely no universal assertion would be true. Such a book as Mr. Graham's most likely paves the way in some cases and hinders it in others.

It was not to be expected that Mr. Graham should have got beyond the regulation talk about "Saxon" and "the Saxon element," and the "English" language being formed at some late time or other—with Mr. Graham it is as late as the time of Edward the Third. It was not to be expected that he should fully understand the distinction between High-Dutch and Low-Dutch, or do otherwise than confound them under the general head of "German." If he had done otherwise, he would not have been præ-scientific, but scientific. Still it is weary and disappointing work to have to point out, in book after book, the same failure to master the very first elements of the subject, and that even when the author has, like Mr. Graham, given some thought and care to his subject. For instance, Mr. Graham has a chapter "On Latin and French Words," in which he draws some accurate distinctions, and makes remarks on many particular words which are very much to the purpose. But the whole is spoiled by the notion about a "Saxon element," and about "English" being formed in the fourteenth century. With such a way of talking, it is of course impossible to give any historical view of the successive Latin infusions into our language. First of all, there are the three or four words—to be safe, we will say the half-dozen words—which came in from the very beginning of the English Conquest. Then there are the ecclesiastical words which came in with Augustine. Then the reign of the Confessor gave us at least one word—namely, castle. Then there is the infusion which was a direct, though not an immediate, result of the Norman Conquest. These again form two classes. There are those words which have been thoroughly naturalized, which have thoroughly taken the form of native English words, and which it needs philological knowledge to distinguish from native English words. Such are pray, money, and please, which look just as natural as say, honey, and tease. There are others, even of what we may call the Norman class, which are not thus thoroughly broken in, but which still keep about them the signs of their foreign birth. Lastly, there are the inventions, needed and needless, of the time since the so-called Revival of Letters, which will again fall into several easy subdivisions. But it is clear that Mr. Graham, with his notions about "Saxon" and "English," could not possibly draw out an historical sketch of this kind. Nor could he bring in the fact that there is a real, though a very small, British infusion into English dating from the very beginning. And yet, after all this, the plain, simple, scientific truth begins to dawn on the m[ind] of Mr. Graham, just as it begins to dawn on the mind of Sir Edward Creasy. "In truth, Saxon is not so much an element as the very basis and foundation of English." When Mr. Graham has got so far as this a few more moments of thought will tell him that, as Mr. Graham when he was a little boy cannot be rightly called an "element" in his present self, so neither can he be rightly called his own "basis and foundation."

In the early part of his work Mr. Graham seems rather too much inclined to go after Mr. Wedgwood's bow-wow theory, which, soon as it breaks down, certainly has its attractions. As he goes on, he often reminds us of Archbishop Trench, frequently carrying out ideas started by him in greater detail and with greater richness of example. He also sometimes makes the same mistakes. It was more pardonable when the Archbishop wrote than it is now, not to know the real origin of the word King. The Archbishop founds a view upon it; while Mr. Graham first calmly puts it among "a numerous Saxon family," of which ken, know, can, and cunning—anything, in short, except kin—are the other kinsfolk. Afterwards Mr. Graham gives his view also, which improves on that of the Archbishop, and is at all events ingenious and comforting to Dutchmen of all sorts, High and Low.—

> It is worthy of observation that all nations do not express the same idea by the same form of word, i.e. that in different languages the same idea is often represented by a word of a distinctly different root. How comes it, we may ask, that the Romance languages of Europe, viz. French, Italian, Spanish, &c., all use forms of the originally same word to express their idea of "king," namely, roi, re, rey? These languages being off-shoots of Latin, the above words are all derived from the Latin "rex," from "rego," "I rule," or exert physical power. Now in the Teutonic languages of Europe—Dutch, German, English, &c.—we find this idea in a very different phase. "Konig," "Konig," "King." The root of these words may be found in "kennen," "to know." From this it would appear that the idea of a ruler in one class of nations was a physically strong man, who, by means of his bodily strength, could force his subjects to do his will. The Saxon for "king" was "cyning," from "cnawan" to know, i.e. one who "knew" better than his subjects or followers—who was superior to them in knowledge. We may, perhaps, conclude from this that the Romance nations regarded strength or physical power as the distinguishing quality of a ruler; whereas the Germanic tribes saw in their leader one who was able to guide them aright by his superior thought and judgment. The Romans looked to the hand, the Germans to the head, in this matter. Is it not likely that attention to such differences may throw some light on national characteristics?

We have a vague notion that it was Mr Carlyle who first started this most grotesque blunder; it is certain that Mr. Gladstone as well as Archbishop Trench fell into it. Whoever it was, it is very odd that so many people should have conspired to forbear reading Allen and Kemble, and to forget the ending of a Teutonic participle. In another place Mr. Graham enlarges, properly enough, on the fact that the popular names of foreign towns often differ from the real ones. But the instance which he chooses is funny enough. Aix-la-chapelle, he tells us, has been called Aachen "by the Prussians" from time immemorial. This is surely carrying bondage to the modern map further than we ever saw it carried before. What the "Prussians," strictly so called, may have called Aachen when the Prussian language was still spoken we have no means of knowing.

Our old friend Church, which turns up everywhere to vex us, turns up again in Mr. Graham in a very old-fashioned shape:—

> This word, though consisting of only one syllable, has in it the elements of two roots. It is of Greek origin, and signifies literally "the Lord's House." Κύριος (Kyrios) is the Greek for "Lord;" and οἶκος (oikos) means, in that language, "house," or "dwelling." Putting these two roots together we get "Kyri-oik." This, by a natural law, would contract into "kyrik." In Scotch we find "kirk," and in German "kirche." In English the guttural sound is softened, and the word appears as "church."

The kyri-oik is at all events quite new and really ingenious.

The universal misspelling of the word Island, one of the points on which we have hopelessly to bow to the printers' yoke, is dealt with by Mr Graham as well as by other people:—

> As an illustration of corruption arising from a false notion of its derivation, we may take the word "island." How did the s get into it? This s is not sounded, and yet it must be written. In the one word "island," there is a mixture of Latin and German. The first syllable is of Romance, and the second of Teutonic origin. The Latin for "island" is "insula," from "in" and "salo," the "salt," i.e. in the salt (sea, understood).

Thus far Mr. Graham seems really to believe that the word is a mongrel, but directly after, he proceeds to tell us quite rightly about Ea-land, and goes on:—

> In the earlier editions of Paradise Lost, the word always appears written "iland" (without the s), which points more clearly to its Saxon derivation, and is nearer in spelling to the modern German—"Eiland." The "s" was afterward inserted, from a mistaken notion that the word was of Latin, and not German, origin.

The notion that insula has something to do with in salo, and not with νῆσος and ynys, pretty well measures Mr. Graham's progress in Latin philology. One or two things in the book seem to show that it is meant for a somewhat lower class of readers than most books of the kind. For instance, Mr. Graham thinks it needful to give warnings against confounding i and e, and against sticking on an r to words which end in a vowel. Then there is something curious about this remark, "'Bus is now all we have left (at any rate, in ordinary conversation) of 'omnibus.'" One is tempted to ask, as Mr Arnold asked of Mr. Francis Newman, "With whom can Mr. Graham have lived?" and it seems plain that Mr. Graham could hardly give so good an account of his early companions as Mr Newman could have given. It must be comforting both to Mr Arnold and to Mr. Newman to learn that "the word fellow in some cases retains a certain respectability, as when we speak of the 'Fellow of a college.'" We are not surprised at Mr. Graham's somewhat doubtful view as to the respectability of Fellows of Colleges when we read the following description of their every-day talk.—

> The Univ[ersities] also have their slang terms. The graduates use "crib" for a house, "dead [man]" [for an e]mpty wine-bottle, "governor," or "relieving-officer," for a father, "plucked," for defeated or rejected in an examination; and "row" for a disturbance.

We presume then that the Undergraduates of the present generation have mended their ways, and that, though they have cast aside their caps and gowns, yet their speech at least is more correct than that of their seniors. But that "governor," and above all "row," is peculiar to either Graduates or Undergraduates is quite news to us.

SISTERHOODS AND CONVENTS.*

WE have a decided objection, as a rule, to tales written "with a purpose," and especially a controversial purpose. They are always one-sided and almost always unjust. As for any argumentative force, they are of course utterly worthless. Now the book before us is emphatically, and indeed confessedly, written for a purpose, or rather for two purposes. In the first place it is designed to show the miserable failure of "Protestant Sisterhoods," and the admirable and all but invariable success of "Catholic Convents"; in the second place, it is intended to rebut any unfavourable inferences that may be drawn from the recent Saurin trial. The authoress certainly tells us in the preface that nothing could be further from her thoughts than to write "a retort on the Saurin case," and the disclaimer is repeated with tiresome iteration throughout the volume. But considering the frequent and pointed references to that case, and that a final chapter is expressly devoted to examining it and answering the comments of various newspapers, one cannot but feel that "the lady doth protest too much," though her unwillingness to allow that she has been labouring to prove what she has so conspicuously failed to establish is not unnatural. Nobody can object to her taking up the cudgels in defence of Mrs. Starr, if she thinks it desirable to do so; of the value of her defence we shall have something to say presently. But to the first and largest portion of her volume, describing her experience of Anglican sisterhoods, there is a fatal objection to be taken in limine. This is not a mere controversial tale, but a direct indictment of the gravest kind against certain persons, two especially, whom no one of the most ordinary information could have a moment's hesitation in identifying, even if there were not abundant indications, both in the preface and elsewhere, to guide him. Controversial novels are bad enough both as a matter of fairness and of good taste. Still, if people choose to write stories like Father Clement or Father Oswald, and find readers weak enough to be influenced by them, one can only regret the silliness and injustice of the procedure, and feel sure that in a game which two can play at the mischief will sooner or later cure itself. But the present volume while including all the worst faults of a polemical novel, expressly claims to be something more. It is an "autobiography," and the authoress assures us that, while "concealing the names of persons under fictitious titles for obvious reasons," she has "limited herself, as closely as possible, to the relation of circumstances of which she has had personal experience." She does not profess to be writing a story simply, but a narrative of actual facts, and claims authority for her statements accordingly, not as a fancy picture of Anglican convents and Anglican confessors, but as the deposition of a witness as to her own experience of them. Clearly, therefore, the whole value of the narrative hinges on the literal truth of the evidence volunteered. But this the deponent, who has thrust herself into the witness-box, gives us no opportunity of testing, since she has "for obvious reasons" concealed the names of the persons concerned as well as her own. That is to say—for it would be absurd to affect ignorance on the subject—she calls Dr. Pusey "Dr Smithson," Miss Sellon "Miss Jones," but no single reader can doubt, or can be intended to doubt, who are meant to be described under this transparent alias. The reasons for adopting it are, indeed, "obvious" enough. If the real names were used the writer would be liable to prosecution for libel, and might be called upon either to retract her statements—which are highly injurious to the characters of those concerned, Miss Sellon especially—or to prove them. We have heard something of the kind before. Two ladies, if we remember right, who once belonged to Miss Sellon's community, have published works under their own names containing various charges against her treatment of them. One of these works, by a Miss Goodman, is several times referred to with approbation in the present volume. Now we have no complaint to make against the conduct of these fair critics, whatever we may think of their discretion or good taste. Their statements were publicly brought forward, and could be publicly challenged. But what is to be said of an anonymous writer who brings far graver charges than any previously alleged, while, by giving fancy names—which, however, nobody can misunderstand—to the incriminated person, she makes it impossible for her indictment to be either verified or disproved? Of such conduct there can be no two opinions among upright men of any creed. It is at once contemptible and immoral.

We are not going to follow the writer through her description of Anglican Sisterhoods. If it merely claimed to be an imaginary picture, we should say it was in many respects a wildly improbable one. As it claims to be an authentic record of facts, it is enough to say here that we require further evidence before acknowledging its correctness. We know something of Dr. Pusey and of Miss Sellon, who have long been before the world, and we know nothing of their anonymous assailant. Meanwhile, it is obvious to observe that, even if every syllable of this malicious gossip could be authenticated, it would prove nothing to the writer's purpose. She tells us that "women are seldom close reasoners," and if any fresh illustration of so trite a truism were required, every page she has written would supply it. Because the Superior of one sisterhood was incompetent, and the community—which appears to have been the first of the kind established in the Church of England—imperfectly organized, and the Superior of another eccentric, selfish, and tyrannical, therefore there is no sort of resemblance between "a Protestant sister and a Catholic nun."—Q. E. D. And this, too, when the Saurin case is fresh in people's minds! Yet this is the whole argument of the book. Miss Sellon's alleged eccentricities prove all Anglican Sisterhoods to be a delusion and a sham, just as though all fruit was proved to be poisonous because a particular consumptive patient had died of a surfeit of unripe peaches. We may add that the writer seems to be strangely ill-informed about very simple matters in her new communion, on which she kindly condescends to enlighten the ignorance of her Protestant readers. "In the Catholic Church, vows"—and the context suggests that life-vows are meant—"are an essential condition of the religious state." Has the writer ever heard of the Béguines, who take no vows at all, or of other communities for works of mercy, where vows for a year only or five years are made, as is, we believe, the case in some of the Anglican Sisterhoods? Again, we are told that in Catholic convents there is always a "postulancy" of about six months before the newcomer is allowed to enter the noviciate. It may be so in England, though we doubt it. But we happen to know, on the best authority, of foreign convents, and these, too, of very severe Orders, where there is not a single day's postulancy, and the new candidate takes the veil as soon as she enters the house. There is, in fact, abundant evidence that the writer's acquaintance with Anglican convents is exclusively derived from those of which she was formerly an inmate, and her sole acquaintance with Catholic ones from that to which she now belongs. She occasionally parades her knowledge of Latin, and even goes out of her way in one place to quote a line of Horace. Yet one of her complaints of the arrangements of her first Anglican Sisterhood is that "the Hours were not marked by their Catholic titles. Tierce was called the Third Hour; Sext, the Sixth Hour; None, the Ninth Hour. There was," she naively adds, "a reason for this which I shall explain presently." The obvious reason, that "third" is English for tertia, "sixth" for sexta, and "ninth" for nona, she is apparently not aware of. Yet "the Hours" are said in Latin in every Roman Catholic convent, though probably not one nun in ten understands a word of it; and this, to the benighted intellect of Protestants, may seem hardly a more edifying method of devotion than being left for a fortnight to "reflect on four walls and one's own thoughts," which is here stated to be the Protestant manner of conducting "a retreat." Some notion of the style of controverpart of the offices of that Church" (of England), because "it is significantly placed at the end of the Book of Common Prayer, as only an occasional service"; while the fact that Roman Catholic "priests were put to death for saying mass in Elizabeth's reign should at once convince any unprejudiced mind that no celebrations, whether high or low, were contemplated by the Reformers of the Anglican Church."

The first part of the book being devoted to describing the miseries of Miss Sellon's rule, the latter part depicts in glowing colours the unspeakable happiness of Catholic convent life in Ireland. It is highly characteristic of the writer's manner of arguing, that she meets the charge of idleness, often brought against the contemplative Orders, by observing that since the destruction of religious houses at the Reformation, many of the contemplative communities, including her own, have been obliged to assume some of the duties of the active Orders, in other words, the purely contemplative life is shown to be an excellent thing, because many of the professed contemplatives have ceased to practise it. The popular notion about "the mental calibre of a nun" is similarly disposed of by the fact that in England many nuns are obliged to undergo the examination of Government inspectors, while in Ireland they are under the National Board; "hence they cannot be uneducated." Clearly the authoress has learnt her logic in Ireland. The general inference intended to be drawn from this portion of the volume is that Miss Saurin's case was a rare, if not singular, exception, and that she herself was throughout wholly and solely in the wrong. A special chapter is added at the end to point the moral by overhauling the comments made on the trial—some, no doubt, foolish enough—by several religious newspapers. The argument might have been more convincing if, instead of arbitrarily assuming the guilt of Miss Saurin and the spotless excellence of Mrs. Starr, there had been some attempt to prove it. A great deal is made of the circumstance that Miss Saurin had a right of appeal from the Bishop to the Metropolitan, and from him to the Pope, and neglected to use it. This will hardly surprise any one who remembers the ludicrous miscarriage of justice in the Commission tardily extorted from the bishop, and the fact, which is here slurred over, that he had already obtained authority from Rome to dispense her from her vows without her own consent. No allusion whatever is made to the fact that the two worst charges against Miss Saurin—of habitual theft and habitual cruelty to children—completely broke down, or rather were conclusively disposed of by the sworn evidence of her alleged victims in the witness-box. No doubt one swallow does not make a spring, and if convent life can be shown to be in principle defensible, a single Mrs. Starr will not suffice to upset the principle, any more than the tales told here of Miss Sellon, supposing them to be true, would prove all Anglican convents to be nurseries of humbug and oppression. One thing, however, the Hull Convent case does unquestionably prove—namely, that any conventual system, be it Roman or Anglican, which makes the "Reverend Mother" a virtually irresponsible autocrat, carries its own condemnation with it. And such, notwithstanding the vaunted appeals to Bishop and Archbishop of which we have heard so much, appears to be really the case with the Order to which Miss Saurin belonged. Very few men placed in such a position, and still fewer women, would fail to become petty tyrants.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT.*

WHEN we have said that this is a new novel by Mr. Anthony Trollope, we might almost be excused for saying nothing more. Everybody knows the peculiarities of his literary manufacture better than we can describe it. His writings always remind us of the glowing descriptions in advertisements of the article of food called Revalenta Arabica; which is declared to afford a thoroughly wholesome diet for invalids, to be easily digestible, and yet never to pall upon the appetite. People who like highly-spiced meats must go further; but we can take up any one of Mr Trollope's novels at random, read any quantity with perfect content, and leave off at any point without the smallest reluctance. To our taste, indeed, the various novels which deal with the inhabitants of Barset are distinctly superior to the rest; and on one or two occasions Mr Trollope has sunk into positive insipidity. But, for the most part, we know not whether to wonder most at his marvellous abundance or at his strange uniformity of merit. If we were placed before the shelves which in some comprehensive library groan under the weight of his collected works (we imagine that in the British Museum there must be room for such a collection), we should revere one of the most singular monuments we know of human industry, directed to a good purpose, for certainly no one can deny that it is a good work to afford so much innocent amusement to so large a class of readers. The novel called He Knew he was Right will add two more volumes to the existing Trollope Library, and we may say that it appears to us to be on the whole rather superior to the average. We will not attempt to estimate what is the precise value thus indicated; but as the novel, in spite of its merits, illustrates also some of the weaker points of Mr. Trollope's style, we will venture to dwell a little upon one or two defects, always admitting frankly that, in spite of them, it is a very readable book. It would be sanguine, indeed, in a critic to expect that an author will take his advice; and yet it seems to us that Mr Trollope might so easily avoid certain errors, that we cannot help pointing them out, when so good a text is p[illegible]vided. Th[illegible] tolerably obvious, and seem to proceed from an undue ext[illegible] of a very sound rule. Thus, for example, we do not complain [illegible] an instant of Mr Trollope's tendency to extreme real[illegible]. By all means let us have people represented exactly as we s[illegible] in every day of our lives, with no violent catastrophes an[illegible] terrible passions. Whether this is the highest style of art or not, [illegible] t que[illegible], but undoubtedly it is that for which Mr. Trollope is best fitted, and most of his success is due to the accuracy with which he has measured his own abilities. But Mr Trollope seems to us to draw some delusive inferences from the theory upon which he acts. He is so anxious to avoid heroes that his characters become absolutely mean. He is so much afraid lest they should deviate from the beaten track that he will not allow them to show [illegible] mary strength of character. For fear of their breaking out of the highroad, he will scarcely allow them a will [illegible] own. He has painted we know not how many lovers in the character of asses between two bundles of hay. Having apparently observed that men are generally less romantic in their love-affairs than novelists have described, he makes them so feeble-minded that they are in a constant state of oscillation between rival charmers. There is an unlucky clergyman, who fills a subordinate place in the present novel, who is fought for by two sisters. For years he has remained in a position of equilibrium, then the eldest sister gets a chance, and forces him into a semi-declaration, the youngest manages, by a brilliant stroke of intrigue, to carry him off to the very verge of matrimony, and finally, at the last moment, the eldest takes up the running, and wins by a head. We by no means deny that there are many persons of this preposterous imbecility, we only say that they are really very uninteresting heroes of a story. If a man has so little vigour of mind that he really cannot decide whom he wants to marry, we do not take much [illegible] following his [illegible]. Even when Mr. Trollope allow[illegible] his heroes a little mor[illegible] he half repents, and tries [illegible] explain it away. It [illegible] racteristic of Mr Trollope [illegible] when Mr [illegible] denny r[illegible] ames makes a personal assault on [illegible] he i[illegible] ot allowed to plant a knockdown blow, bu[illegible] dulged in a confused scuffle. We admit that scuffl[illegible] ooner than knoc[illegible] blows, but surely a novelist should not interpret the rule which commands fidelity to nature in such a way as not only to confine himself to possible, or even to probable, events, but even to keep to the very commonest events. A hero might be allowed, for once, to do a vigorous action thoroughly well. If the author's models are to be living beings, they need not be the first persons that he meets in walking down the Strand. Th[illegible] heroines are of necessity made a little more interesting; yet [illegible] to them character is doled out with a grudging spirit. A young lady in He Knew he was Right is allowed to refuse a rich heir to a peerage in favour of a poor writer in the daily press, but when she has gone so far, Mr. Trollope becomes a little frightened. We shall be in danger of thinking too highly of her. Accordingly, we are told with extreme care that she doubts very much as to the propriety of her step, that she fully values the charms of rank and wealth, and, which is more annoying, that if the peer had put the question a second time, she would probably have accepted him. Indeed, even after the matrimonial prize has been carried off by another lady, and her former lover is soon to be made happy, we are scrupulously informed of the qualms which assail the virtuous heroine, and her half-formed doubts whether she would not have accepted the peer if he had made a little more display of his advantages. All this is natural enough, young ladies may often have such doubts and difficulties, and be very estimable, and even very courageous, in spite of them. But it is a gratuitous lowering of his heroine to bring out all her worldly propensities, and to impress upon us that she acts rightly at last rather by accident than from strength of principle. Surely Mr. Trollope might for once describe for us such people as exist, though it may be less commonly, with vigour enough to make an independent resolution and stick to it without repining.

The central story of the book brings this out in a rather different way. Mr. Trollope has taken the rather unpleasant subject of a desperate quarrel between a man and his wife, which has its origin in a groundless suspicion, and ends in a separation and the final death and madness of the husband. The story is painful in itself, and, to make it tolerable, we should be able at least to sympathize with one of the persons concerned. There should be some generosity of sentiment, some struggle against the obstacles raised by a foolish pride, and something to permit us to respect the sufferers and make allowance for their misunderstanding. Unluckily Mr Trollope has managed matters so as to give us a hearty contempt for both husband and wife. The husband takes up a silly notion about his wife's liking for a man old enough to be her father. He refuses to make it up on any terms short of her absolute submission to his arbitrary will. He sets a private detective to watch her without the least justification, and descends so low as to adopt this ex-policeman [illegible] his adviser, and to ask him what legal measures he is to take, and even to consult him as to the provision to be made for his infant son. He then carries off the baby by a stratagem, and tries to bully his wife through her maternal affections. On the other hand, the lady is equally unreasonable throughout the quarrel; she refuses to make any real advances to her husband, and insists upon being civil to the gentleman against whom his suspicions are aroused, merely by way of asserting her liberty and defying her relations. We do not object to this for a moment as improbable. Doubtless it would be possible to quote cases from the Divorce Court showing equal folly and wickedness on the part of husbands and wives. But it is a great mistake in art to render the people in whose fate we are supposed to take an interest so intensely contemptible. Undoubtedly people might act in the manner described, but no one would act so who had the slightest strength of character or capacity for deep affection. The husband is a really marvellous compound of meanness, weakness, and obstinacy, and the wife, with whom Mr. Trollope expects us to sympathize, is scarcely better. The husband, indeed, becomes so absurd in his conduct that he has to go mad in order to make his actions tolerably intelligible, and there are some scenes which are forcibly described and meant to be very pathetic during his final illness. Unluckily, we have learnt to despise him so heartily that we only wish for his speedy death, and the lady is so selfish and mean-spirited that we rather grudge her final dismissal to comparative happiness. There were the elements, in short, of a good situation, but before we can be really interested in such a story, there must be some kind of plausible ground of quarrel, and one at least of the actors must show some signs of magnanimity and tenderness. Mr. Trollope's dislike of exaggeration unluckily seems to have grown into a positive dislike of any vigorous character, and consequently, instead of a heartrending quarrel between two well-meaning people, he treats us to a series of wretched squabbles between a couple of shallow and touchy fools, which becomes simply repulsive. He has, indeed, avoided the old and unpleasant trick by which novelists used to represent two people as separated by a misunderstanding which a word would have cleared up, but, unluckily, the very fact that there can be no mistake on either side as to the paltry nature of the dispute makes it all the more [illegible]. In short, he has succeeded in being probable at the price of dep[illegible]ving his characters of every quality which [illegible]uld attract our sympathies. There are, we repeat, people who fall out from pure absence of soul or intellect, but they are scarcely the persons whose adventures will bear detailing through a great number of pages.

One other fault of the story may perhaps be connected with the same principle. In real life we seldom find a plot which fulfils the proper dramatic conditions. The thread of the story is complicated and intersected by the interference of a number of secondary characters, each with an interest of their own. Mr. Trollope resolves to imitate reality in this respect also. Instead of following the fortunes of his chief actors, he plunges into all [illegible]r of episodes and digressions. Besides the story of the quarrel, there are no less than four other couples, the history of whose loves is related at length. There is a peer who marries an American lady; the lovely Nora who marries the penny-a-liner; the charming Dorothy who marries the heir to the chief fortune in the book; and the clergyman of whose hard choice between two sisters we have already spoken. We are constantly skipping from one of these stories to another; each of them is more or less remotely connected with one or more of the others; and, in short, we have such a complication as would be frequently produced in a real biography if to the life of the hero we added those of his sisters and brothers, and of all the young gentlemen and ladies who at different times made love to them. But the fact that there are such complications in real life is a very bad reason for dwelling upon them in a fiction. If Mr. Trollope had confined himself to any one of these stories, his book would have had a certain unity, and, what is no slight advantage, would have been reduced amazingly in length. We would not exclude all episodes, or insist upon the neatness of construction which would be appropriate in a French novel, but we certainly resent the way in which our attention is constantly distracted, though we may admire the skill with which Mr. Trollope manages, like a circus rider, to combine five separate courses of action. After all, it is pleasanter to see a good performance on one horse than an indifferent performance on five.

These evils are natural consequences, it may be, of Mr. Trollope's superstitious adherence to facts which almost excludes even the selection of the most attractive facts. But it is only fair to add once more that the lovers of his style will find many descriptions excellently worked out, and many very clever subsidiary characters. Two American young ladies deserve honourable mention as excellent types of their countrywomen, though the Americans by whom they are surrounded strike us as resembling rather too closely the conventional Yankee, who has been at least sufficiently described.

CHERRIER'S HISTORY OF CHARLES THE EIGHTH.*

(Second Notice.)

M. DE CHERRIER'S first volume is mainly occupied with the events which happened before Charles's expedition into Italy. In the last chapter the King has not yet reached Florence. Several chapters are occupied, and well occupied, with the early part of Charles's reign, and with all those chaotic disputes of which we spoke briefly in our former article. The one thing which we suppose everybody carries off from the accounts of this confused time is the wonderful way in which Charles puts away Maximilian's daughter and marries Maximilian's wife. There is something so irresistibly ludicrous in the whole story; the proxy marriage of Maximilian with Anne of Britanny, with the grotesque ceremonies which attended it, is queer enough in itself, but it is queerer still when the new-made Augusta almost immediately transfers herself to the King of France, who sends her quasi step-daughter out of the way to make room for her. To be sure, Charles's wooing was somewhat in the vigorous style of Iarbas, and the Lord of the World was not forthcoming at the proper moment in so very remote a corner as the Armorican peninsula. Thus began the first stage of that annexation of Britanny to France of which we had something to say when we reviewed the excellent work of the Count of Carné last year. Still the acquisition of this great province, though of far more real value to France, was by no means so showy as the great enterprise of Naples and the endless shadowy enterprises of Constantinople and Jerusalem which lay beyond it. To these birds in the bush, three birds in the hand, Roussillon, Artois, and the County of Burgundy, were deliberately sacrificed. Then comes the expedition to Naples, which M. de Cherrier introduces by a sketch of the state of Italy at the time. The subject is not a new one, but M. de Cherrier's account can be read with pleasure even though so many have gone before him. He treats it in a calm and judicious way, and at some stages of his work he has had the advantage of consulting unpublished documents. From these he has drawn some new facts, for instance, he has brought out in his second volume the fact that the Venetian Government lent itself to a plot for the assassination of Charles the Eighth on his return from Naples. In fact, when we see the sort of men and the sort of governments with which Charles had to deal, though the folly of his enterprise stands out more and more clearly, yet we cease to wonder at it, we almost cease to blame it. Ludovic of Milan and Pope Alexander invited him, Florence was his old ally, Venice did not discourage him, a party in the kingdom which he sought to win was zealous in his cause, and the nation at large seems to have thought that any change must be for the better. Things being in this state, the wonder would have been if a prince of Charles's disposition had stayed at home. And we cannot help feeling a certain sympathy for him when everybody gradually turns against him, when those who had invited him into Italy bar the way against him as he is going home, and when he finds that the cession of provinces has not bought the friendship or the neutrality of Maximilian and of Ferdinand the Catholic. Maximilian indeed, after the manner of Maximilian, flashes across the scene for a moment in his genuine character of a royal Landsknecht. But Ferdinand had already begun steadily to plot the mischief, both against friends and against enemies, which he so shamelessly carried out in the time of Charles's successor. Everywhere, in short, except in Naples itself, Charles meets with worse men than himself, men who must have thoroughly puzzled him by a depth both of cleverness and of wickedness quite beyond his understanding. In Naples itself indeed we can well understand that any change, any foreign conquest, must have been felt as likely to be an improvement on the tyranny of Ferdinand and his son Alfonso. Then come those shiftings of scene, those changes of persons and rulers, which seem almost as if they could not be a portion of real history. That old Ferdinand should die was not very wonderful, still it does not happen every day that people die at so very opportune a moment. And what follows is really like a piece of tragic romance. Alfonso, succeeding to the crown just as his enemy was arming against his kingdom, persecuted by the Erinnyes of his crimes, and seeing their avenger in the foe that was drawing near, driven in sheer remorse and fear to lay aside the crown to which he had just succeeded, and striving to hide his fears, his crimes, and his mental horrors, in at least the likeness of religious penitence—the picture of such strange workings of the human mind as these might have made a worthy subject for Grecian tragedy. Then comes the young Ferdinand, on whom the task of defending the rights of his house was so suddenly and so unfairly cast. Guiltless of the crimes of his father and grandfather, he has to bear their immediate punishment. No one can refuse to sympathize with him when he makes his last noble appeal to the people of his capital, and, finding no response, goes forth into his momentary banishment. Then the tide turns; the Neapolitans find how deeply they have erred in welcoming the foreigner; the King returns to his capital, and, by a series of gallant enterprises, is winning back his kingdom, when his life suddenly ends in his strange marriage and mysterious death. The wind-up of the story and of the dynasty, the reign and fall of Frederick, the victim of his kinsman of Aragon, does not come within the immediate range of M. de Cherrier's work, though of course he glances at it in the Appendix which is devoted to a sketch of the Italian wars of Louis the Twelfth and Francis the First. There is hardly a more taking or more picturesque tale in the whole range of history than the fates of these two gallant and loyal princes, doomed to pay the penalty for the sins of their house. And an element of grotesqueness is added to the tragedy when we think of one so very small as Charles the Eighth being the instrument destined to bring about such mighty changes.

The same elements of tragedy mingled with grotesqueness are found wherever Charles goes. He is like a child, or rather like a monkey, whose touch has set to work a piece of complicated machinery on which he gazes in fright or in mere puzzledom. We meet everywhere with the strangest results and the strangest cases of companionship. Look at Florence at the thought of the coming of the French invader, a nominal ally, but one who seriously believed that he became the lawful master of a friendly city simply by riding into it with his lance upon his thigh. Who could have expected that the coming of such a guest would lead to the deliverance of Florence from her own tyrants, and to the deliverance of Pisa from the tyranny of Florence herself? Who would then have expected to find French officers and soldiers so zealous for Pisan freedom as, in its cause, to disobey the orders of their own King, or to find that King so weak or so careless that his orders could be safely disobeyed? Then we have the grand figure of Savonarola in all the dignity of the reformer, the prophet, and the martyr; but in him too there is an element of grotesque incongruity when he goes on to the last looking for the deliverance of Italy and the reformation of the Church at the hands of Charles the Eighth. If, however, Savonarola could be beguiled into expecting great things from Charles, surely Charles himself may be forgiven for fancying that great things were not beyond his power to do. Then the first act of the Milanese tragedy comes within the reign of this unlucky general disturber. The betrayal, the fall, the long and dreary imprisonment of Ludovic, belong to a later stage, but we get the touching story of Gian-Galeazzo, his wife and his children, the victims of the selfish ambition of their kinsman at home, comforted for a moment, but little benefited, by the impotent good-nature of the mightier kinsman who had come from afar. Charles visits his cousin; he feels for him, he talks about him, but Gian-Galeazzo only loses his Duchy and his life all the sooner. At Rome there is somewhat of tragic grandeur in the mere amount of the wickedness of Alexander the Sixth and his son. But there is a ludicrous element too—first, in the abject fear of the Pontiff himself, and secondly, in the way in which, when he has secured himself, the wily Borgia contrives to bamboozle the puzzled and gaping King of France. Then, thrown into the general mass, we have the touching story of the banished Turkish prince, handed about from one keeper to another, and at last put out of the way by the policy of Alexander. Even in the less important relations of Charles with Savoy and Montferrat we at least have the grotesque element strongly prevailing. Charles, we have no doubt, always meant to be an honest man, but Francis himself, first gentleman of France and of Europe as he was, could hardly have played a shabbier trick than when Charles borrowed the jewels of princesses who had given him a hospitable reception, and then sold or pawned them for his own purposes. The whole story is a mass of incongruities, the events are so great, but the chief instrument in them is so inexpressibly small; the background of the picture is so splendid, but the central figure is so grotesquely contemptible. Altogether the tale is a noble one for any historian, and though M. de Cherrier might sometimes perhaps have brought things out with more of force and liveliness, he has, on the whole, done justice to his theme.

M. de Cherrier has printed several curious documents in his Appendices. We have some doubts as to his view that Mahomet the Second planned a "fusion of races" among the different inhabitants of his empire. Mahomet was a far-seeing statesman, and he was not a Mussulman fanatic. He saw, as M. de Cherrier says, the importance of the Orthodox element in his dominions, and the importance of keeping it separate from Western Christendom. The recognised position which he gave to the Byzantine Patriarch and to the rest of the Greek hierarchy was a masterstroke of policy, and one the effects of which are felt to this day. But it implies in its very nature, not the fusion, but the keeping asunder, of the two chief religions of the Empire. We do not see what is proved by the fact that Mahomet struck coins with Greek inscriptions, or rather with a mixture of Greek and Arabic, ὁ Μελῆκις πάσης Ῥωμανίας καὶ Ἀνατολῆς Μαχαμάτης—a legend which reminds one of the western use of Basileus and the eastern use of Ῥήξ. Perhaps a very strict Mussulman might not have issued such a coinage or assumed such a title; but its convenience was obvious, without supposing any ulterior objects.

M. de Cherrier has reprinted the decree for the forty days' torture of condemned traitors put forth by Galeazzo Visconti in 1362. It came from the Chronicle of Peter Azarius in Muratori, xvi. 410. Sismondi attributes it to Bernabos, who was quite capable of it, and M. de Cherrier to Bernabos and Galeazzo together. But it is plain that it was the personal act of Galeazzo. "Conversus autem Dominus Galeaz ad conterendam nequitiam proditorum et ad compescendos cujuscumque perfidiæ motus, mandavit rectoribus suis ut infrascripta tormenta exsequerentur et infligerent in personis proditorum suorum et complicum." Then follow the details of prolonged torture and mutilation which makes one shudder to read. M. de Cherrier, by the way, by a very common mistake, makes Bernabos and Galeazzo Dukes, which they never were. Azarius, one may note, makes the genitive of Bernabos Bernabovis, a form of declension which one would hardly have thought of.

More immediately connected with M. de Cherrier's subject are the documents printed at vol. ii. pp. 492, 493, which make it plain that in June 1495 the Council of Ten seriously entertained a scheme for the assassination of Charles the Eighth. In the same volume will be found the very amusing account of "Les Merveilles de Rome," sent home by order of Charles and printed for the benefit of his subjects.

MISS EDEN'S HOLIDAY IN AUSTRIA.*

MISS EDEN, whose agreeable Glimpse of the War in Bohemia we received with welcome the season before last, has now given us an account of a very pleasant holiday passed by her in the Austrian Tyrol in the summer of last year. That strong sympathy with a depressed and struggling cause which breathed through her earlier work had apparently its effect in determining the writer's choice in favour of her recent track of travel and adventure. The same warm partisanship and quick sensibility on the side of all things and persons Austrian is manifest throughout the present frankly written and chatty little tale of travel. Miss Eden writes with the simplicity and unconsciousness of effort which most pleases us in narratives of this kind. Without the slightest attempt at display, or the least hovering even upon the edge of the literary precipice of fine writing, she can make of the incidents of ordinary travel a series of pictures which please us by their naïveté and truth if they do not startle us with their novelty or strangeness. With enough of a lady's natural instinct for romance to enjoy whatever is picturesque in scenery, or fanciful in local legend or record, she is most keenly alive to every touch of nature in the life of the wayside peasant, or in the manners of the chance travelling companion. Her ready pencil is at hand to lend reality and permanence to the impressions of the moment. The sketch of the pretty village of Lauffen which forms the frontispiece, and the snowy peak in the background of Salzburg which adorns the title-page, form an artistic prelude from which the mind of the reader passes with pleasure to the contents of the clear and smoothly-written volume before him.

Miss Eden's route began by way of the long sea voyage from the Hermitage Wharf, by the Thames side, to Rotterdam. It was near being prematurely cut short by the explosion of a spirit-lamp stupidly smuggled on board by a steerage passenger to warm her children's food. A curious figure this woman presented, coming up the gangway, "her stuff dress, nearly burnt to rags, hanging about her." Luckily for their night's rest her fellow-passengers on board the Batavier were in ignorance of the risk they had run. Slowly ascending the stream, with just leisure enough for a sunset glimpse of the glories of Cologne, and a passing enjoyment of the well-known picturesque part of the river between Cologne and Bingen, our author and her German travelling companion, parting from sundry friends and the pleasant captain of "Rhine steamer No. 26," landed at Mayence—too late, however, to do more than catch at the wicket the murmurs of the ceaseless devotions of the Convent of Perpetual Prayer, the hour of admittance being overpast. Next day starting alone, but enlivened by agreeable companionship picked up in the train, and charmed out of the possibility of sleep by the romantic view of the distant range of the Saltzkammergut, Miss Eden was ushered, at Salzburg, by the politest of Customs' officers, once more into "dear Austria." The delight of rejoining friends, enhanced by the comforts of the Goldenes Schiff, with the picturesque beauties of the old town, made her stay here very delightful. It was diversified by a two days' trip to the beautiful district of Berchtesgaden, a little bit of Bavaria which abuts into the middle of the Imperial preserves. Abounding as it does in game, which is strictly preserved, this intrusive little angle of territory is tantalizing, like Naboth's vineyard, to so keen a sportsman as Franz Joseph. What strikes the English novice, on entering German soil, is the utter absence of flocks of sheep. An unhappy Frenchman in the coupé of the same diligence with our author, burning with an insatiable thirst for knowledge, but not knowing a word beyond his mother tongue, continued to insinuate the problem "why mutton is rarely or never seen on Austrian tables." It is true, as our travellers found, that excellent mountain mutton is met with at times equal to any Welsh of our own, and in colour and flavour hardly inferior to venison. There are also, in the plains of Southern Germany, great numbers of sheep. But, as a rule, mutton is never willingly eaten by Germans. To a healthy English palate the taste and look of the stuff are alike disgusting, and the very servants prefer to it the coarse and stringy beef out of the soup.—

Contrary to the express orders of the master of the house, we sometimes contrived a small joint of mutton for dinner, for a treat to our English appetites; but when it came on the table and was cut, we used to look guiltily at each other as we tried to eat it, and pretend it was excellent, though the fact was we hid great pieces away, as in our school-room days, under potato skins or pieces of salad. Anything so rank, so stringy, so disgusting, I never ate. After trying it twice, we gave in, and had to adopt thankfully the Austrian view, that their insipid veal and perpetual beef are, after all, most wholesome, even for sick people or young children.

In the end of autumn, when all the grain was harvested, and all the hay cut that could possibly be mowed off the rich pastures, I saw a few flocks of sheep on them. The very sight of them was enough to indicate that the mutton must be bad. The sheep themselves appear to be aware of it, for they have a sneaking, dissatisfied look, and always keep in a crowd, trying to hide themselves. Except in very old pictures, and in engravings in Bibles centuries old, I never saw such animals, with long flapping ears that would have gained any rabbit a prize for lop-ears, long legs and arched backs, like New Forest pigs. Even in the bitter winter weather they have scarcely any pretence of wool on their backs, certainly not nearly as much as a month-old lamb. About Salzburg these were the only sort of sheep I saw; but I was told that great efforts are being made to introduce a better breed. Large sums have been given for some from England; and with the wonderfully rich pastures and mountain fields that they have here, what a rich return their introduction may make to the country!

Next to Baron Beust, the person most to be admired, albeit least to be envied, in Germany is, Miss Eden thinks, "an Englishwoman at the head of an Austrian household who can really keep things tolerably together." The amount of prejudice and ignorance on the part of the servants, the dread of fresh air and free circulation, the Saints' days on which they won't work, and the Sundays on which they will, the greasy cooking, the beloved heavy puddings, the wonderful joints of meat, the dreadful knives that won't cut and the good beer that won't keep—"all these things are enough to turn the brain of a refined practical Englishwoman." The higher classes, or the nobility, are found in their domestic life, no less than in their freedom from prejudice and slatternliness, much the same as the corresponding classes in England. It is in the middle class, among the wives of professional men, that discomfort, want of elegance, and general dowdiness, make the home repulsive. In the afternoon, after dinner, coffee, and an hour's sleep, you sometimes meet the Frau Doctorin or the Frau General on the esplanade, or at the bath rooms, but in general they are too tired with looking after the kitchen and the scrubbing of the floors, or seeing that baby is not drowning in a tub of water or choking itself with sour semmel, to permit themselves such an indulgence, or to leave room for culture of any kind. The greatest sensation of all, to an English lady of orthodox training and natural curiosity, is to handle for the first time a real live mummy baby. "It is a most wonderful circumstance, but you may reside any time in a German village, while holding daily intercourse with inhabitants of every age and size, yet never see a baby!" The cause of this mysterious absence is traced by Miss Eden to the mummy system of nursing—i.e., to the fashion of swaddling, which was known of yore in this country also. The landlady rejoicing in a baby of six months old gave the writer the opportunity of penetrating the secret of its multitudinous bands and wrappings, which she has duly described for the edification of the curious in such matters. No wonder that the traveller from England is struck with the pale faces, sickly air, and twisted limbs which so frequently meet the eye in Southern Germany. Set free after the first year from their mummy cases, the hapless Kindchen enter upon another period of denial of liberty, motion, and fresh air. The boy, if he can walk, is thrust into corduroy trousers, waistcoat, and jacket, with usually a blue apron. "It is quite distressing to see little roly-poly children, just able to toddle about, dressed up like figures in a pantomime, with their pale, weird faces, and lank colourless hair, in keeping with their strange attire." It makes one sick to see the numbers of idiots, dwarfs, and horribly-deformed people that one meets at every turn. These sights are naturally more common in low-lying districts, as in the lovely lake village of Hallstadt. But where nature is not specially to blame, as at Salzburg itself, an ill-favoured and sickly population tells of the ill effects of hygiene neglected, of close rooms, stifled by stoves and reeking with perpetual tobacco-smoke. The broad and complicated necklace, often of seven or eight chains of silver, which sets off the quaint dress of the Tyrolese and Styrian peasant, is worn in a great measure to hide the frightful goitres and swollen throats which deform the lower orders. The very last thing to promote a robust or hardy physique is the inveterate habit of cowering over the stove, which, in a country rich in timber, is a luxury within reach of the poorest. Another odd characteristic of what to an English labouring man would seem beyond even woman-like softness is seen in the red umbrellas of the peasantry glancing in and out of the yellow, green, and scarlet foliage during the autumn rains of the vintage. The degradation of the peasant women is sadly enhanced by the pressure of the conscription. "It is revolting to see them transformed into horrible-looking objects employed as scavengers, ostlers, and ploughmen." Others may be seen threshing and mowing, looking coarse, masculine, and brutal, half the men being away soldiering. Nowhere in Austria is there any mitigation of manual labour by the help of steam. Often indeed in Bodenbach our author used to see luggage trains pass with engines, carefully covered, from Ransome's and other well-known engineering firms, but their destination could not be made out. Not one was ever seen working. Miss Eden has some sensible remarks on the odious pressure of the "blood tax" upon the population of Austria. Not the least evil is the swelling, by discharged soldiers, of the vast army of beggars. Popular prejudice runs proverbially against the Bohemians as the worst of this class. "People say they are such thieves," though

Miss Eden puts in a good word for the Bohemians as making the best servants. They are decidedly active, clever, and intelligent. A good story is told by her of three beggars. A North German, a Sláv, and a Bohemian, when travelling in company together, entered a house in which they saw a beautiful watch lying on a table. Shortly after leaving the house, the North German remarked, "That was a beautiful watch." "Yes," said the Sláv, "and we might have taken it." "I have got it!" triumphantly exclaimed the Bohemian.

Besides her acute and practical observations of the habits and manners of the people, Miss Eden's pages show signs of her appreciation of natural scenery, and of the prominent objects of industry and art. The lively sketch of her visit to the great salt mines and works of Saltzburg, and her recognition of what is rare or beautiful in the flowers and insects of the country, with her quiet unaffected pictures of the loveliness of mountain, lake, and fell, are instances of this graphic power. Her account of the riesen, or extraordinary timber shoots of Brunn, whereby the huge stores of roughly-felled trees are shot down for miles with lightning-speed into the lake, to be floated down the Danube, is no less deserving of notice. The sense of enjoyment, as well of kindly feeling for all persons and things with which her holiday trip brought her into contact, makes itself agreeably felt throughout her narrative, and imparts itself in a way that it is hardly possible to resist to the mind of the reader.

HENDERSON'S LATIN PROVERBS AND QUOTATIONS.*
